Editorial.

ANY one who exhorts Spiritualists, as we have recently done in these columns, to their very evident duty to distinguish between reality and fraud is sure to bring down upon him the wrath and indignation of a great many Spiritualists who seem to be altogether indifferent as to the existence of fraud and humbug. And so we have received a number of letters—more than we can print—arguing the general subject of Spiritualism. The best answer to such communications is to refer them to the original article in this paper on "The Duty of Spiritualists," in which the existence of a wide range of psychical phenomena generally denominated Spiritualism was freely recognized. The exhortation of a correspondent to choose between materialism and Spiritualism is just the exhortation we have made. The fact is that a good deal that passes under the name of Spiritualism is materialism of the grossest kind. We do not think that faith in the future life can be increased by any such fraudulent jugglery. Let the whole range of psychical phenomena be freely investigated, but let not gross fraud and deceit be labelled spiritualism.

THE dedication of a church for Christian Scientists in Boston is an indication of the increased following which this new sect has attained, and of the sincerity and devotion of its members to their new religion. In this religion Mrs. Eddy is the chief prophetess, and the religious exercises in this church are to consist of readings and expositions from the Bible and Mrs. Eddy's work. We shall watch with interest the history and activity of this church. It remains yet to be seen whether it will develop organic force, and whether it will be a factor of importance in social and moral reform in this city. Certainly, there is room enough and work enough for any church that undertakes to apply Christianity and science to the ills of our day. We must wait to find whether this science is really Christian or this Christianity is really scientific.

WHAT shall the preacher's theme be? In nothing is the successful preacher more successful than in the choice of his themes. A great preacher said that a good text would write half the sermon. But by a good text we do not merely mean a Scriptural motto, but a real theme, which gives heart and life to the sermon. The text may be taken from the Bible or from the newspaper, or from some book on the preacher's desk, or it may be taken directly from human life. There are occasions which bring their own theme; and the preacher may be glad of them, and may say a word in season. But he must just as truly speak out of season in the sense of bringing to the attention of his congregation things that are often too far from their thought and interest. The theme may sometimes be in the air, and then the congregation look to the minister as to a moral barometer. Or it is a subject which is not in the air, but which ought to be; and the preacher may create a fresh breeze of interest where attention has been languid and somnolent. The preacher needs a quiver full of arrows, but he needs to know as well when and where to shoot them.

NO ONE is better acquainted from personal knowledge of the condition of the Armenians and their relation to the Turks than Dr. Cyrus Hamlin, who is the founder and first president of Robert College. In an article in the Advance Dr. Hamlin expresses his opinion with the greatest freedom. Referring to the sultan's commission of inquiry concerning the recent massacre, he says: "But the sultan has sent a commission of inquiry. This is always done in such cases. Its object is to whitewash the guilty parties. I have known of many 'commissions.' I never knew one whose report was not worthy of the indignation of every lover of truth and justice. Unless English and American and German commissioners shall be allowed to go under strong military protection, the truth will never be known. One missionary thinks that at least twenty-seven villages have been destroyed; another, forty-eight. The real number may be beyond the greatest or less than the least. The truth will ultimately be known if foreign powers prosecute the inquiry with earnestness, backed up by a show of gathering naval force. The Turks are skilful in promises and non-performances; but firmness, backed up by power, always brings them to terms."

DR. HAMLIN adds: "The Turkish government knew perfectly well the absurdity of an Armenian rebellion. The Armenian people in that region are a quiet, hard-working peasantry, unarmed, unused to arms, in the midst of a Moslem population six to their one, armed and used to arms from boyhood up. The Turkish government knew the absolute impossibility of the poor Armenians getting together to make any resistance. Lambs do not endanger the existence of wolves or tigers. From the beginning the idea has been inexpressibly absurd." Dr. Hamlin accuses the Turkish minister at Washington of using dishonorably a letter published a year ago by him in the Congregationalist, in which he deprecated the formation of Huntchagist or Armenian revolutionary societies. Copious extracts from this letter have been scattered all through the Turkish embassies of foreign lands for circulation. Dr. Hamlin protests against every line which the Turkish minister has quoted. This minister, by the way, is a native Greek, who ought to be engaged in a better service than in assisting the Turkish government in its trickery and cruelty. Very naturally, the Greeks repudiate Mr. Mavroyeni. The Greek Senate has before it a bill to relieve the sufferings of the several thousand Armenians who have escaped to Athens.

ONE of the best things a boy can learn at college is how to behave himself decently, though, if his education has not been neglected, he will have learned this before going there. It may not be necessary to introduce books of etiquette in the course of study, but a young man ought not to come out of college without having some idea of what it means to be a gentleman. His head is not merely to be a cistern for facts. If his character is not educated, as well as his memory and intelligence, he may be more dangerous than valuable to the community. Therefore, all instruction and encouragement in brutality and disorder are to his disadvantage as well as to that of the college and the community. We are glad to see, therefore, that President Harper of the Chicago University will not tolerate for a moment the brutality of hazing, and that the young men who propose to indulge in it will get their walking tickets. Many of our colleges have been governed on what has been called the parental plan. They have been conducted on the assumption that boys "would be boys," and hazing and all the disgraceful rowdiness of college boys have been carried on largely because the college faculties were accessories to the fact. The practice could long since have been stopped if the college authorities had meant business, as President Harper evidently does. With a higher sentiment of manliness in our colleges, the hazing brutality will disappear. Chicago University will become still more popular when it is known that its standard of conduct, like its standard of scholarship, is considerably higher than that of a village academy, and that it assumes that one of the first duties of a university is to influence conduct and character.

THE perfect naturalness of the story of the birth and development of Jesus as given in the oldest Gospel is an indication of its historic character. Had Jesus been regarded first as a God, he might have been represented as assuming at once a human form, as the Grecian divinities were supposed to take the form and character of human beings when they chose. And modern Spiritualism goes so far as to declare that it is possible for a spirit to become materialized on earth without a new process of birth, though such materialized spirits do not stay here very long at a time. But the author of Mark, now generally regarded as the oldest Gospel, assumes the natural human birth of Jesus. In Matthew and Luke we have the beautiful story of his childhood. The poetic and miraculous decorations which are used do not interfere with the deeper and essential facts for which they furnish the mythical adornment. We could ill spare these fervent poetic rhapsodies. The same writers, wishing to set Jesus in a historic human line of ancestors, traces his genealogy back to Abraham and to Adam. Since Adam is declared to be the "son of God," the human is traced to its divine source not only in Jesus, but in the presumed father of the race. In Adam and in all his posterity this divine heritage is revealed; and the truth of the miraculous story in Luke is that the Holy Spirit may be manifested again and again, with new glory and power, in the incarnation of a divinely human child.

THE CHRISTIAN REGISTER FOR 1895.

The Christian Register is not a journalistic experiment: it has lived for seventy-four years. In that time it has established a certain character and position. It has stood in the vanguard of religious thought. It has represented a free method of inquiry. It has sought to follow the apostolic injunction,—to prove all things and hold fast to that which is good. In its columns the progressive religious thought, sentiment, faith, and ideals of American Unitarianism have found free expression; and this paper has been one instrument in effecting the development and propagation of the ideas, methods, and principles it has expressed. Literature, art, music, philosophy, ethics, theology, philanthropy, domestic economy, have all found a place in its weekly ministrations.

In all this various service, the Christian Register has aimed pre-eminently to be a religious journal. The breadth it has given to the interpretation of that word does not impair the emphasis it places upon it. It will continue to fulfil the same office and pursue the same purpose. It will be broadly humanitarian, as it has been in the past. It will continue to pay special attention to applied Christianity in every department of sociological and philanthropic interest. Its pages will not be devoid of instruction and entertainment. It will minister to the nursery as well as to the library. But it will not forget its special mission as the flag-bearer of a movement of religious forces in America which is becoming more closely united, more effectively organized for work.

The place filled by the Christian Register is not filled by any other journal. American Unitarianism has entered upon a new epoch in its existence. Let not the new era of peace be an era of stagnation. We ask the co-operation of our readers, first to make the Register all that it should be, and then to give it the widest circulation.

THE NEW YEAR.

THE opening of a new year, for one reason or another, has been an impressive occasion to all nations far enough advanced to have a measure of time corresponding to the earth's revolution about the sun. Generally, this has been a season for great rejoicing and for the giving of many presents. The Hebrew people mark the first day of the year by much blowing of horns. The Chinese are said to have a very good custom of preparing for its arrival by paying up all their debts. The Persians exchange gifts of eggs, possibly a symbolic ceremony more innocent and less burdensome than the New Year customs of some Western races; for it appears that a Roman emperor once felt obliged to limit by imperial decree the value of presents that his subjects might bestow. The American people have not been led to great extremes in this particular method of celebrating the day, but their general tendency to overdo whatever they take an interest in is so evident that it is some comfort to read of other nations which have suffered from the same complaint.

As the descendants of the Puritans are sometimes led to wonder why the Pilgrims in the "Mayflower" might not have chanced to make a landfall farther to the south, and thus have directed attention and led the path of emigration to a more genial clime, so one is disposed to query whether the wise men who settled the calendar might not just as well have given us a beginning of the year that coincided with some real landmark on our journey round the sun. The vernal equinox, for example,—the time when in northern latitudes (where most civilized peoples dwell) the days and nights are of equal length,—would be a good point from which to reckon. With the dawn of spring to enliven our hearts, what zest would be added to our celebration of the opening year!

But the conservative may perhaps feel that, if even the calendar is not safe from attack, verily the world is going mad with reforming zeal; and it must be acknowledged that in one respect the present arrangement is to our advantage. The world is, on the whole, none too rich in festivals. We have our spring-time feast, as it is; and, though the time for beginning our new year is somewhat arbitrarily fixed, it provides us with another occasion to make good cheer at a season when on our part of the earth's surface nature gives to none but those who love the ice much to be thankful for. If we can wisely temper and arrange our holiday-making so as to carry it on from the closely preceding Christmas and prevent the New Year from being a mere anti-climax to what has gone before, doubtless the calendar is, for the present, an institution that may be allowed to stand.

One thing, however, should be insisted upon: it is a time to make what happiness we can. The world is wiser than any individual, and its customs have determined that this is properly a day to be spent in rejoicings. They who meet its advent with groans and tears are out of touch with the main stream of healthful human sentiment. To be sure, none of us are much in love with growing old; and to many there is a tinge of sadness in the reminder that another of the swift years has slipped away from us. But all the more, and for this very reason, should we turn our thoughts to life's brighter side.

The best preparation for old age, and for what is to come afterward, is a life well spent in loving and happy usefulness. Idle as is the attempt to drown the suggestions of anxiety and regret with any din of silly pleasures, yet there is a perfect antidote for melancholy in good and wholesome activities. Let the cup of life be full, and no one tastes the dregs that may be at the bottom.

Can we not feel that the past year has taught us its lessons,—that we see more of God's truth, know more of the way of peace and health, are able to do better work and to turn our energies to better account than when we stood on the threshold of the year that has closed? Doubtless, it has been a trying year, and will pass into history with an evil name for the hard times it has brought. But there are signs that the knowledge and capacity of the whole people have broadened under its discipline, and that, as a nation, we stand better able to cope with the problems that confront us. Surely, each one of us has learned much during this term of life's great school, and may go on with the consciousness of belonging henceforth to a higher class.

It is a good time to count up our treasures, at least those of the mind and heart; and, as for our sins, or our resolve now at last to turn over a new leaf, it should be so much the business of every day to get the better of our shortcomings that perhaps we are not great gainers by setting apart a special portion of the twelvemonth to attend to that matter. New Year resolutions are proverbially frail; and such an atmosphere of doubt hangs over any new departure of virtuous conduct at this time that it may be the adventurous pilgrim would be wiser to select another day for his proposed entrance upon untrodden paths.

But however that may be—and it is to be confessed that this view springs from some distrust of the habit of taking much notice of one's sins while anything "lovely and of good report" can be found to think about,—let our wish for a "Happy New Year" spring from hearts that have been gladdened by thoughts of the blessings that attend their way, and of the heavenly goodness that has made our lives so rich. So shall the wish be no mere perfunctory or complimentary greeting, but shall carry with it a real note of joy, to touch an answering chord in those to whom it is addressed.

THE NEW NEW TESTAMENT.

The New Testament is like a monument built of conglomerates, and inscribed all over with testimonials to the greatest fact of human history. We are learning to regard it as a body of early Christian literature of varying value, the product of honest and earnest minds, wonderfully elevated and illuminated, not without true spiritual prompting and guidance, yet also not without intellectual and moral limitations, and not without "the stain of their times." When the morning of Christianity dawned, there were clouds all around the sky. These clouds must have made the morning all the more picturesque, but we need not confound their shadows with the sunshine which they both obscured and glorified.

In the four Gospels and apostolic letters it is easy to find elements borrowed from Ezra's compilation of ancient records and traditions, from rabbinical commentaries, from apocalyptic writings of post-Maccabean times, from Zoroastrian mythology, and from Greek and Philonic philosophy. We are no longer free to treat these elements as materials for the construction of dogma, or as a part of the substance of faith; but they are rich illustrations of the development of religious thought, and, having passed into language and literature, they readily lend themselves to the service of religious expression.

The words that represent only fancy and dream-stuff have certain dramatic properties: they may serve as pigment and picture serve painter and poet, or as unmeaning sounds and syllables serve the musician. They may become vehicles of noble feeling and true thought, or may be used as the adopted and accepted names of facts. We do not give up such words as jovial, mercurial and saturnine because we have no faith in Jove, Mercury, and Saturn: we do not hesitate to use the creations of Homer, Dante, Shakspeare, and the other magicians, precisely as if they were historic characters.

Our means of expression would be sadly impoverished if we were to insist on the rejection of all this mass of disintegrated metaphor which is packed down in the dictionaries. In how many families have the phrases chance-coined by infant lips been caught up and adopted as household words, without detriment to good understanding or to domestic veracity, and with real enrichment to sentiment as well as to vocabulary! And who does not dread to converse with a man whose lack of sympathetic imagination compels him to challenge every expression which cannot be taken in a hard and literal sense,—the blockhead! The speaker or writer whose mind moves freely in the world of thought should be equally free in the much narrower world of words. But, if human thinking is a mixed product, human language is more fallible still.

It is possible that Paul, Peter, John, and the others expounded the new faith in terms which cannot always be exactly interpreted nor vindicated; that they dressed up the gospel in the literary costume then in vogue; that they entertained some erroneous conceptions of their Master, of world history, and of the divine government. All this may be frankly admitted without in the least impeaching or impairing their testimony to great underlying facts and forces.

This testimony found its real warrant, not in their scholarship, but in their personal experience. Herein is stored up its permanent and commanding excellence. A profound regenerating influence had passed upon those early believers in Jesus. They were conscious of being illuminated, uplifted, and transformed by their faith in the divine humanity which they shared. Of historic events they could only speak on the authority of tradition. Of philosophic or theologic matters they could only speak according to their education. But of their own experience they could speak with exulting confidence. Their explanations and theories have a less certain basis.

This distinction has been growing clearer in the light of recent studies. Apostolic conceptions of the person and rank of Jesus, of his Messianic office, and of the measure of his wisdom and power, seem to have taken form and color, at least in part, from rabbinical imaginings and from current philosophic notions; and their value is qualified accordingly. Besides, as we have already seen, they were obliged to express themselves in the inadequate dialect of their time. Let us also have the modesty to add that their meaning may often be deeper and truer than our understanding, and that our differing experience may not always serve as a key to theirs.

The higher criticism itself need not assume to be infallible: it is enough that it helps us to a clearer vision and a better method; that it gives us leave to exalt the spirit above the letter; and especially that it brings the history of religion into harmony with what little we know of evolution itself,—that is, into harmony with the divine processes by which what was has become what is. It is death alike to the rude and crude Ingersollism which tramples tares and wheat together into the mire, and to the obscurantism which insists that the tares must be treated as equally sacred with the wheat, merely because they are found growing together.

UNITARIANISM OR CALVINISM, WHICH?

Rev. James De Normandie of Roxbury Sunday before last delivered a sermon in Parker Memorial Hall, Boston, in which he spoke of the Christian doctrine of salvation and of Jesus as a savior. The reporter who undertook to give an abstract of his speech must have become a little bewildered as to the theological points of the compass, for he made Mr. De Normandie speak as follows:—

Now what are the conditions of salvation? Mankind, having fallen from a state of innocence or grace, deserves only God's wrath and everlasting punishment. Stern justice demands it. God, seated upon his throne, admits the claim. Jesus Christ promises to bear the punishment of mankind, and is brought to the cross and crucified for the redemption of humanity.

The only assurance of salvation which a believer in the Christian religion can have rests upon God's sovereign purpose, whereby he has predestinated some men, women, and children to eternal life and others to eternal death.

Mr. De Normandie's friends must have been surprised to see what seemed to be something like a somersault into Calvinism, and we have received a letter from a lady asking us if this report "represents the generally accepted belief of Unitarianism." We should say it did not, and that it does not represent the generally accepted belief of Mr. De Normandie, either. But, as a statement of the theology he repudiates, it is pretty good.

The Boston Herald, in an editorial paragraph, has corrected what it calls "an annoying error." It says:—

"A strange error appears in the report of Rev. Dr. De Normandie's sermon, preached in Parker Memorial Hall on Sunday last, which appeared in the Herald, by which Dr. De Normandie is made to give sanction to the theology of Jonathan Edwards. This is so unreasonable on its face as to hardly do that clergyman a serious injustice, for no intelligent person could for a moment believe it of him. What he said was, of course, exactly the reverse of what he is reported as saying. The mistake was made in condensing the report. As the effect of this process, the theology which it was intended to repudiate is stated; but there was an unfortunate omission to add Dr. De Normandie's repudiation of its positions. The mistake would be amusing, were it not for the feeling of mortification it causes those who made it."

EDUCATING BY IDEALS.

A professor in one of the New England colleges, in addressing a large audience a short time since, said: "I have learned, as a teacher, that the thing which does most to educate is an ideal. . . . My work is to teach history,—American history; and, in my efforts to do that, the thing I chiefly care for is not that the young men who come under my charge shall know when battles occurred and why certain movements took place, but that, when the work is done, they shall go forth into the world better citizens for having studied these things."

The man who takes this stand as an instructor shows that he himself is following a noble ideal,—an ideal vastly higher than that of the old teacher of history, whose one ambition was to have dates of battles and the length and order of the reigns of kings reeled off by rote, giving the best opportunity to the boy with the phenomenal memory, and leading others less gifted in that respect and with small weight of conscience to carefully transcribe all figures in the lessons to their cuffs or finger-nails. If the event to be remembered is not of enough importance to impress the date upon the brain by force of association, it is possible that the thing was of not so much import, after all. Young people should have it impressed upon them that it is not the brilliancy or popularity of the men connected with public events which make such men remembered. Brief popularity alone marks no one as an ideal man. Dr. E. E. Hale, in speaking recently to the students of Brown University, drew an illustration to teach this lesson by comparing the lasting influence of two such men as Tristram Burges and Francis Wayland. The former was a brilliant and powerful speaker from Rhode Island, now nearly forgotten, of whom his biographer says he was "eminently logical and terribly sarcastic." The other was a man whose influence widens and is more deeply felt as the years go by, because he followed close after his high ideals.

Another illustration might be drawn from a notable gathering of men who met in Boston last week in memory of Charles Sumner, and to express their recognition of the service to the world given by Edward L. Pierce in preparing the life of the senator. The meeting was representative of the old coworkers and friends of Mr. Sumner. Many of them spoke; and the burden of every speech was that, because Sumner "stood for the supremacy of the moral sentiments in government," he had secured a permanent place in the respect and affections of the people. He cherished exalted ideals, and followed them; and, therefore, twenty years after his death the halls of Boston echo with cheers at the mention of his name. It would have been an inspiration to good citizenship, could the boys and girls of the high schools in this city have heard the various speeches, and especially Senator Hoar's eulogy of twenty or thirty men who have left their impress on New England from the simple fact that, in the highest and best sense of the word, they were good citizens.

There is no better way of educating than by setting models worthy of imitation before the young. And never was there greater need than to-day for education in patriotism and in the highest civic ideals.

Musings.

I AM told that this day on which I am writing is the first of January, 1895. But I have no evidence of the fact. To me it seems precisely like the three hundred and sixty-sixth day of 1894. If it were not for astronomical reasons, I should be in favor of making a year thirty-six or forty-eight months long. It would greatly reduce old age. A man of eighty, with a year of forty-eight months, would not be over twenty; and this change, I am sure, would certainly suit some ladies of my acquaintance. I wonder whether Methuselah and the other patriarchs who attained to such a great age did not do it by juggling with the calendar. Possibly their year was only three months long. I have actually seen, in New England, spring, summer, and autumn all crowded into six months. The rest was all winter. Jupiter, I find by consulting my encyclopædia, has a year nearly equal to twelve of our years in extent. So that, if one could choose to be a Presidential candidate, he would better try Jupiter rather than Mercury, whose year is only eighty-seven days long, if he wanted a long tenure of office. The salary might have some bearing on the question. Fifty thousand a year in Jupiter would be small pay compared with fifty thousand a year in Mercury. But, on the whole, I assume it is just as well to be reconciled to the length and shape of the earth's orbit, since it is not easy to get on to another planet; and we are by no means sure that we should better our condition if we could.

ONE reason why New Year's Day makes no impression on my mind is because I am living in Boston, with the sad consciousness that I have lost a holiday. No one born and brought up in New York City, with a heritage of Knickerbocker tradition, can come to New England without feeling a strange sense of deprivation on New Year's Day. As a child, there was compensation for the fact that Christmas was only twenty-four hours long in the fact that New Year's Day was soon to follow. The whole week was redolent of holiday. In those early youthful years there seemed something almost supernatural in the transition from the old year to the new, as if there were really some seam between the years, and as if the clock might jolt a little as it passed over the divide. I well remember the intense curiosity with which, for the first time in my life, I watched with almost breathless interest the clock approach the hour of twelve on the last night of the year. But there was not a click or a tremor to show that the clock had the slightest emotion on the subject: it struck out twelve with apparent indifference to the terrible significance that with the last stroke it had killed a year. Then there was the joy of the morning greeting, the jocund "Happy New Year!" There was usually a boy's excuse for going to the baker's that morning, and getting a New Year's cake along with the purchase. Then came the round of calls,—the happiest and most wholesome, and at the same time the unhappiest and most unwholesome, feature of the day. It was a jovial old custom, which needed frosty air and the jingle of sleigh-bells and bright sunshine for its elements of cheer. And, if these had been the only elements of cheer, the day would have been wholesome enough. But the tons of heavy cake and the hogsheads of hot stuff and liquor that were transferred to human stomachs made the day full of moral and physical peril. Many a young man took the first step on the round of dissipation on New Year's Day. The "Happy New Year" of the morning gave place to drunken revelry in the evening; and, though the shops and factories were open the next day, the number of workers was visibly less. It was a riotous way for many to begin the new year; and, though the Methodist watch-meeting furnished an opportunity for the religious to begin the day with holy vows, I suspect that there was more desecration than consecration during the day, and that morally it would have been better for many if the year began on the second day instead of on the first.

WHILE in Washington, I was induced by a companion—a member of a Baptist church in good and regular standing—to go with him to the theatre. I do not often go to the theatre: first, because I do not often have a free ticket; and, second, because I find human life itself more dramatic and interesting than any representations of it. But, when a Baptist Sunday-school teacher invites me, I generally say, "Yes." I do not like to throw cold water upon his hospitality. The play we saw was Howard Bronson's "Shenandoah." It is a remarkably well-written play. It was written not to be read, but to be acted, and is full of all those dramatic incidents and striking situations which keep the attention and interest of an audience perpetually alive. It is a story of the war, and the representations of battle and of military movements are more realistic than I supposed they could be on the stage. There were two or three strands of love woven into the picture, and they were all handled skilfully; and the author was as generous in the treatment of his foes as one could ask. Southern chivalry was shown at its best. The scoundrel of the play was a Northern renegade. But I suspect a great many of my readers have seen the play, and I need not describe it in detail. But what struck me as curious was that, though the drama extended over all the years of the Civil War, there was not a Negro in the play from beginning to end; and no one could have told from the text that the Negroes had had anything to do with the war! What made it more curious was that the last scene was laid in Washington, where I saw the piece; but all the servants in the house were white, and the fun of the play was produced by an Irish sergeant and an Irish servant girl! You will hunt far and wide in Washington—especially among families of Southern birth, like those figuring in the play—before you will find an Irish servant girl. Colored servants have been invariably the rule, and this feature was decidedly an anachronism. There is no lack of pathos and humor in Mr. Bronson's admirable production, but I have wondered how he could have resisted the temptation to bring the Negro in somewhere in a play from which he could not historically be left out.

Brevities.

What we all need to take this year: the elevated road.

Do not fail to read Dr. Martineau's beautiful New Year's sermon.

A text for Unitarians this year: "Say unto the children of Israel that they go forward."

Mr. Sprague's address on "Liberalism" shows how a layman can go to the heart of the matter.

By an oversight the name of the author of the story entitled "Some New-fashioned Christmas Presents," in our issue of December 20, was omitted. It should have been credited to Miss Carrie A. Parker of Sioux Falls, So. Dak.

In the Methodist Recorder Rev. J. H. Lucas arraigns "the stage-coach Christian," and says that "what the world needs to-day is lightning-express Christianity." The stage-coach Christian, he says, lacks speed, and capacity, and runs into ruts.

The Lexow Committee seems to have been courageous until it got to the superintendent of police, when its courage suddenly deserted it. However, Superintendent Byrnes has tendered his resignation; and, as he has become very rich while in this office, he can retire, and live on his income.

The Presbyterian truly says: "It is only one side of the truth to affirm that we educate our children: we should round it out by adding that they also educate us. Parents and children touch each other at all points, and can learn much from one another by mutual contact and practical experience. Happy the home where each and all gather up the lessons daily inculcated, and use them for each other's benefit!"

Editors must be careful how they use the word "forge." The Congregationalist means to be complimentary when it says that "Dr. Burrill forged a number of epigrammatic sentences in the course of his brilliant address at the Boston Congregational Club." Dr. Burrill may resent the accusation; but, if told that it is meant that his epigrams were scintillating sparks of eloquence struck out on the anvil of the occasion, he may be placated.

No one in this country is better qualified to treat the subject of crime and criminals than Frederick H. Wines, LL.D., who is now giving a course of eight lectures on "Crime and Criminals" on Monday and Thursday evenings before the Lowell Institute in Huntington Hall, Boston. Mr. Wines's lectures cover the whole subject of the evolution and relations of crime, the history of the subject of punishment, and of efforts of reformation as well as measures of prevention. Three lectures have been given. The remaining five will be of much interest and importance.

A correspondent of the New York Weekly Witness asks, "Is the use of tobacco sufficient to condemn us when we stand before the throne of God?" We should say to this inquirer that, from our reading of Scripture, we have not learned of any person going to heaven who used tobacco; but we read in Revelation that there arose a "smoke out of the bottomless pit," and "the smoke of their torment [or should it be the torment of their smoke?] ascendeth up forever and ever." This inquirer may govern himself accordingly. For ourselves, we propose to be on the safe side.

Just see how one cruelty begets another. The Japanese consul-general in this country, apologizing for the inhumanity of the soldiers at Port Arthur, says: "Your lynchings in the South are familiar to the Japanese; and all the world remembers the burning of one person at the stake at Paris, Tex. There were five thousand men who witnessed and approved it,—one-fifth as many people as were in our army of invasion. They were citizens: ours were soldiers, and dealing with people who had mutilated the bodies of their fellow-soldiers." This only shows that Japan must be careful how she follows the example of this country.

The Congregationalist, in a notice of Dr. George E. Ellis, says: "As an historian, he was thorough while he was enthusiastic, and at the same time eminently fair in his judgment. His 'Half-century of the Unitarian Controversy' is the most candid and reliable discussion of that period of excited feeling and keen dispute. Dr. Ellis always held the respect and esteem of those who differed from his religious views. Dr. H. M. Dexter, for nearly forty years editor of this paper, and one of the ablest writers in our denomination on subjects of controversy with Unitarians, was his warm friend and admirer."

The admirable address of Rev. Augustus Woodbury, D.D., on "The True Basis of Readjustment," delivered before the Association of the Alumni of the Harvard Divinity School June last, has been printed in pamphlet form; and a few copies have been placed on sale at the Unitarian Building at 25 Beacon Street. Dr. Woodbury's address is not a reminiscence or revival of buried controversy, but a thoughtful, logical consideration of problems of thought and sociology which belong to our own time, and which are of living practical importance. Dr. Woodbury summons us to new occasions and new duties, and his solution is the only one that will solve a problem which we believe with him is not insoluble.

Pro and Con.

ATHANASIUS AND ARIUS.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

I do not remember saying, as reported, that "we are all Athanasians." But Athanasius, I think, was nearer than Arius to the truth. Yet no single or triple personality can express the omnipresent and omnipersonal One,—that infinite Self in which all our selves begin and end, and whose garment is the world. We idolize if we personify the Being apart from the offspring and the work. Athanasianism was a step forward: Unity, not Trinity, is the goal.

AN IMPOSTOR.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

Several letters have been written to me from our Boston churches, making inquiry about a man who has asked aid, claiming to be a member of my congregation. He has been given money in several instances. He gives a different name each time. This man is an impostor, and I take this method of warning our churches not to aid him.

GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

In the interesting Life recently published by Houghton there occurs, at p. 334 the following extraordinary statement:—

"Mr. Curtis was in his religious sentiments what, for lack of a more definite term, is called a Unitarian. For many years it was his habit, when the Unitarian church on Staten Island was without a pastor, to read of a Sunday, from the pulpit, a sermon to the congregation. He was the vice-president of the National Unitarian Association; and he not infrequently spoke on questions involving the religious duty of the citizen, in the church of his friend, Rev. John W. Chadwick of Brooklyn. It is needless to say that he was not a sectarian, and that there was no taint in his mind of that narrowness and bigotry* which are the peril of a belief rejecting much of what is most generally accepted."

There is a certain fitness in saying that the name of a religion does not convey one's whole religious faith, just as the name George Curtis, while limiting and defining the personality, did not embody the whole man. But the issues involved here are much deeper and graver.

It would readily appear to most biographers that, in the case of a sincere and earnest person like Curtis, his religious belief was an essential part of him, not to be laid on or off, whether narrow or wide.

Nearly every page of the book reveals a high moral purpose in the man, deep religious conviction faithfully lived out. He sacrificed and testified—as the citation shows—to his Unitarian faith. If such conviction, such life, such manly doing, was not a part of the Unitarian idea and of a positive faith, where did it come from?

To picture this noble man as trembling

on the verge of narrowness and bigotry is exquisitely absurd. The matter would hardly be worthy of notice, were it not a fair sample of much supercilious ignorance, which attempts to belittle the great Unitarian faith by calling it a system of negations. OBSERVER.

SPIRITUALISM: A REPLY.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

In the editorial in the Register of November 29 on "The Duty of Spiritualists" much—in fact, too much—emphasis was placed upon "fraudulent" spiritual manifestations, or, rather, too much emphasis was placed upon all spiritual phenomena as fraudulent, especially those received through professional mediums. The strong point in the article, and one which Unitarians, Spiritualists, and all earnest, true students of the occult receive, is the appeal to accept only the genuine in all that comes from the spirit world through the media. That the phenomena exist is granted, but the degree of the genuine is to be established; and the manner of establishing evidence as proposed by the editor is the one that every true Spiritualist has used. He has applied test conditions, and received all that he had hoped for and more than he had anticipated. That a percentage has deceived itself maybe is true, and that another percentage has been deceived by alleged mediums is also true. That, however, has naught to do, here nor there, with the facts of spiritual phenomena. The danger of credulity and gullibility exists, and few there are who are not susceptible to some form or phase of them; but that does not destroy the facts of spiritual phenomena. Let us be careful in all investigations of any line of truth, for that is our duty; but that carefulness or scrutiny will not destroy either the conditions for receiving nor the facts of spiritual phenomena.

First, let it be said, in reply to the editor, that he is very much at sea or misinformed, or he has been very much deceived himself, when he says that materialization is a fraud. I have attended over thirty séances for materialization, most of them under strictly scientific and test conditions; and I make bold to deny that I was deceived, since there was no possibility for being deceived. At these séances there were genuine materializations of incarnate spirits. I have had over two hundred slate writings with the best mediums in the world; gotten paintings in oil between slates held in my own hands and under test conditions; gotten the writing on the rostrum when the slates were brought, washed, and hung on a string from the ceiling by a sceptic; gotten it on slates hung from chandelier, above and under the table, anywhere and everywhere, in Greek, Hebrew, Egyptian, Chinese script, and when neither the medium nor myself could read a word of it (at a later time I had to have it read for me or I had to dig it out as best I could from my past knowledge of the dead languages); gotten it at night between slates in my own bedroom. And are all these manifestations of the spirit to be set aside as fraudulent? Would I so deceive myself as to write the message in a script altogether different from mine own, draw a beautiful face that I could not do when awake, or sign the name Elizabeth Barrett Browning to the message? I know that Spiritualism is true; that its phenomena are genuine; that the spirit, in and out of the body, has power over matter, and can manifest through and in matter.

That many Spiritualists care more for the phenomena is true; but are there not many of our denomination who are still bound to materiality? Who should throw the stone? Still, what is to be done but to elevate the world, whatever may be our creed or faith, by our spirituality, then by our love, life, and charity? The spirit is ready and willing to manifest to any seeker after truth: it only asks you to give it the necessary means and conditions. If you say, Let the dear ones now gone from your midst come to you, then you will believe, very well. Make the conditions in your own home, and patiently await results. As Jesus said, "To him who asketh, receiveth; who knocketh, it shall be opened unto him; who seeketh, he shall find." Neither God nor spirit is a respecter of persons. Choose, then, between materialism and Spiritualism; but drop all hypercriticism, egotism, caste, self-love, and self-righteousness.

UNATTAINED.

BY LISA A. FLETCHER.

The hills that seem the dearest
Lie far away,
The songs whose notes ring clearest
Are not to-day.

The blossoms that are fairest
Hide from our sight,
The beauty which is rarest
Seeks not the light.

The bird of sweetest singing
Is hid and shy,
The bugle-call is ringing
But far and high.

The joy with promise surest
May yet be chilled,
The wish which seemeth purest
Be not fulfilled,

Ideals most we cherish
Be unattained,
Hopes that are fondest perish
Ere they are gained.

Yet if the pure ideal
We seek afar
Be ne'er to us the real,
Only a star,

Still he who aye pursueth
The noblest, best,
The far peaks nearest vieweth
Of his high quest!

A DELIGHTFUL POET.

BY REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.

My poet's name is John B. Tabb. I have never seen him face to face; but, none the less, he is my friend. And the way of it I might put in Browning's words, varying them a little here and there to suit my purpose, thus:—

"I have a friend over the sea.
I like him, and he likes me.
It all grows out of the verse he writes."

The Brownings will recognize my variations, and the other kind will look the poem up. But the sea which divides me from my friend is only a slight theological difference,—that between a Roman Catholic and a Unitarian; and, as they say that there is no middle ground between Unitarians and Roman Catholics, they must be very near together. Though I have not met my friend in the flesh, I cherish many of his letters; and I have his photograph, on the back of which he has written, in such a hand as only the finest spirits use, this very characteristic little poem:—

My Sister Sunshine smiled on me,
And of my visage wrought a shade.
"Behold," she cried, "the mystery Of which thou art afraid!"

"For Death is but a tenderness,
A shadow, that unclouded Love
Hath fashioned in its own excess
Of radiance from above."

The little book (Copeland & Day, Boston) in which this poem now appears (p. 30) is very secular in its appearance, very notional and eccentric, and not successfully or agreeably so, to my thinking, with every poem contracted at the top of the page. So many of the poems are quatrains, or but little longer, that the suggestion of a birthday book inviting autographs is inescapable. But this whimsical peculiarity must not prejudice the vagrant reader against the substance of the book, and encourage him to think that he can safely pass by on the other side. Here is no wounded traveller requiring his oil and wine, but a Good Samaritan, who can help him in his necessity,—especially if he is starving for a little fancy of an exquisite purity and daintiness. He will find that some of the quatrains fill the page much better than sometimes the poems of quite famous poets which crowd its length and breadth. Just as a little picture sometimes needs a whole wall space to itself, so is it here. Only we would have given the poems space to spare in all directions upon the generous page rather than such prodigality at the bottom and such penury at the top.

However secular the appearance of the little book,—it has a cover of unique design,—attractive, too,—the picture of my friend's face is not such, nor the habit of his life. It is evidently the face of a priest; and he is Father Tabb, a professor devoted to his work in St. Charles College, Maryland. He dedicates his book to Sidney Lanier, with this "Ave":—

Ere Time's horizon-line was set,
Somewhere in space our spirits met,
Then o'er the starry parapet
Came wandering here.

And now that thou art gone again
Beyond the verge,
I haste amain
(Lost echo of a loftier strain)
To greet thee there.

And hereby hangs another tale, which is that our poet was not only a friend of Lanier, but his companion-in-arms, and shared with him the hospitality of a Northern prison in the time of the Great Rebellion. There are two other poems to Lanier, one of them "the trumpet of a prophecy," of more courageous sound than has been justified by the event. It heralded a forthcoming volume of Lanier's poems:—

Snow! Snow! Snow!
Do thy worst, Winter; but know, but know That, when the spring cometh, a blossom shall blow
From the heart of the poet that sleeps below.
And his name to the ends of the earth shall go,
In spite of the snow.

These poems are remarkable for their individuality. Sometimes, in the bravery of their conceits, they make us think of Emily Dickinson; but always here the fancy, however hyperbolic, describes its curve within the limits of a perfect form. Of quaintness there is much,—surprising turns of thought and illustration, a playing upon words and upon ideas that is most ingenious. Everywhere here nature is sacramental: it exists to symbolize some spiritual thing; and a doubt occurs whether Father Tabb is a close observer of natural things, except in that sphere—the meteorological—in which Shelley was pre-eminently at home. And in this connection it is noticeable that Shelley is a favorite with our poet, and is honored by him with a poem which is, perhaps, as good an example as any of the intricate ingenuity with which he works: as if he were one of those artists of Japan who work in ivory, making charms that stir up kings and connoisseurs to rivalry:—

At Shelley's birth
The Lark, dawn-spirit, with an anthem loud
Rose from the dusky earth
To tell it to the Cloud,
That, like a flower night-folded in the gloom,
Burst into morning bloom.

At Shelley's death
The Sea, that deemed him an immortal, saw
A god's extinguished breath,
And landward, as in awe,
Uphore him to the altar whence he came,
And the rekindling flame.

Of poems innocently paltering in a double sense the two upon Father Damien are notable examples:—

FATHER DAMIEN.

O God! The cleanest offering
Of tainted earth below,
Unblushing to thy feet we bring,
"A leper white as snow."

THE SNOWDROP.

A nun of Winter's Sisterhood,
A snowdrop in the garden stood Alone amid the solitude
That round her lay.

No sister blossom near was seen,
No memory of what had been,
No promise of returning green
Or scented spray.

But she alone was bold to bear
The banner of the spring, and dare,
In Winter's stern despite, declare
A gentler sway.

So didst thou, Damien, when the glow
Of faith and hope was waning low,
For souls bewintered, dare the snow,
And lead the way.

Many of these poems linger in a dim half-light. They haunt the moments between night and morning, sleep and waking, life and death, with a curiosity that is more pleased in being baffled than in learning all. Take, for example, "A Winter Twilight"; and at the same time let it witness to the fact that a delightful and ingenious fancy does not exhaust our poet's gift: it has its reserves of strong imagination, which finds its best expression in the sonnets which are, with two or three exceptions, the longest poems in the book:—

Blood-shotten, through the bleak, gigantic trees,
The sunset, o'er a wilderness of snow,
Startles the wolfish winds that wilder grow
As hunger mocks their howling miseries.
In every skulking shadow Fancy sees
The menace of an undiscovered foe,—
A sullen footstep, treacherous and slow,
That comes, or into deeper darkness flees.

Nor Day nor Night, in Time's eternal round, Whereof the tides are telling, e'er hath passed
This Isthmus-hour,—this dim, mysterious land
That sets these lives asunder,—where up-cast
Their earliest and their latest waves resound,
As each, alternate, nears or leaves the strand.

Another poem of strong imagination is that in which the Indian of San Salvador sees as in a vision the three ships of Columbus, and also what their coming means for his dusky race. There is more real poetry in this than in all the other poems of the Columbian year that we have seen so far. Insomnia has had many poets, but few have touched the height of my friend's on that subject. One called "Homeless" breathes the sweet pity of a soul for its deserted tenement. There are several poems that imply the special religious point of view of the author; but let the reader sympathetically adjust himself to that, and he will find them among the loveliest in the book. But here is one, "To the Christ," that has no sectarian implication:—

Thou hast on earth a Trinity,— Thyself, my fellow-man, and me.
When one with him, then one with Thee;
Nor, save together, Thine are we.

And here is a wee bit of a Christmas poem the dubious theology of which is condoned to a very great extent by the daring homeliness of the idea. It is called "Out of Bounds":—

A little Boy of heavenly birth,
But far from home to-day,
Comes down to find His ball, the earth,
That Sin has cast away.
O comrades, let us one and all
Join in to get him back his ball!

I could make this anthology of Father Tabb's poems much longer without taking one imperfect flower, but I wish to leave the reader to discover for himself that I have left as good as I have plucked. Therefore, commending to all mothers the cradle song (p. 106), I will take "A Bunch of Roses" for the last, along with which, in my privately illustrated copy, is a picture of Saint Anthony of Padua with a baby in his arms:—

The rosy mouth and rosy toe
Of little baby brother
Until about a month ago
Had never met each other;
But nowadays the neighbors sweet,
In every sort of weather,
Half-way with rosy fingers meet
To kiss and play together.

GIANT SHELLS.

BY CHARLES FREDERICK HOLDER.

If divers, with the modern equipment, had existed in some of the early geological eras, they would, in their wandering at the bottom of the sea, have seen some remarkable sights. There was a time when everything seemed to attain gigantic size. There were sea serpents as long and longer than the whales of to-day; sharks one hundred feet long; crablike creatures as long as a man, as the wonderful pterygotus; and, more remarkable than all, the shells that to-day are, as a rule, small and delicate, and used, in the main, as ornaments and curiosities, that in some instances attained gigantic proportions.

Such a diver, in walking along at the sea-bottom, would have seen suddenly looming up before him in the distance an object like a gigantic telescope, yet poised in mid-water. At one end projected long arms, that waved to and fro or resembled the pliable spokes of a wheel without a tire. Suddenly this cigar-shaped object would shoot ahead with the velocity of an arrow, cleaving the water like a knife and leaving a train of phosphorescent light behind like the tail of a comet.

This strange creature was possibly twenty feet or more in length, and, according to Dr. Newberry, the eminent geologist, must have weighed several tons. It was the giant of all shells, the Orthoceras titan,—truly a Titanic monster. The Orthoceras are all extinct, but are represented to-day by their cousins, the cuttlefish, the nautilus, and others. Another of this family, the Ammonite, somewhat resembled the pearly nautilus of the present, and was divided off by pearly partitions, as was this shell; but the ancient representative was a veritable monster.

Some years ago some workmen in the Middle States came upon a number of these shells buried in an ancient beach. The discoverers thought they were cart-wheels; and a local paper facetiously announced the discovery of a fossil chariot-wheel, spokes, and all. The great shell was as high as some of the boys who stood by, being four feet and a half in height, and resembling a rude wheel. In an attempt to discover the nature of the find it was cut in two with a stone saw, thus exposing the partitions, which were filled with earth.

The exposed surface was then polished, and presented a beautiful appearance. Quartz crystals had formed in the various chambers, giving the entire shell, or its polished surface, the appearance of a huge carnelian. One of these stone shells weighed several hundred pounds, and, when alive, must have been a singular object.

In our own time there are gigantic shells, their presence sometimes being disagreeably forced upon the finder. In the South Pacific, where the ocean is apparently cut up with small islands or reefs of coral, the Tridacna, or king of the clams, is found,—a gigantic two-valved shell, with deep radiations or convolutions, that often weighs five hundred pounds, the animal alone weighing thirty pounds.

These monsters are found imbedded in the coral rock, a singular frill of lightly colored flesh only appearing above the surface. This habit has been the cause of a number of accidents to natives as well as white men. The locality where they are found is frequented by collectors of marine curiosities, who send the shells, sea-fans, and corals to America and Europe, where they are distributed to the curiosity dealers all over the world.

In searching for shells, the collectors wade along the shallow lagoons or reefs, followed by a flat-bottomed boat, into which they toss their various finds.

On one occasion an inexperienced man was hunting for shells without a boat, having merely a native net thrown over his shoulders. Seeing what he thought was a large sea-anemone of beautiful tints, he struck it with his foot, and in an instant was thrown upon his face, screaming with agony. The seeming anemone was a giant shell that, startled at the sudden attack, had closed its huge valves, and held the collector a prisoner as firmly as though he had been clasped by a vise. In fact, the shells cut through skin and bone.

The unfortunate man was some distance from help; and, as he had started at low tide, the treacherous waters were rising. For an hour the victim underwent untold agonies of pain and apprehension, fearing that the tide would rise above his lips. Struggles were useless; and he heroically waited until a canoe came in sight, when he signalled the occupants, who, after much difficulty, released him, the animal having to be killed by severing the great muscles that held the shells together.

A number of such instances are on record, and large sharks have been caught by the shells in the same way. Some natives at the New Hebrides Islands, seeing an unusual commotion some distance from shore, went out, and found a ten-foot shark beating the water, hurling itself this way and that, as though held by some enemy. Approaching, they found that the big fish was held firmly by the tail, the lobe of which had touched the fleshy portion of the shell, and been caught.

To excavate one of these giants often requires the work of several men for a week, as the shell at times is deeply encased in the solid coral rock, which has to be cut away. One animal taken was served as a dinner to the crews of two vessels, affording a meal to fifty men. One species of these shells is very common, and is used as an ornament; while others serve as receptacles for holy water in churches and cathedrals.

A fine specimen may be seen in the Cathedral of Notre Dame in Montreal, and another in the Church of St. Sulpice in Paris. The natives employ them as water vessels; and a circular piece of the white shell, highly polished and worn upon the forehead, is considered an insignia of rank.

Among the largest bivalve shells known is the geoduck, a huge clam of the Alaskan coast, that attains a weight of five or six pounds, one shell affording food for a large family.

The conchs, especially those known as queen and trumpet conchs, are among the giants of the univalve shells, weighing in the latter instance sometimes twelve pounds,—ponderous objects, as they move along on the sandy bottoms of the lagoons of their choice.

The method of locomotion among these large conchs is singular, particularly when observed from above. The shell reaches out its foot,—which is armed, in the case of the common strombus, with a sharp-pointed, sabrelike operculum,—thrusts it into the sand, and gives a powerful wrench, which forces the shell along in a series of jerks. The real giants of the mollusca are few, and are confined mainly to those described.

POETRY AND PATRIOTISM.

BY EMMA ENDICOTT MAREAN.

The relation that poetry and music bear to patriotism is a natural one of action and reaction. The love of country, the quick thrill of response that stirs in the heart at the call of the fatherland, finds as ready and natural expression in these forms as does the passion of the lover or the aspiration of him who desires to live in the spirit. On the other hand, appreciation of one's own country, honor for its traditions, and fidelity to its ideals, are immeasurably strengthened by the poet's words or the recurrent strains of a national hymn. The soldier marches better and fights better, not only for the life and the trumpet, but also because of remembered words that remind him how dear and worthy is the cause, calling for brotherhood and courage. No one who remembers anything of the immense mass of popular patriotic poetry that was one accompaniment and result of our Civil War can fail to see the value it had in keeping aglow the very sentiments that inspired it, and which it reflected with more or less adequacy. It is true that very little of it had permanent value, falling in this respect below the patriotic poetry of similar struggles in other countries; but it is also true that no one reading to-day those songs, and calmly judging them by literary standards, especially when separated from the music on which their vitality chiefly depended, can realize all that they meant in the times that produced them. That illiterate rhymers were moved to metrical expression as well as men and women of education and definite literary purpose only proves the need felt in all hearts for this kind of utterance, which is at once both outlet and stimulus. It may well be that the thought of John Brown, rudely clothed in inharmonious words as it was, yet stirred as many hearts as did ever "Maryland, my Maryland," though the one is almost meaningless, judged apart from the times which produced it and from the melody that carried it; and the other is good literature besides. In considering the place of patriotic poetry, this office of inspiration in time of desperate need is first and most obvious. The poems or songs struck out at white heat, glowing with the ardor of patriotic devotion, have nerved many a soldier's heart in time of battle or in the night-watch or the suffering of the hospital; and they have strengthened, too, many a mother or sweetheart in the equally hard duty of waiting courageously at home alone. There were many of these on either side the dividing line that fulfilled this office; but few of them retain their old power, except possibly over those to whom they remain as part of that entire experience. Mrs. Howe's "Battle Hymn" is a magnificent exception. It may not have supplanted the words of "John Brown's Body" with the soldiers on their marches; but, beating as it did in time with the very heart-throb of the nation, it gained that place which it has held ever since, touching the younger generations, to whom war is unknown, with the same thrill of half-mystic exaltation that we knew thirty years ago. Noble tribute it is to the power of this air and this measure that poets have continued to write patriotic lines to it even in days of peace; and for the sake of showing how its early association with John Brown has also associated it with the echoes and re-echoes of his deed done, read the beautiful "Decoration Day Hymn" of Mr. Gannett's, written in 1884:—

"One moment on the scaffold, and he left it holy ground.
Three hundred thousand heroes now lie guarding it around,
And reverent hearts are pilgrim still to many a sacred mound;
And the Right goes marching on.

"Then if perchance a nation's soul from out her shame shall rise,
And light of justice kindle fresh within her chastened eyes,
The God who dooms shall save her by the pain that purifies;
And the Right goes marching on."

Estimate for a moment, too, the tremendous influence of such a poem as Lowell's "The Present Crisis." Every stanza of those rushing, heart-piercing lines contains words that will ring forever, words that have served as the texts for many another leader of thought. One's breath quickens and the eyes moisten even to read it to one's self in a critical, unimpassioned moment.

Thus we come to the consideration of that class of poems, not songs, not hymns, but thoughtful, intellectual appeals to the feelings of patriotism that ought to be consciously present in every heart, but which, if they were there dormant, such words would surely awaken. They demand not only courage and devotion in a crisis, but well-ordered purpose that may become a principle of continued action. Highest among these we place, do we not, Lowell's "Commemoration Ode?" How that calls us, by the memory of all the past; by the sacrifices of those dear ones "dark to the triumph which they died to gain"; by the thought of freedom, "that high privilege that makes all men peers"; and by the glory of the future,—how it calls us to be simply and unalterably true to the present!

It seems to me that the wonderfully fine ode of George Woodberry is not nearly so well known as it should be; but, surely, every student of patriotic poetry cares for it, when once it is made his own. To quote here the words of another, to whom I would gladly give credit, did I know his name: "All that we hope our land may one day be, all that we sometimes lose faith in its ever being, speaks clarion-clear and sure in these passionate lines. To read them is to quicken every high impulse of loyalty." Remembering this ode, one remembers, too, the noble sonnet which breathes recognition of the truth that the utmost glory of a nation is found, not in war, but in peace. The traveller, musing on the Mediterranean, hearing the evening gun at Gibraltar, contrasts the sword of England, quickly drawn, with the sword of his own country, sheathed in honor, and says:—

"Two swords there are: one naked, apt to smite, Thy blade of war; and, battle-storied, one Rejoices in the sheath, and hides from light.
American I am. Would wars were done!
Now westward look: my country bids good-night,
Peace to the world from lands without a gun."

Yes, peace has its own struggles, its own victories; and it is well that the poets call us to recognize this, to face the common, every-day duties toward our country no less than to do and dare in the time of sudden trial. Both demand true patriotism. Both may be encouraged and rewarded by the poet's word and the musician's strains.

There is yet a third class of poems, not written expressly as utterances of patriotic feeling, and yet so alive with the very spirit of the country they represent that they can never lose their place in national affection. The words of "Highland Mary" and "The Land o' the Leal" stir the Scottish heart to loyal remembrance as truly as do the pipes that play "The Campbells are coming." The folk-songs of all countries retain much of the original characteristics of their birthplaces, and touch the heart with their simplicity and truth. It is not many years since the folk-songs came to be studied; but already we feel that through them we come very near the heart of the people, and understand something of their hold on those who have always known and loved them. By this study, as in many other ways, our regard for patriotic poetry broadens into a feeling of human brotherhood, which yet takes away nothing of our loyalty to our own country. Lowell wrote nobly:—

"For mankind are one in spirit; and an instinct bears along,
Round the earth's electric circle, the swift flash of right or wrong.
Whether conscious or unconscious, yet Humanity's vast frame
Through its ocean-sundered fibres feels the gush of joy or shame.
In the gain or loss of one race all the rest have equal claim."

And so it comes that we want no patriotism that forbids us to thrill with indignation at the wrongs of other countries. We want no allegiance that narrows our sympathies instead of broadening them, no love of home that does not bid us desire freedom and enlightenment for other homes also. America would not be America if it could not respond with sympathy and help to the call of an Armenia. It is more fitting that we to-day should be glad of our national freedom and unity because a short time ago in Faneuil Hall burning words were spoken for the country that has neither. Just because we can thrill with quick response to the words of our own poets, can we also appreciate the pathos and patriotism of one who writes:—

"If freedom unbounded were proffered to me,
I would choose still to share thy sublime slavery,
O my mother, Armenia.

Were I offered proud Europe, to take or refuse,
Thee alone, with thy griefs on thy head, I would choose,
For my country, Armenia.

"If a mantle of purple were given to me,
A mantle for kings, I would wrap it round thee,
Poor Armenia, my mother.

"If the fire of my youth and its sinews of steel
Could return, I would offer its rapture and zeal Ail to thee, my Armenia.

"Had a lifetime of ages been granted to me,
I had given it gladly and freely to thee,
O my life, my Armenia!

"Might I choose from the world where my dwelling should be,
I would say, Still thy ruins are Eden to me,
My beloved Armenia."

BY REV. WILLIAM R. ALGER.

We rise more by helping inferiors than by courting superiors. The pride that cares only for ostentatious things degrades its possessor: the humility that admiringly enjoys the commonest simplicities of existence is morally exalting. The lower our love creeps, the loftier our life climbs.

Whatever tasks or privileges may demand our attention, the first claim on us always is to see that we are ready to perceive our duty and earnest to discharge it.

Is life worth living? Not to those who live for nothing. Belief in pessimism is a punishment. It is but right that to those who live for worthless ends life itself shall seem worthless.

The supreme devotion of men to the accumulation of wealth, and to the enjoyments it purchases, begets in them a bestial contempt for everything truly noble. Whatever is ideally beautiful and commanding rebukes them: therefore, they instinctively hate it. Their dominant universal is the mindless mass of property. Each one cares more for himself than he does for the whole. The ethical principle, which is the essential bond of a nation, thus vanishing, the nation itself begins to rot and dissolve. Nothing save the consecration of its individual members to stainless intellectual and moral ends can insure the freedom, the happiness or the perpetuity of a State.

No acquirement of pieces of property can compensate us for the loss of peace of mind.

A good man, knowing that he is thought bad, is tempted to become bad. Let any man, who is not too base, know himself to be thought better than he is, and he will grow better.

The snail carries with him the house in which he lives. The body of man is only his instrument: the house in which he lives is the universe.

What we do in an hour may seem insignificant, but an hour can never be insignificant.

Many persons seem to hold that religious faith consists in abstinence from thinking and a refusal to reach intellectual clearness. But he who is religiously in earnest will not remain satisfied without realizing in definite ideas the contents and meaning of his faith.

Spirits are mutual vacua, perfectly penetrable with recognition, but perfectly exclusive of identification.

To assimilate the wisdom of others is becoming wiser ourselves.

One of the commonest errors of man is to take too much thought and too little care of himself.

Perfected religious experience culminates in perfected speculative insight. Then philosophy, becomes an individual thinker self-mediating as the unity of himself, nature, humanity, tradition and God.

The slave who fancies himself free because he has engraved the word "liberty" on his chains, not merely remains a slave but also proves himself to be a fool.

If it is a profane fact that small things make mean men proud, it is a divine counterpart that great things make noble men modest.

We should understand one another better if we compared ourselves with one another less and with universal standards more.

INTERIOR PERCEPTION OF IMMORTALITY.

In external reflection, as seen in outward nature, we have only phenomenal abstractions, nugatory evanescences, broken results disconnected from their cause. No permanent or free unity is manifest there. But it is startlingly different in the conscious inner world of spirit. There we experience the related presentation of a series of living mirrors, composing a whole whose reflections are the distinctions of its own substantial activity. And the modes of that activity form an intercirculating system without a breach in the continuity and identity of its self-diversifying freedom. He who has taken direct possession of this in rounded consciousness knows himself to be a free person dowered with immortality.

SELF-KNOWLEDGE.

Where one man achieves a complete acquaintance with himself, millions on millions live and die utterly destitute of such insight. A multitude are quite familiar with their own vices and with the superficial traits of other men, but remain wholly ignorant of the sublime virtues and the mysterious powers of realized human nature. The peerless maxim, "Know thyself," which is said to have descended from heaven, points to the acquisition of a self-consciousness so transparent that its seeing transcends the whole phenomenal universe. It is by self-knowledge that God eternally causes and enjoys his own perfection, and distributes it multiplied in repetitive images. Men are these images; and it is only through a perfecting self-knowledge, achieved by their own effort in co-operation with divine grace, that they are redeemed from the selfish and empty ignorance with which they begin. By learning to know themselves through and through, they also learn to know God, and thus to fulfil their destiny. Their destiny is to render actual at last the infinite goods which are but possible at first. The knowledge of any image involves the knowledge likewise of its original. In free spirit whatever is reflected is seen, and whatever is seen is repeated in the appropriating consciousness which converts it into its own experience. In this way the formal wants of the dependent and hungering selfhood are replenished with the substantial fruitions of God. And so the Creator, as fast as they are presented, redeems with the sterling coinage of his own blessedness the symbolic promises primarily deposited in the capabilities of the creature. Every genuine human want is a divine pledge redeemable the moment the bearer becomes aware of its significance and brings the claim to the treasury of the Absolute.

ORDER OR DUST-BINS?

BY ELIZABETH P. CHANNING.

Did you ever taste Jane Austen's Mr. Woodhouse's immortal bowl of gruel, "thin, but not too thin,"—the gruel he pressed upon his friends? upon the sick, I suppose, to make them well; on the well, to make them better.

This paper aims to be thin, but not too thin,—if possible, airy, floating with bright wings through aroused imagination, yet touching the finer chords that vibrate in the depths of the heart. That eloquent preacher, Dr. George Putnam, said a sermon should consist of successive waves of thought; that is, I presume, never be content with a level monotone of thought, however sound and worthy. So I hope to inspire without wearying.

A title is of great importance. Shall I call this paper "Order or Dust-bins"? Order is dignified: it is heaven's first law. Dust-bin is common, not to say untidy. Yet of dust we are, and to dust we shall return. The reconciliation of the dust of the body with the order of the soul makes the conflict of life, stirring in every one of us at each moment of passing experience. Some women make themselves and their households miserable by their ultra-neatness. A child is seldom more happy than when grubbing in the dust, not to say mud. A too neat mother is an ogress to her offspring. In the good old days of Boston (when our lives were not in danger), in the days of pantalettes, children trembled at the grassy streaks caused by rolling down the two banks on the Beacon Street Mall, and hid the ink-spots on their Holland aprons; and, while the costume of childhood has changed, the grubbing of the child and the neatness of the mother still conflict. Dear mothers, embrace the dust-bin rather than impair the harmony between you and your child!

The charm of a drive is greatly lessened to me by wayside rubbish. If I were mistress of my old-time agility, it seems as if I should be tempted to spring from the vehicle and, if allowed, do a little toward clearing up the loose boards, straw, rusty iron, and dock-leaves,—in fine, tidy up for once what is destined never to grow beautifully less. There are clearance sales. Is road clearance impossible? Magistrates appoint tree-planting days. Will they not see to it that not only dumping-grounds be cleared up but roadside rubbish? Kind Dame Nature sets us an example. Her busy fingers lose no time in covering up scars; and, if we bruise our long-suffering flesh, there is nothing so quickly heals it as Nature's cool, wholesome beverage. I do not blame farmers, with scant time to eat or rest, for allowing so much rubbish near their houses and barns. But, if their minds worked as deftly as their hands, the order in which they plant their onions and corn would open their eyes to Mother Nature's love of order, to her steady efforts to cover up the blots and scars of man's carelessness by her graceful garniture; would mark the clustering festoons of the wild grape swinging from tree to tree, and the creeping of the blackberry vine over stone and mound. Man cannot make a blade of grass; but he can, by method and slow degrees, keep in order and shapely style the clumsy materials with which he works. Then the inner and outer eye would grow more observant of and more grateful for the delicate bloom of the wild rose, and would study the sky as the face of a friend,—not merely anxiously in haying-time and harvesting.

Houses are women's farms. Is her husbandry in order? Is she a spendthrift in cookery, so losing the opportunity of helping the poor, and of welcoming to a hospitable board? Does she hoard in closets and attics furniture that would make other homes comfortable? Does she allow dust to gather on books and magazines, and finally forget them,—books and magazines for which the young and the old, South and West, hunger and clamor? We are inert. We mean to do better; but now is the accepted, possibly the only day to do good in this way. The Women's Alliance, the Post-office Mission, the Cheerful Letter "sisters," the Lend a Hand Clubs, are working to this end. But there are individuals standing idly by, not clearing their lumbered shelves; mistresses of dust-bins, but not daughters of order! May the coming winter not prove fruitless in this respect!

Some one says, "All rooms in which people habitually live have a body and soul of their own." It seems to me we more readily care for the body of the room than for its soul. Else why do we heap up bric-à-brac, and think more of style than of comfort? Why do we eagerly accumulate household treasures that in a few years we shall be as anxious to disperse as we are now desirous to gather?

One may say: "Why trouble about clearing up houses and roads? All that will settle itself. My mind is eager to roam in the fields of literature and art; I cannot think of folding clothes and keeping ribbons in order. When I want anything, I just have a little hurricane in my bureau drawers; and what I want comes to the surface." Such-minded persons, having no method with their own affairs, have precious little time for the trifles that make so large a part of the happiness of life. "Ships that pass in the Night" well says, "For some natures learn with greater difficulty and after greater delay than others that the real importances of our existence are the nothingnesses of every-day life,—the nothingnesses which the philosopher in his study, reasoning about and analyzing human character, is apt to overlook, but which, nevertheless, make him and every one else more of a human reality, and less of an abstraction." Another writer says: "The greatness of the little things in this world is probably only equalled by the smallness of its great ones in the next. . . . A curious thing it is to mark the vital, far-reaching effects of the most trivial and utterly unimportant acts and circumstances upon the lives and destinies of human beings." Exactness is one of the essential requisites of composition: it is likewise one of the essential requisites for the integrity of daily living. Those who are faithful in what seem to some the insignificant duties of life are most apt to fulfil the large ones. Exactness becomes habitual.

Having treated of outer relations with roads, farms, houses, with the care of clothing, and wise patience with children, let us look for a moment at our inner economy. The higher intelligences must long to clear up the dust-bins of the mind, the corners littered with cobwebs, obscuring with their films the moderately clear working possible to our fallible brains. How we mismanage the furnishing of the mind! How we forget that children learn more from what they read than from what they study, leaving their reading to haphazard! How many novels we all read,—often sensational, and sometimes worse,—the "old fogies" setting the young men and maidens the pernicious example! One of the shadows of the last hour may be the regret for this waste of precious time. But, when it comes to the solemn thought of how we have wasted the celestial opportunities of the heart,—have loved, but been slow to show it,—the pity of it seems too great to be borne. But the life-mirror, which was dusty or befogged, clears a little even in the last hour. Let us prize that hour. It is said that, if each man who goes to church would live up to the instruction he received there, the world would be saved. A hopeful prediction, considering how few men go! But women, who value the church and profit by it, must not be disheartened by the non-attendance of the former. Individual improvement must be their aim and solace.

A last word is apt to be in the minor key: it is a farewell, and one unwillingly parts with a friend or a listener. The chastened word is the enduring word, and allies us to the future for which we hope and long; and this with no disparagement of innocent merriment. A laugh clears the air, and carries us over many a rock in our daily life. It has been well said of Oliver Wendell Holmes, "Another has passed into the realm of history, which, we believe, will forever record his success . . . in the most delicate expression of human feelings of the deepest and tenderest kind." This which is true of Oliver Wendell Holmes, the embodiment of wholesome humor and genial happiness, may be true of all who—not by the use of the pen, but by the word of sympathy, the smile of appreciation, the thoughtful kindness—make this life sweet for others, and help them to wait for the explanation of what perplexes and pains here.

KITCHEN GARDENS.

BY ALMA J. NOBLE.

The work of the kitchen garden may afford suggestions to girls who wish to make their winter count for something, since it is one that has proved most successful in practical working. It is best explained by the description of one which was conducted with much satisfaction last winter in a city in Western New York.

A mission chapel in one of the tenement-house sections of the city served as school-room. Here the children flocked every Saturday afternoon at two o'clock,—children ranging in age from two and a half years to sixteen, and coming from homes of every description. A few clean-faced girls, with hair neatly combed and clean aprons, indicated thrifty parents and happy homes; but, alas! they were few and far between. The majority of the scholars were poorly and scantily clad, and often so dirty that it was necessary to apply soap and water before allowing them to enter the school-room. But what else can be expected of children who are in the street from early morning until late at night?

At two o'clock, with one of the teachers in her pretty white cap and apron at the head of the line, they marched, two by two, upstairs to the main room, where they took their places, and after a song repeated the Lord's Prayer. A chord was then struck on the piano; and they all arose, saluted the American flag, which was always draped over the platform, and repeated this little pledge: "I give my heart and my hand to my country,—one country, one language, one flag." This was followed by "America" or some other patriotic song. The population of our cities represents so many different nationalities, and there is such an undercurrent of unrest, that the idea of patriotism cannot be too strongly instilled into these young minds.

A half-hour was given to general exercises, which consisted chiefly of an object-lesson and appropriate songs, such as the Washing Song, Bed-making, Table-setting, or Sweeping Song, the first verse of which runs like this:—

"Away, now swiftly flying,
It is our sweeping day.
With brooms and dusters hieing,
To work without delay.
First open shutters wide,
Move little things outside,
Then sweep, sweep, sweep, my little maid,
To make your room so neat."

A little talk was given at the third meeting last winter on "Personal Cleanliness," illustrated with a drawing; and the effect was surprising in the number of clean hands and faces the following Saturday, and, indeed, throughout the winter. Other object-lessons were given on habits, thoroughness, orderliness, politeness, unselfishness, and other phases of a higher standard of life.

At 2.30 P.M. six classes marched downstairs, where they sewed for forty minutes on garments for themselves. Each girl was allowed to choose her work,—a handkerchief, apron, skirt, or night-dress; and, when finished, it was given her to take home. Some of the quick workers added three or four good garments to their wardrobe.

While these six classes were sewing, the other six were having lessons in housework, and were provided with miniature articles of furniture with which to work. For instance, there was a small stove, complete in its appurtenances, by means of which they were taught how to build a fire properly, remove the ashes, keep the stove clean, and never to use coal-oil for lighting. In the washing lesson each girl has a complete outfit,—tub, washboard, wringer, laundry-bag containing real clothes, a line and clothes-pins; and it is needless to add that here, at least, washing is robbed of its ordinary prosaic guise. The object is not only to teach work practically, but to broaden the minds and impart as much information as possible concerning the common things of life. Thus the care of the lamps suggests an instructive little chat about petroleum,—the driving of oil wells, the various uses of oil, its absorbing and also its dangerous qualities.

One of the most important lessons is the table-setting; and it is really pitiful to see how utterly ignorant are many of the art of setting a table, even in the simplest manner. A few calls at their homes, however, solved the mystery. Occasionally we would find a dirty table-cloth; but oftener one or two loaves of bread were placed in the middle of a bare table, around which the family gathered for its frugal meal. So they were taught not only how to set the table, but how to sit at table, and how to eat. Bed-making, sweeping, and dusting, and other lessons might be mentioned; but enough has been said to give an idea of the work and, we hope, to inspire others to go and do likewise. One bright girl gave each class a talk on "Fresh Air," and we were more than rejoiced to hear that in some cases her counsel had been heeded. Such remarks as these came to us from the mothers: "Mary never goes to bed now without opening the window," or "Kittie throws back the bedding and opens the window every morning, because the teacher told her to."

At the expiration of the first forty minutes the whole school comes together for fifteen minutes of marching and gymnastics, which is a restful change, and over which the children are wildly enthusiastic. Then the sewing classes take the housework lessons, and vice versa.

About twenty children under five years of age constituted our nursery department. These were amused with kindergarten songs, games, and stories. This was one of the most interesting features of the work. The attendance averaged about eighty, and we had an excellent corps of twenty teachers.

It was downright hard work, and required no little sacrifice to give up every Saturday afternoon; but we were abundantly repaid by the changed manner and appearance of many of the children, and by words of appreciation from some of the mothers, who really long for a better life for their children. We recall one woman, the mother of nine children, who said: "I am sorry for my children, for I am so busy from morning till night that I have no time to teach them anything; and so, whenever I can spare her, I want Mary to go to your school. She comes home, and tells me all about it."

Other mothers, of course, are perfectly indifferent, and only send the children to get them out of the way. But, whatever the motive that brings them, for about three hours every week they are under the influence of quiet, refined, and interesting girls, whose sole object is to place before them a high ideal of womanhood, and to show them the necessity of keeping their homes so clean—no matter how poor they may be—and so attractive that the fathers and brothers will enjoy their evenings there.

There are very many of these little waifs who are susceptible to kindly and refining influences; and can we not afford to give our Saturday afternoons to them if by so doing we can carry a little sunshine and the warmth of love that may perhaps develop their better natures?

"From the reek of the pond the lily
Has risen in raiment white,
A spirit of air and water,
A form of incarnate light."

THE ITHACA CHURCH.

In connection with the present movement in behalf of the church at Ithaca, the following letter from Andrew D. White, ex-minister to St. Petersburg and ex-president of Cornell University, will be of interest. It was written to Rev. E. E. Hale soon after the burning of the church.

Dear Mr. Hale,—You have doubtless heard of the calamity which has befallen your church in Ithaca. In common with all right-thinking persons, I feel sure, there and elsewhere, who have any acquaintance with the matter, I deeply regret it.

Though brought up in another Christian fold, and still attached to it, I have long recognized—indeed, highly valued—the influence of the Unitarian Church in leavening the so-called "orthodox" bodies of the country.

It was this which years ago led me to suggest the establishing of such a church at Ann Arbor, and at other points where thinking young men are assembled. It was not that I cared to make them Unitarians, but it was to give them some idea of the noble currents of religious thought which have come down to us, especially from such hearts and minds as those of Milton, Newton, Locke, Channing, Bellows, Freeman Clarke, and their compeers.

Small as the Unitarian Church is in numbers, it has certainly a great missionary work to do of its own sort, and such a situation as that at Ithaca should be maintained in full efficiency. A good church—even a better one than that to which Rev. Dr. Stebbins sacrificed so much—is the first necessity.

That church in Ithaca, from the beginning feeble as it has appeared to be, no doubt, in your denominational statistics, has really done a great work. It has afforded an open pulpit where modern thought could be reverently expressed without any limitations of dogmas; and, as such, its value was especially foreseen by Mr. Cornell in the early days of the society here.

There are to-day 1,600 students in Cornell University: within five years there will be nearer 2,000; and it is not too much to expect—in view of the figures obtained at the University of Michigan—that in ten years the number will be near 3,000. The church has a beautiful situation, which nearly the whole body of students pass morning and evening, and is in a situation to influence them morally and religiously, no matter to what other church they may habitually go. Of course, I do not at all propose a new church as a centre of proselyting as a centre of religious and ethical thought, practically modifying for good the whole mass of generally accepted dogmas.

There is another reason why I regard this church with especial favor: the number of thoughtful young men and young women who are breaking away from the generally accepted creeds of Christendom is large and constantly increasing. No effort on the part of "Orthodoxy," so called, is able to prevent this. I have myself seen young men, who, when in college, were the most devotedly orthodox supporters of the Christian association, break away after graduation, if they had not done so before.

The question then arises, Shall such men go into blank negation, and, scoffing, array themselves against Christianity and cut themselves loose from organized Christian effort? or shall they be retained in a fold which does not exact from them acquiescence in doctrinal statements which they cannot give?

Here especially your church is of vast use in holding to Christianity men who, without it, would be arrayed against it.

I regret that I have myself so many calls upon me of all sorts that I can make but a very small contribution; but I sincerely hope that some of the wealthier liberal-minded people of the East will consider this case in all its bearings, and see whether it is not one which demands speedy aid from them. I remain very respectfully and truly yours,

ANDREW D. WHITE.
Legation of the United States,
St. Petersburg, February 30, 1893.

President Schurman also wrote to Mr. Scott, the pastor, expressing the hope that the church might soon be rebuilt, and adding, "The Unitarian church has done so much for the exhibition of spiritual religion and the quickening of moral fervor that no community that has felt its vitality and light can suffer to see them extinguished." These letters and the fact that their writers have both contributed to the building fund show the general service which this church is doing for liberal Christianity. Pictures of the new building may be seen at 25 Beacon Street, and checks may be sent to the treasurer, M. C. C. Platt.

Spiritual Life.

Be as little children holding up their cups to the fountains. Wait not for a vase or chalice of silver. Take thy common, every-day cup of coarse ware, and hasten.—Letters from an Unknown Friend.

For, if the ministration of condemnation be glory, much more doth the ministration of righteousness exceed in glory. For, if that which is done away was glorious, much more that which remaineth is glorious.—Paul.

How good it is for those who are bereaved and sorrowful that our Christian festivals point forward and upward as well as backward, that the eternal joy to which we are drawing ever nearer is linked to the earthly joy which has passed away!—Mrs. Charles.

The face is an expression of the soul; and each thought, each expression, makes an imperishable impression upon the soul. Every word spoken and every action done in the presence of a human being makes an impression for eternity upon an immortal soul.—Dr. Brooks.

One cannot too soon forget his errors and misdemeanors. To dwell long upon them is to add to the offence. Not to grieve long for any action, but to go immediately and do freshly and otherwise, subtracts so much from the wrong: else we may make the delay of repentance the punishment of the sin.—Thoreau.

Of this we become sure: religion spiritualizes, inspires, and consoles us. The strait gate and narrow path are blessed for all who find them, and are the same for all who seek them. But this oneness of morals is learned experimentally: it cannot be taught dogmatically.—Julia Ward Howe.

The great tendency among men everywhere is to follow the standards and ideals that are dominant in the particular society in which they happen to move. It is a great thing to have a standard that overtops my little circle and yours; that can be seen from community to community, from nation to nation, from age to age. Such a standard has the Christ-life come to be.—J. T. Sunderland.

"My life shall be a challenge, not a truce! This is my homage to the mightier powers, To ask my boldest question, undismayed By muttered threats that some hysteric sense Of wrong or insult will convulse the throne Where wisdom reigns supreme. . . . Thou wilt not hold in scorn the child who dares Look up to thee, the Father, dares to ask More than thy wisdom answers."—O. W. Holmes.

The energy of disappointment and despair produced by limitation and defect; the energy of sorrow for our dead, of hopeless passion, and of ruinous loss; the energy of noble shame for good things left undone and ill things done,—all this can be transmuted into energy of use and good and helpful holiness, as certainly as light and heat and electricity and magnetism and chemical affinity and mechanical force can be transmuted into each other. It is a gospel of deliverance, of hope and cheer.—John W. Chadwick.

A man must have a reserve of character and purpose. "To the good man no harm can come, be he alive or dead." He must have a reserve of reputation. Let others think well of us, it will help us to think well of ourselves. No man is free who has not his own good opinion. A man will wear a clean conscience as he would a clean shirt, if he knows his neighbors expect it of him. He must have a reserve of love, and this is won by the service of others. "He that brings sunshine into the lives of others cannot keep it from himself." He must form the ties of family and friendship, that, having something at stake in the goodness of the world, he will do something toward making the world really good. David Starr Jordan.

The Sunday School.

The usual Channing Hall "talks" at the Unitarian Building, 25 Beacon Street, will be held next Saturday, January 5. Subject, Lesson XV., "The Sermon on the Mount, Part I." Primary at 2 P.M., conducted by Miss A. C. Dockham; Intermediate and Advanced at three o'clock, led by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford. All cordially invited.

It seems invidious, almost, to pick out any particular Christmas service for children; but it is quite proper to say that no minister throws himself into such exercises more earnestly than Rev. J. C. Jaynes of West Newton. He always carefully prepares an entertaining narrative for the young people, which commonly is so engrossing that they lean forward and forget the flight of the minutes. The elders say that they also obtain edification from these exercises. The carols of the latest service issued by the Unitarian Sunday School Society were sung at West Newton with great vigor and inspiration.

Sunday-school Christmas trees are very common now in our churches, and they are of decided benefit. There is a place in them for a proper remembrance of the scholars themselves in slight gifts, and at the same time the children can bring presents for the poor and the unfortunate. It would seem that that method is the best which combines both. There is no reason why a child in favorable circumstances should be deprived of the pleasure which comes from the sharing some slight gift in common with all the others. On the whole, each succeeding Christmas-tide seems to be ampler in its good will and fraternal greeting to all ages and all conditions of people. The Christian Church does well to put this day of human love and divine blessing so conspicuously forward.

We hear of most successful Christmas services all over the country, conducted by the Sunday-school with the congregation as part of the audience. This is a growing custom of merit. The children of the church should often be brought into the centre of affairs, and a service held in which young and old can participate. There are many beneficial results from such a habit. In Providence the five Unitarian Sunday-schools of that city were brought together in the afternoon of Sunday, December 23, at 4.30, in the First Congregational Church (Rev. Augustus M. Lord, pastor). The galleries were filled by the different schools, and the body of the church was given to the adults. The interest in the exercises was deep and hearty on the part of all.

He was also tutor in the family of the late Lord Chancellor O'Hagan. The change in his theological views is due to his scientific studies and to the influence of Dr. Martineau's writings. He is accredited to Unitarians. The Inquirer says with the very highest testimonials, including that of Cardinal Vaughan, under whose direction Dr. Klein has preached in several London churches. KEENE, N.H.—The Unitarian Club of Keene, N.H., held its regular meeting in Odd Fellows' Hall on December 19, with a large attendance. Dr. George B. Twitchell presided. Mr. Archibald M. Howe addressed the club on the subject, "What can a Layman do?" The address was a very happy statement of the present Unitarian opportunity, and of the place in which the laity can make their influence felt. The Unitarian Association was mentioned, and the healthy and manly character of the religious life enforced. Rev. C. B. Elder followed the speaker; and, with brief remarks by members, the meeting adjourned.

RUTHERFORD, N.J.—Christmas Sunday was a red-letter day with the Church of Our Father in this place, especial attention being given to the musical features of the services. Besides an admirable double quartette of singers, a quartette of string instruments accompanied the organ both morning and evening, adding greatly to the richness of the service. Both morning and evening congregations were very large, that in the evening requiring the use of camp chairs, and filling our little church to its utmost capacity. The pastor, Rev. George H. Badger, took the opportunity of the large attendance of the evening to explain the attitude of the Unitarian Church regarding the place of Christ in religion and our deep faith in the divinity of manhood which he stands for. An attractive feature in our evening services is a very worshipful musical litany prepared by our music director, Mr. E. J. Luce, including an impressive setting of the Lord's Prayer and two short collects.

A Safe Rule.—In the purchase of any piece of furniture, selection is an important matter; but in no case is it more valuable than when one is buying a table. From its very position in the centre of the room a table gains added prominence, and too much thought cannot be given to its wise selection. Herein lies the advantage of making such a purchase at a place like Paine's, on Canal Street, where the assortment is as large as the combined stock of half a dozen ordinary furniture stores.

Washington Excursions. All Expenses Included.—A series of personally conducted excursions to Washington, D.C., during the season of 1894-95, designed particularly to accommodate the people of New England, will be operated via the Royal Blue Line. These excursions will cover a period of seven days; and the rate of $23 from Boston will include fare for the round trip, hotel accommodations in Washington, transfers, and all necessary expenses. The next excursion will leave Boston Wednesday, January 23; and other dates will be announced later.

The Vaults of the Security Safe Deposit Company in the Equitable Building on Milk Street, Boston, have just been enlarged and refitted, and are now believed to be as complete in their appointments and as secure as it is possible to make them. The man or woman having valuables of paper or of plate as to the security of which they wish to be perfectly safe will find these vaults well worth critical examination. The time has long since gone by for the storing away of valuables in private safes with the consequent worry and fear of burglars. Safe Deposit Vaults have, to a large extent, taken their place; and one is easily satisfied of the reason why after examining such conveniences as this company offers.

In a recent article on Coffee and Cocoa the eminent German Chemist, Prof. Stutzer, speaking of the Dutch process of preparing Cocoa by the addition of potash, and of the process common in Germany in which ammonia is added, says: "The only result of these processes is to make the liquid appear turbid to the eye of the consumer, without effecting a real solution of the Cocoa substances. This artificial manipulation for the purpose of so-called solubility is, therefore, more or less inspired by deception, and always takes place at the cost of purity, pleasant taste, useful action, and aromatic flavor. The treatment of Cocoa by such chemical means is entirely objectionable. . . . Cocoa treated with potash or ammonia would be entirely unsalable but for the supplementary addition of artificial flavors by which a poor substitute for the aroma driven out into the air is offered to the consumer."—The delicious breakfast Cocoa made by WALTER BAKER & CO. of Dorchester, Mass., is absolutely pure and soluble. No chemicals or dyes or artificial flavors are used in it.

MRS. AUGUSTA L. CONANT.

The Unitarian church in Wilmington, Del., has suffered a great loss in the passing away of Mrs. Conant. She has been identified with the Wilmington society since its formation, and has been one of its most active and useful members. Faithful in her devotion to the Unitarian cause, and unusually effective in her work in its behalf, she deserves not only the affectionate remembrance of her friends and neighbors, but the grateful recognition of all who belong to our household of faith. Mrs. Conant was prominent and influential in the philanthropic and benevolent activities of the city in which she lived; and her counsel, which was always wise and progressive, was highly prized.

The Sunday-school of the church owes its existence and its continuance almost entirely to her self-sacrificing devotion. In the face of difficulties that would have discouraged most leaders, she manifested a brave and perseverence seldom seen. She was a member of the board of trustees of the church, and its secretary. She was indeed a pillar in the church, and she will be sadly missed in all our social and church life. She was intensely loyal to the grand principles upon which Unitarianism rests, and shared to an unusual extent the enthusiasm which often especially distinguishes the leaders of our work in missionary fields. Happy indeed would it be for our churches if we had more like her! Strong in the faith which made her life useful and distinguished,

"Her peaceful being slowly passes by To some more perfect peace."

TRUTH'S DWELLING-PLACE.

BY CAROL NORTON.

Not amidst the din of life
Doth the heart its Saviour know;
Not to those of earthly strife
Comes the Spirit's afterglow.

Not to men to error wed
Come the riches of his love;
Not to minds by dogma led Falls the Freedom from above.

But to him who conquers sin
Comes the fruit of righteousness;
And the pure do heaven win,
With its joy and blessedness.

In the silence deep of thought Lives the substance of all prayer;
And no hope can come to naught
If our pure trust leaves it there.

Deep within the Holy Place
Dwells the White Christ evermore;
And the beauty of his face
I would seek, and then adore.

THE LAPSE OF TIME AND THE LAW OF OBLIGATION.

BY JAMES MARTINEAU, D.D.

"While the earth remaineth, seed-time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night, shall not cease."—GEN. viii. 22.

Whoever may step out into his garden or throw up his window, to breathe the first air of a new day or a new year, cannot fail to be struck with the insensibility of nature to our divisions of time. The greater and the lesser lights of the sky feel not the seasons of which they are appointed to be signs. No great bell of the universe tolls away the passing spirit of the year; no chimes ring out from the restless wind to greet the period new-born. The calm, eternal heavens maintain their silent steadfastness; the star slips past the meridian wire which divides century from century, as though it were a vulgar moment, without pause to think or trembling to feel how awful the mark it sets afloat on the current of eternity. The unconscious earth lies still and patient as before, feeling only how the trees rooted in its bosom are leaning and rocking in the night breeze, and its snow-mantle is folded here and unfolded there with caprices stranger than a child's. No stream suspends its song to listen to the moments flowing by, no tide stands still to watch that wondrous sea of time that ever ebbs, yet never fails. Even life, in its several forms and generations, exhibits the same passionless continuity, and glides from era to era without a celebration. The cautious bud skulks near the bark, and sleeps unmoved within its varnished case, watching the royal sun as its thermometer, but heedless of him as its timepiece. The animals browse on or sleep through crises the most impressive. And the men whose life goes by the pulsations of their blood rather than the colors of their thought, to whom, sensation remaining the same, nothing becomes materially different, have no days in their calendar chalked with the white mark of sanctity, but remember their anniversaries mainly by their dinners, and would lie down at the most solemn point of history, if it happened to be time to rest.

At the instant when lower nature exhibits this unconscious uniformity, many a wakeful mind recognizes a transition of the deepest import. Though the bridge which stretches from year to year exists only in our idea, it is a station most real and most commanding. The perspective of the past, with its sharp forms, its clear light, its receding groups, its boundary circle of protecting hills, lies open to the eye of love; and the hazy passes of the future, with only gleams of glorious sunshine cutting across the deepest darkness, and facing the mountain shades with the green-painted slope, invite the heart of mystery. How plain, as we stand there, becomes the sense of what we are and what we were! With how brilliant a sadness do the young hopes, the high resolves, the capacious ambitions of our fresh days revisit our humbled hearts! As we look into the midnight of the departing year, how do the radiant images of blessings lost glow amid the space, till, as they begin to smile on us again, the darkness closes round them, and the saintly sight is gone! And, even when we call around us the living company of friends, the most cheerful eye cannot wander over the circle without many a pause of serious wonder.

The recent child that has the stature of the man; the infant we have nursed that is now the mother; the fresh, careless youth faded, perhaps, into morose, disappointed manhood, and sunk from a fair promise into a false prime; the comely form of many a matron faint and drooping now; the brow no longer smooth, the hand no longer firm; the lines of sorrow on the cheek deeper than the tracery of age; and all the hieroglyphics of mortality,—make us feel that we do not share the immobility and cannot affect the indifference of mechanical nature, and convince us, as we hear the great wheel of necessity humming its dreadful monotony, that we must either rise into a transcendent faith or fall into a sad despair. Whoever is imbued with the wisdom of a pure heart, and touched with the simplicity of Christ, will check the rush of feeling toward confusion, and, surveying the field of life from the high station of love and faith, remain to the end master of its priceless opportunities.

The habit of regarding time rather as a physical than as a human thing is connected with not a little low morality, and dictates many a sentimental thought, whose currency ought not to hide from us its falsehood. It is often said that the lapse of years affects our duty by shortening the period of service; that, the nearer we are brought to the limit of our present career, the more does it behoove us to make haste and overtake our work; that the lessening sum of moments must be spent in making ready for our change of scene. And, if this be meant only as a suggestion of natural feeling or compunction for past remissness, it states what will approve itself to every good mind. It is not fit for man to walk blindly to such a migration as death. So great a thing can be worthily approached only with the open eye of reason and of trust. And whoever knows that it is not far, as the martyr waiting for the kindling of his fires, or as the aged and stricken, whose summons has been signed and whose respite cannot be prolonged, will fall into a corresponding attitude of thought, and find some soft and solemn hues steal over his affections. He cannot but stand upon the watch, ready for the hint that trembles on the confines of the hour; for it is not in our nature to feel no difference between a near certainty and a far. And, when by altered place the distance has become the foreground, it would argue an unmanly insensibility, did it not engage us more. But this is simply the natural posture of the affections in an unperturbed mind: it is not a matter of obligation. It expresses preparation, but does not constitute it: it reveals the Christian lineaments, but does not trace them. Much more than this is implied in the usual lessons drawn from the lapse of years; and it greatly concerns our primary notions of Christian duty to understand the precise manner in which that duty is affected by the seasonal changes of our life.

Strictly speaking, very little, in relation to a man's duty, depends on the diminishing quantity of his time to come. Whether it be a day or a half-century makes no difference in the nature or the intensity of his moral obligation, though it must doubtless affect the external actions on which it may be rational for him to enter. Nay, if there were no such thing as death for him at all, if he had the early Christian's expectation of immortality on earth, the sentence of reprove for his animal nature would bring no release from the glorious bonds that are laid upon the spiritual. Every hour would retain its priceless worth, notwithstanding the most copious supply; nor could eternity itself cheapen the moments intrusted to his will. When Paul gained the conviction that he was raised above the touch of mortality; when he first looked into the opening avenue of ages, and saw himself, with living feet, securely passing through; when he felt that he could defy the perils of shipwreck and the sword of persecution,—did it abate his earnestness, and whisper to him that he had time enough? Did it turn his eager haste into an easy stroll? Did it fill him with moral indifference to the world that slumbered above the elements of explosion? Far otherwise. It cooled his personal interests, and made him so far from quiet heart; but it set his conscience on fire, and he spake the truth, he soothed the sorrows, he warned the sins, which would have been the objects of his care, had he beheld that age of Providence as we look back upon it now. "What would you wish to be doing," was the question once put to a wise man, "if you knew that you were to die the next minute?" "Just what I am doing now," was his reply, though he was neither repeating the creed nor telling his religious experience, but, for aught I know, posting his accounts or talking merry nonsense with his children round the fire. Nothing that is worthy of a living man can be unworthy of a dying one; and whatever is shocking in the last moment would be disgraceful in every other. The most trivial things, in their order and season, lose their moral incongruity and meanness: the most lofty, when misplaced, are deprived of all their greatness. He who is snatched from the world at his prayers, when his work is overdue, may well pass with culprit heart away; while the punctual Christian need not be scared to find himself brushing his hat within a minute's reach of the saints in heaven. In truth, it is impossible to borrow motives from the mere approach of death, without withdrawing them from the other parts of life. If, as our term hastens to expire, we have just reason for putting forth more strenuous service, then, in proportion to the remoteness of the goal, we must have reason equally just for less strenuous service; our obligations must be times unruled or ratio; there must be times unruléd or slightly touched by conscience, when its authority is inchoate and immature. Were it thus, sins of deepest dye in a life that had a year to run would have a lighter shade if five remained, and might be altogether bleached by exposure to twenty summer suns. I need not say how degrading it is thus to assign chronology to the rule of duty, to give shifting seasons to immutable Law. It is to look at the most solemn of realities through illusions of our fancy, to suppose the holiness of God capable of relaxation and intensity by changes purely physical, to subject his approval to our laws of mental distance. The proximity of death may, indeed, open our eyes and startle us with the consciousness of truths but ill discerned before; but the truth itself was no less there; the duty so pressing on our hand is not created, but only found; the neglect that weighs newly on the heart is not a product of to-day, but, oh, of how wearisome an age!

Thus there is always a lax side to this sort of morality. It connives at our waiting to be faithful till we can scarcely help it, and, by pressing us to future haste, slurs over past delay. If it be possible thus to make up for lost time, then human duty must be a kind of task-work assigned in definite quantity to our hand, with no stipulation but that at some time or other it shall be done. If it be capable of compression, it must admit of dilution; remissness may be compensated by diligence, and early assiduity may exhaust and prematurely finish up our obligations. Against a conception so base every true soul presents an involuntary remonstrance. This responsible existence is not a jail, in which we are imprisoned on the ticket system, and permitted to work out our term of hard labor, and by good use of spare hours go free into idleness and ease forever after. Its sacred bondage is no state of miserable punishment, of grievous expiation, to be sighed over and gone through, but of severe and glorious privilege, which, once embraced, can never be resigned; to be clung to through the changes of death as of life, like the piercing yet saving crucifix of self-denial. It is as the vow of pilgrimage to a holy land, the sepulchre of saviors and of saints, the field of prophets' glory, the mount of divine transfiguration, which, real as it is in God's universe, lies nowhere in our geography; to which we take our passage in vain by any steamship; which the Bishop of Jerusalem cannot help us to find out; the very light of whose beauty and colors of whose identity appear to have fled, as we stand upon the common hills and look into the turbid streams, yet whose image, ineffaceable from our believing hearts, still tempts us on, explorers of successive worlds, and devoted to an endless quest. Whoever cannot resign himself to an absolute impossibility of moral collapse and rest,—however much he may have charge from the service of God by the length of his fidelity, is a stranger yet to the true and loyal heart, and has taken the vow of the hireling, not the sacrament of love. On this, indeed, rests all the talk about its being time to prepare for the change of worlds. It implies that our duty is but a means to a future end, the medicine followed by the sweetmeats; that the cine followed by the submission to it is soon to period of our submission to it is soon to close; that we shall then have done with it, and reached the great holiday of our existence. This is to renounce the primary sentence. This is to renounce the authority of conscience, to refuse the authorizations of God. It denies his divine right over us, and sets him on the level, bargaining with us. It abrogates the whole law of obligation, proclaims that there is nothing above interest, establishes the worship of wages, and degrades heaven and immortality into a gigantic pay-day. I know of no more shameful profanation of great and holy realities. The doctrine of retribution is most true and solemn; but it constitutes no duty, it changes none, it implies them all. If we were not bound without it, we should still be free to please ourselves under it; and it would be nobody's affair but ours if we chose to pocket our remorse, and take the consequences. No, it is not retribution that establishes the moral law, but the moral law that establishes retribution. The shadow falls not backward from that world to this, but forward from this world to that. It is our nature and our conscience that demand and must determine our future lot, not our future lot that is to create our conscience and regulate our nature. The true disciple's heart claims no recompense, but renders willing service after service, "hoping for nothing again," and, though full of high expectancy and lighted with the immortal glow, deriving thence nothing of the faithfulness of duty, but only its grandeur and its joy; content to be among the "children of the Highest," whether in one world or in two, for an hour or for untold years.

While nothing in relation to human duty depends on the diminishing quantity of our time to come, everything depends on the ever-changing quality of present objects and events; and thus it is that the lapse of years reads the true lesson to our conscience. The mere flight of dead and empty duration, and our own particular relation to it, are of little moment; but the shifting attitudes of the things within it, the vicissitudes of the beings it contains, are of the highest and most fearful concern. They are the conditions of all our action, whose happy adaptation to them constitutes our moral wisdom, whose disregard of them makes our negligence, whose variance from them creates our folly and our sin. We live in a world of progress and unrest. Every object by which we are surrounded is passing through evanescent states, which must be caught, or they are gone; and, since all our work, not being mere flourish of activity in emptiness, has constant reference to these, there is not a particle of it that can wait. If it is not struck down upon the instant, its solid efficiency is all wasted, and its movement only beats the air. It is not the seasons only and the clouds that change from day to day, so that, if you cut not your corn by the timely autumn sun, the hail will pelt out and the damp skies rot the hopes of the year. there is nothing that stands still in time, so that no duty at all admits of delay. Each is strictly the duty of the moment; and our moral life is a race of perpetual speed, in which at every step the ground breaks from beneath us; and, if our foot be not ready for the advance, we must sink with it, and fall away. The child neglected to-day is less teachable to-morrow. His pliant and submissive heart, permitted to collect the crust of ignorant self-will, will need some softening ere you can begin; and his eager questions, betraying the wide-open mind, once pushed rudely back, you cannot gain entrance till by false keys you have unclosed the curiosity that was suffered to collapse. The act of social kindness which is a gracious attention this week becomes an overdue debt the next, and is presented with sad apology instead of received with glad surprise. The want which we vainly purposed to relieve soon looks up at us with reproachful face from the still graves. The tears we failed to wipe away dry upon the cheek, and leave us in the presence of the averted features of distrust instead of the eye of sweet reliance. The wounded tenderness to which we spoke not the timely and soothing word passes into permanent soreness instead of healing into grateful love. All round our human existence, indeed, does this same thing appear. The just expectation which we have disappointed cannot be recovered. There must be a long undoing before you can weave again in even lines and pattern fair the tangled web of life. Simply to reinstate the former conditions that should never have become confused is ever a vast and weary task; a barren and negative necessity, fruitless of positive good; the mere burdensome creation of our negligence. It is truly humiliating to think how enormous a proportion of the world's activity is spent upon the mere repair of evils occasioned by human unfaithfulness. When the physician has reckoned all the diseases and sufferings he witnesses which involve any element of guilt; when the lawyer has counted the suits brought to him by fraud, injustice, and cupidity; when the tradesman has told how much of the cost he incurs is in looking up the debts which else would not be paid, or watching the servants who cannot be trusted out of sight; when the labor has been weighed which is occasioned wholly by broken promises and disappointed expectations and interrupted contracts,—how much, think you, would remain to constitute the real productive and progressive work of mankind, compensative of no artificial evil, but fulfilling the appointed Providential good? If every posture of things were seized by the faithful conscience at the right moment, and no crisis were lost, who will venture to say what sorrows would be saved, what complications would be unravelled, or even what interval would be left between the heaven we hope for and the earth we live in? Nor must we forget that, while objects around us perpetually change, we ourselves do not stand still. We also are subjects of transient and evanescent states, bringing with them their several obligations, and carrying away their fruits of tranquillity or of reproach. Each present conviction, each secret suggestion of duty, constitutes a distinct and separate call of God, which can never be slighted without the certainty of its total departure or its fainter return. The spontaneous movement of the heart can then only be replaced by the strivings of a heavy and reluctant will, with twice the work and only half the strength. The different feeling of to-morrow is destined to a different work, and cannot be diverted to accomplish the task which was due to-day. And so the power which is not wisely spent must be wildly wasted. Our true opportunities come but once. They are sufficient, but not redundant; and we have time enough for the longest duty, but not for the shortest sin.—London Christian World.

I do not wonder at the superstition of the ancient Magians, who in the morning of the world went up to the hill-tops of Central Asia, and, ignorant of the true God, adored the most glorious work of his hand. But I am filled with amazement when I am told that in this enlightened age, and in the heart of the Christian world, there are persons who can witness this daily manifestation of the power and wisdom of the Creator, and yet say in their hearts, "There is no God."—Edward Everett.

LIBERALISM.*

BY E. CARLETON SPRAGUE.

Inasmuch as I have not engaged in our discussions, it has been my habit, at the first of our yearly dinners, to say a few words in respect to some of the interests or objects or ideals of our club. I remember saying at our first meeting, four years ago, that we had adopted the title of "The Liberal Club of Buffalo," using the adjective "liberal" in the sense of the noun "liberty," because, among other things, and within the limits of a reverent spirit, the utmost freedom of opinion and expression was to be the right of every member and guest of the club. To-night I am moved to preach to you a short sermon, particularly for the benefit of the younger brethren, taking our name as a text, for the purpose of elucidating as clearly as I can the meaning of the word "liberal," using the adjective "liberal" in the sense of the noun "liberalism," or "liberal-mindedness," as distinguished from the more broadly significant word "liberality." I think it will not be unprofitable, at the beginning of our new year, to devote a little time to the inquiry what we mean by liberalism, and whether it is a profitable thing, or whether it is a detriment to private character and the public welfare, as seems to be supposed by that most conservative of conservatives, Mr. John Ruskin.

It requires a skilful surgeon and a keen blade to dissect the mysteries of the human body. But it requires a still more skilful surgeon and a still keener blade to dissect the profound and subtle mysteries of the human mind. I am obliged by my topic to invade somewhat the shadowy realm of metaphysics. I am painfully sensible how inadequate I am to my subject. Nevertheless, I propose to give you the best thought of which I am capable.

Let me begin, then, by saying that I know of no more instructive teachers of liberalism (always excepting the Preacher of the Sermon on the Mount) than two men, separated by more than eighteen centuries of time, and by marked contrasts of mind and character, although in perfect accord upon this topic,—Saint Paul and Ralph Waldo Emerson.

Saint Paul has expounded the leading principles of liberalism with unsurpassed precision. I ask you to listen to four or five of his profound sayings, and to ponder them in your hearts. "One man esteemeth one day above another: another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind." "Happy is he that condemneth not himself in that which he alloweth." "Why judgest thou another man's servant? To his own master he standeth or falleth." "Why is my liberty judged of another man's conscience?" "There is nothing unclean of itself; but to him that esteemeth anything to be unclean, to him it is unclean." He enforces his doctrine with a practical application: "Whatsoever is sold in the shambles, that eat, asking no question for conscience' sake. For the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof." It is thus that Paul announced the supremacy of his own convictions over a large body of the most rigorous provisions of the Mosaic law.

From the teachings of Saint Paul I venture to formulate, with sufficient precision, I think, for practical uses, this moderate statement of what I conceive to be the main proposition of liberalism. That proposition is this: that, as to all subjects of long-continued differences of opinion between equally honest and intelligent men, it is the right and the duty of every man to respect and follow his own carefully considered and conscientious convictions, without any assumption, however, of infallibility, and with a mind always open to new light; and that it is equally his duty to cultivate a spirit of respectful consideration for the carefully considered and conscientious convictions of other men. It is the sacredness of every man's convictions, subject only to his own master, which Paul proclaimed. To respect our opponents is easy: they may be among our most honored friends. To respect their opinions is the difficult duty of the liberalist,—difficult particularly because an opposing opinion apparently implies an assumption of superiority of intelligence, which is extremely irritating to our pride in our own opinions. If we were all Isaac

*An address delivered before the Liberal Club of Buffalo on the evening of November 16 by E. Carleton Sprague, president of the club.

Newtons, equally wise and equally modest, picking up pebbles on the shore of the ocean of truth, we should all be accomplished liberalists.

I shall not attempt this evening to discuss what our duties are in regard to convictions which are not carefully considered, or which are not conscientious, or which are neither carefully considered nor conscientious.

I know of nothing more interesting in the history of this department of thought than the splendor with which the liberalism of Saint Paul is elaborated and illustrated by the genius and example of Emerson. It was the key-note of the first page of his first book, "Nature," and was one of the chief burdens of his subsequent discourse. I shall not attempt to quote many of his words. The substance, in part, is this: our fathers met the moral and spiritual as well as material problems of life and nature face to face. They solved them as best they could for themselves, and proclaimed their convictions to the world. We, their children, infinitely better qualified than they, by training and knowledge, to solve these problems, living face to face with life and nature as well as they, knowing, to use his expression, that "every new thought which genius and piety throws into the world alters the world," conscious, it may be, at times, of inspirations which seem to be from a source higher than ourselves, nevertheless dare not utter our convictions. We bow to the authority of the Fathers, of Plato, Aristotle, Bacon, or Locke, or of some synod or council or convocation or assembly or convention. Above all, we crouch in fear of the prevailing public opinion which is in a constant conspiracy against our independence. By and by some exceptionally courageous man thinks our thought, proclaims it to the world, moves the world, and is recognized as one of its prophets, while we shrink into our proper insignificance, and die with grieving over our own cowardice. Emerson, on the contrary, asks why should we not enjoy original relations with the universe. Certainly, we as well as our fathers are invited to solve its secrets. Certain it is that more accurate knowledge has been acquired during the past two centuries than during all the preceding ages put together; and, therefore, our convictions are entitled to more respect and authority than the convictions of all the preceding ages put together. Let us always remember that self-trust is the essence of heroism; that to trust our own thought, that is genius; that there is nothing more sacred than our mental integrity; and that virtue consists in fidelity to our carefully considered and conscientious convictions. He equally insisted upon the respect due to the carefully considered and conscientious convictions of others, and his sincerity was manifested by his example. He never dogmatized, and was to a rare degree free from pride of opinion. He was earnest in his convictions and courageous in proclaiming them, but they were always subject to emendation. He was the first to appreciate, and was an enthusiast in his admiration of, such originals as Alcott, Thoreau, Whitman, and Margaret Fuller. Believing that men's minds are as various as their faces, and that each is inspired by its own peculiar genius, he was every man's disciple. He was always on the lookout for new light from the humblest of his associates, and gave undespairs audience even to the scores of half-witted pilgrims who found their way to his house in Concord for the purpose of exhibiting with paternal fondness the still-born offspring of their mental parturitions. He reiterated in a thousand ways his belief that there dwells in all men some spark of the Divine Spirit, and was in this, as well as in his liberalism, a disciple of Saint Paul. His reverence for the capabilities of man was unbounded. "A drop," he writes, "is a small ocean. A man is a representative of all nature." "It is one light that beams out of a thousand stars: it is one soul that animates all men." "The world is nothing: man is all."

I have dwelt thus long upon the writings and example of Emerson because I think they afford an object-lesson of liberal-mindedness more instructive than any amount of abstract dissertation.

In the next place, gentlemen, I think it is quite apparent that, with the advancement of modern knowledge and culture, liberalism, so far as it is based upon respect for other men and their opinions, is becoming more a matter of mental constitution and attitude, largely the product of heredity and early environment and of general culture, and less a matter of the number and character of our beliefs; so that in all the range of thinking people, from the extremist of mystics to the most sceptical of rationalists, you cannot tell where you shall find your liberalist or your bigot. In regard to respect for our own convictions, where they are strictly spontaneous and unaffected by exterior influences, especially in the daily affairs of life, it is a necessity of human nature, a necessity of our mental constitution. It is difficult to imagine the performance of any conscious and voluntary act in ordinary life which is not the result of the conviction that the act is appropriate to the occasion, and of our respect for that conviction. Were it not so, we should stay fast-rooted where we are, and lose the power of action. There is nothing, therefore, more easy than to respect our own convictions. When we come to the question of respect for the convictions of other men, we meet with a disagreeable trait in human nature, which, it seems to me, is quite unaccountable, since it can hardly, upon the theory of evolution, be charged to our unfortunate and much abused brute ancestors, to whom we attribute most of our vices, but in whom this trait is very slightly, if at all, developed. I refer to the almost universal spirit of contempt for other people and their opinions which seems congenial with our mental constitution. It is remarkable how vigorously it appears in little children. It is very potent in half-educated people, and diminishes with increasing intelligence, without regard to particular beliefs. A semi-barbarous white man delights in despising a black man, while I suppose that all true gentlemen will heartily sympathize with the fine saying of Gov. Andrew of Massachusetts that he thanked God that he never despised any man because he was poor, or because he was ignorant, or because he was black. The cruelty of a contemptuous spirit is manifest when you consider that the world is full of men and women who meet with cheerful fortitude the most pitiless blows of fortune and of their adversaries, while there is no man or woman, however humble, who will not

FINE TABLES.

The very first question that a score of persons will ask in relation to this table is its size. They will echo the sentiments of the small boy,—

How big was Alexander, pa,
That people called him great?

Let us begin, then, by saying that it is not to this one table that we direct special attention; for it is but one of over seventy new patterns, all of which are now on exhibition on our main floor. It is to be a Carnival of Tables, lasting at least ten days.

A fine table is not to be found whenever wanted. Not one table in fifty is worthy to be called "fine."

It must have a beautiful design; its height for its specific use must be exact to a half-inch; its width should be in fixed proportion to its length; the legs must not protrude, yet extreme rigidity is an essential. Every detail must be right.

We can assure our customers on one point in advance,—they will find this as complete and artistic a collection of Tables as we have ever announced.

sweetly and patiently? Among the many she has written there must, it would seem, be one or more such: the law of averages would necessitate it; but at this writing we do not recall its name.

THE GOSPEL OF BUDDHA ACCORDING TO OLD RECORDS TOLD BY PAUL CARUS. Chicago: The Open Court Publishing Company.—It does not seem to us that Dr. Carus has done well to blend his own matter indistinguishably with that of the Buddhistic writings. He tells us that many passages, and, indeed, the most important ones, have been literally copied from the translations of the original texts. "Some are rendered rather freely, in order to make them intelligible to the present generation. Others have been rearranged. Still others are abbreviated." The opening and closing chapters are entirely Dr. Carus's own matter in the spirit of the original books. It is evident from these confessions that, however freely the reader may go to this book for moral and spiritual enlightenment, he cannot go to it for exact knowledge of what Buddha was and taught. We come closest to him and to the real Buddhist teaching in the "Parables and Stories," of which a very interesting selection is given. But a much better result would have been achieved if Dr. Carus had given us a series of exact transcripts from the original documents, and with these a series of essays upon mooted points.

THE BORDERLAND OF CZAR AND KAISER: NOTES FROM BOTH SIDES OF THE RUSSIAN FRONTIER. By Poultney Bigelow. Illustrated by Frederic Remington. New York: Harper & Brothers.—Mr. Bigelow, in spite of the opposition of Russian officials and of embarrassment at every point, has managed to say something about Russia; and that it is not more favorable to the Russian government is because that government had no intention of allowing Mr. Bigelow and Mr. Remington, his artist companion, to travel in Russia and tell what they saw. The chapter entitled "Why we left Russia" will be accepted as a sufficient explanation, not only why Mr. Bigelow and his companion did not stay there, but why many others find Russian rule intolerable. There are interesting chapters on the German soldier, and on the Emperor William's stud farm and hunting forest. A chapter on "The Preaching Gospel of Russia" is a story of religious persecution, which shows how heavy and intolerant is the Russian yoke. Mr. Remington's illustrations are as happy as usual.

SIBYLLA. By H. S. Cunningham, author of "Wheat and Tares," "The Heriots," etc. New York: Macmillan & Co.—This is a good story of a man who has Browning's "need of a world of men," and, in the exercise of his public duties, fails to see that he is leaving his wife too much alone, not physically, but intellectually, and in her desire for sympathy and fellowship. Naturally enough, she comforts herself a little with the friendship of another man, until his friendship becomes full fledged and proposes an aerial flight. But nothing of this sort has been in her loyal heart. In the mean time circumstances conspire to make her sympathy necessary to her husband, and the Saturnian days return. The book has a kind of anti-climax in its detailing of the fortunes of the subordinate gentleman of the story. This is soup after meat, when the main business has been satisfactorily finished.

OTTO'S INSPIRATION. By Mary H. Ford, author of "Which Wins?" Chicago: S. C. Griggs & Co.—This is a musical story, and it makes a pleasant music for the mind and heart. That particular feature which names the book—the boy's claim of angelic inspiration—does not help, but rather hinders, but not seriously, for it is not done obtrusively. The contrast of the hard matter-of-factness of the heroine's parents and the boy's ideality, their conception of his violin as a devilish instrument,—all this is well done; and we like them all the better because, when he comes home famous with a real "Stradivarius" of his own, they still do not succumb. A real "Stradivarius," by the way, is getting to be almost as common in fiction as in fact (?); and in the latter region there are enough, like the bits of the true cross, to build a seventy-four.

THE BASIC LAW OF VOCAL UTTERANCE. By Emil Sutro. New York. E. S. Werner.—This writer claims to have discovered a new vocal cord, and to prove that speech sounds are the product of inspiration as well as expiration. He combats all our accepted theories regarding voice, drawing a distinction between the air taken for life purposes and the air taken for voice and speech. There is much in the book that may be of interest to voice teachers and specialists.

THE BURDEN OF ILL-HEALTH: HOW TO BEAR IT. By Lula Lyon Topping. E. P. Dutton & Co. 50 cents.—This tiny book, written after "a weary experience in the solitary way," is sent out as a special message of help and cheer to invalids. The helps are mental and spiritual, leading the mind into thoughts of patient waiting and loving sympathy. A few appropriate poems are added to the seven short chapters.

Miscellaneous.

The Year Book of the Unitarian Congregational Churches makes its appearance in familiar form, with revised lists of parishes and ministers, and the usual information about Unitarian organizations. The book may be had at 25 Beacon Street at 20 cents a copy.

The "Unitarian Pocket Almanack for 1895," issued by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at Essex Hall, is a small, neatly bound publication, containing the same class of information as is afforded by our own Year Book, besides blanks for memoranda, engagements, and daily jottings,—all very compact and convenient.

The bound volume of Harper's Young People for 1894 is fully equal to its predecessors in the number of good stories, interesting articles of description, and bright anecdotes that it contains. It is too bulky for convenient reading, but convenience and comfort will matter little to the boy or girl who has a chance to turn its fascinating pages.

Orra Langhorne, whose name is well known in Boston through her contributions to daily and weekly papers, has published in pamphlet form a story of the New South, entitled "Aunt Pokey's Son." It is written with the design of showing that there must be some point of contact where the two races occupying the same country, using the same language, professing the same faith, can meet as friends in the changed conditions that have come to both. Mrs. Langhorne was born a slaveholder, and she has taken each character in her little story from real life. Printed by J. P. Bell & Co., Lynchburg, Va.

Literary Notes.

Dr. Ernst Haeckel, well known for his numerous works on biology and paleontology, has written a little book that should be of peculiar interest in these days of doubt and unrest. It takes up the subject of Monism as a connecting link between religion and science, and bears as a sub-title "The Confession of Faith of a Man of Science." It will be published at once by Macmillan & Co.

Under the title of "A College Town Pulpit," Rev. J. T. Sunderland of Ann Arbor, Mich., publishes a series of monthly sermons. Subscription price, 50 cents a year, 5 cents a number. The subjects of the first five sermons of the current year's issue (September to January) are: "The Soul's Cry for God"; "Jesus as Humanity's Ideal"; "Sectarianism: Its Causes and Cure"; "The True Cross of Christ"; "Was Jesus God, and How he came to be Worshipped." Send subscriptions to address as above. Reductions in price will be made to Post-office Missions and churches ordering the sermons in quantities.

Macmillan & Co. announce the second volume of Bryce's "American Commonwealth" as ready at last. The first volume of this revised edition was issued in September, 1893; and this unexpected delay has been caused partly by the pressure of Mr. Bryce's political duties, and partly by the labor involved in the writing of new chapters and revision of others. These new chapters are timely and interesting, dealing, as they do, respectively with the Tammany ring of New York, as an example of the perversion and corruption of democratic government under certain conditions, the influence of physical conditions on the development of the American people, and the reconstruction of the South.

GRACIOSA'S LUCKY PERSIMMON-TREE.

BY MARY A. WINSTON.

I don't suppose there is any idler creature in the world than a Northern invalid spending a winter in Florida. My Cousin Dorrie had been really ill, and I was ailing. So a council of the powers that be at home had met, and decreed that we leave college at Thanksgiving and travel South with Dorrie's mother, my Aunt Powers. What lazy creatures we were! Dorrie and I never opened a book or even exerted ourselves to dress in anything but outing skirts and shirt-waists.

But every evening, as the air grew a little cooler, we did muster up energy enough to stroll down the road, and amuse ourselves with quizzing Graciosa. This personage of romantic name was what is commonly known in the South as a "poor white," and she was a character. Dorrie and I blessed the day when we discovered her; for she saved us many a pang of ennui, as the novels say. We would lean over the rail fence near the barnyard while she milked the cows; and, as the stream of rich milk descended into the pail, we would draw Graciosa out. She was sixteen, but she did not know how to read or write. She was maid of all work and general farm drudge for her step-father, her mother having died and left a numerous brood of half-brothers and sisters to Graciosa's care. What amused us most about Graciosa was her superstitions. Her mind was fairly crammed with the most curious ideas about charms and conjuring spells and such matters. Moreover, she clung to her belief in them with a tenacity no ridicule could weaken.

"Graciosa, Graciosa," said Dorrie, meditatively, one evening. "You have a very romantic name. Do you know you ought to be a queen of fashion or something of that sort, Graciosa, with silk dresses to wear and a carriage to ride in. You really ought to, Graciosa. It's only fair to that name."

"I reckon I will be some day, Miss Dorrie. I sholy will! My maw done name me Grashiosy. She had book-learnin', did maw,—just like you-uns, Miss Dorrie; and so shall I some day. My maw tole me befo' she die that the wise woman down yandah at the Cornahs done tole her some owdacious good luck plum boun' to come t'me. So I'm a-lookin' fo' it. I s'pect it gwine be mighty fine when it gits hyar."

Graciosa twitched her faded calico sun-bonnet and straightened up with an important air on her milking-stool. Dorrie and I looked at her gravely. One is too lazy to smile in Florida. We took our amusement internally, as the doctor directed us to take some of our medicine.

"Well, Graciosa," I said. "Did the wise woman tell your mother what the good luck was going to be?"

"Naw, Miss Pauline," the girl replied. "She was took with a fit, and couldn't speak no mo'. But I tell you what I s'pect it'll be. My maw owned this plantation befo' she married my step-paw; and her antsistahs buried a fohtune of money somewhere on the place, to keep it from the soldiers. I used to heah my maw tell about it often and often. I reckon, Miss Dorrie, I gwine fin' that money when my good luck done come."

One evening, a rare occurrence, we found Graciosa unoccupied; and where should she be, of all places, but perched up in the persimmon-tree over our heads. She smiled down upon us from among the green leaves and yellow fruit.

"Mighty cool up hyar, Miss Pauline," she said sociably from her airy height. "The ole witch on Mavry's Hill done say to my maw that this pashimmon's a lucky tree fo' me. So, when I git a minute to myself, I climbs up to see if my good luck's on the road yit."

I don't know what put the idea into our heads, I am sure. There is a time-honored proverb that Satan always finds some work for idle hands to do, and I suppose he is equally attentive to idle brains. At any rate, when that absurd Southern St. Valentine's Day arrived, with its singing birds and blossoming flowers, it brought to us a desire to play a joke on Graciosa. So that evening, when we sauntered down to our usual trysting place under the persimmon-tree, we called Graciosa over to the fence; and Dorrie said modestly:—

"You know, Graciosa, that we have a little book-learning; and, when you told us about the buried treasure and the lucky persimmon-tree, we were interested to study into the matter. Now there are books of magic, and we found a charm just to fit your case."

"My! In a conjurin' book!" exclaimed Graciosa, in an awe-stricken tone.

"Listen, Graciosa; and hear the charm; and, if you do everything just as I tell you, you'll surely find a hidden treasure. Today is St. Valentine's Day; and in all the books it is a great day for magic and spells. Wonderful things can be done on St. Valentine's Day if you know just how to do them. So you can see that the evening of St. Valentine's Day is a splendid time to try a charm, especially if the moon shines, as it will to-night. Now, first, you must gather some persimmons from this tree and some pig-nuts from the hollow over there, and bring them here at nine o'clock to-night to this very spot. You must lay the persimmons round in a circle—so," Dorrie explained; "and then arrange the pig-nuts in a triangle inside the circle—so." And she showed Graciosa a drawing of the design on paper. "Then the charm begins. You must let down your hair, and step into the centre of the circle and triangle; and, pointing to the three corners of the triangle, you must say,—

"Owls of the air and bats of the night, Bring me your candles, that I may have light."

"Then, Graciosa," I finished solemnly, "you must begin to dig; and the treasure will be yours."

Graciosa's black eyes lit up with a simple faith. She believed every word we had said. Dorrie and I began to feel a little ashamed of ourselves, to take advantage of so trusting a mind; but Graciosa said eagerly:—

"I kin remembah it all, Miss Dorrie; and I'll sholy fin' it! Don't you fret! I don't know how to thank you-uns, noways; but I feels it in hyar. 'Deed I do, Miss Pauline!" And she clasped her hands over the front of her shabby cotton waist.

At quarter to nine that night you might have seen Dorrie and me watch our chance, creep under the rail fence, and, digging little holes in the dry, sandy earth, deposit two or three silver coins in each, and cover them up carefully again. Then we hid in some bushes, and saw Graciosa carry out Dorrie's orders to the letter. It gave even us rather an eerie feeling, though, when Graciosa unbraided her heavy flaxen hair, and, letting it fall about her, stepped into the triangle, and recited Dorrie's silly couplet with dramatic effect. Her long hair glistened almost white in the moonlight, her large dark eyes were gleaming with excitement. I must say she was an uncanny-looking maiden, as she picked up her spade and began to dig. We watched her until she dropped her shovel hastily and stooped over. She had discovered our silver, for we heard her cry out, "Hyar's some of it a'ready!"

By that time we were tired of the joke; and, whistling to Ajax, our Newfoundland dog, we started for a moonlight stroll. It was cooler at night, and therefore pleasanter walking. Dorrie and I were never afraid when we had Ajax with us. I do not know how long we were gone; but I think it was after ten o'clock when we neared the lucky persimmon-tree on the way back, and Dorrie clutched my arm and pointed ahead: "Look!—She's digging yet!"

Then, indeed, contrition entered our souls, to think that we had led this poor, over-worked farm drudge to toil all that time over what we knew to be a fool's task. We had supposed that, after she had found our little heaps of silver and nothing more, she would soon tire of the fruitless operation. We started forward both at once, and were just about to speak, when Graciosa gave a scream, and bent over the good-sized hole her strong arms had already succeeded in digging. She looked up, and saw us.

"O Miss Dorrie, Miss Pauline! I've struck it. It's thar, sholy!" said Dorrie, "Nonsense, Graciosa!" said Dorrie, sharply. "It's a stone, most likely."

But, when we had peered into the hole and sounded the object Graciosa had struck, it did seem to be metallic; and by and by, when Graciosa had dug deeper, we could see that it certainly was a box. Dorrie and I were still rather sceptical; but, when we looked at Graciosa's excited eyes and white face, we determined to see the matter through. We had danced, and now we must pay the piper. We made Graciosa rest under the lucky persimmon-tree while we hastened back to the hotel, secured two burly men with pickaxes, and piloted them to Graciosa's charmed circle.

"Now, there's something in that hole," I said; "and, whatever it turns out to be, you shall be paid for digging it up."

"Mayhap it's a coffin, lady," said one of the men, not liking the job so late at night. "Too short," said the other, "unless it be a baby." After which gruesome suggestions the two Cornishmen set to work.

So it happened that in about half an hour a queer little procession filed into Aunt Powers's sitting-room,—the two men carrying between them a heavy iron strong-box with a steel-barred lid; two bewildered, nonplussed young women, Dorrie and I; and a young farm girl in faded calico, with long fair hair, Graciosa.

I awoke aunt, and called the landlord; and at midnight on that memorable eve of St. Valentine the box was forced open, and revealed to our dazzled eyes heaps and rows of yellow gold Spanish dollars and silver Mexican coins. I never saw so much money all together in my life, and I don't suppose I ever shall again.

"They do say, Miss, that her mother's folks way back came from Mexico and were Spaniards," said our landlord, "and that that's where she gets that queer, high-sounding name and those big black eyes."

Dorrie and I each took Graciosa by the hand.

"We want to congratulate you, Graciosa," Dorrie exclaimed. "You have quite a little fortune now of your own, and we shall take particular care to get a lawyer to-morrow who will see that no one takes it from you."

Graciosa fell on her knees, and gazed at her wealth. "To think, Miss Pauline, that you and Miss Dorrie done conjured it up out of the air!" she ejaculated.

And, if ever there was a pair of humiliated, repentant damsels in this world, it was Dorrie and I when we laboriously explained to simple-minded Graciosa the joke we had played upon her that Valentine's Day.

But, when she looked at her good luck, she could not help forgiving us; and, when she went away to "get book-learnin'" and became a jolly school-girl herself, I think she understood us.

PATTY COON.

At intervals a little sob came from the corner rocking-chair.

"Papa will find another coon some day, dear, perhaps," said Grandma Hulbert, tenderly.

"But not another Patty," said Rita, whose grief was as deep, if not as tearful, as Leah's for their lost pet. "Not another fuzzy, twinkly little Patty. Oh, never, grandma!"

"Here comes Harry, running. Bless me, how he's running!" said grandma, looking down the road. Harry's head was really half a length ahead of his heels until he tumbled in at the sitting-room door.

"Joe—Bentwick's—trapped—Patty!" he cried.

"Oh!" cried the children. "Who told you?"

"Saw her!" panted Harry.

"Joe traps for his living," said grandma.

"But of course he'll give up Patty."

"He won't!" said Harry, getting back his breath. "He says he trapped Patty fairly in the woods, and we let her get away. He says her skin is worth a pair of shoes to him, and we must buy her back if we want her."

"Where's my bank?" cried Leah. "I wanted a new muffler, but I'd rather have Patty."

"It isn't right to buy our own coon!" declared Rita, pulling on her jacket.

"Grandma, isn't she our own coon yet?"

"I think she is," said grandma. "But remember, dear, Joe looks at it from his point; and you must talk gently."

Joe Bentwick was leaning over the gate watching for them as Leah, Rita, and Harry came up.

"Joe," said Rita, quietly, "may we please see if you have our coon?"

"There's her cage," said Joe, gruffly.

"Patty, Patty!" cooed Leah.

A little black nose was thrust between the wood bars; and two gentle, timid little eyes peered up at her.

"Oh, Joe! Let her out!"

"You poor Patty!" cried Rita. "Joe, her foot has been hurt in the trap! Can't we have her?"

"She's worth shoes to me," muttered Joe.

Harry glanced irresolutely at his feet, encased in stout new shoes. He was about Joe's size. In a twinkling both shoes were off, and he held them out to Joe. "They cost three dollars," he said; "and I earned them myself. Try them on."

Leah held Patty nestled up in her arms.

"They fit," said Joe, with a relaxing smile. "It's a swap. Take your old coon.

Only next time look out she doesn't run away."

Harry trudged home barefoot; and, although he winced when he pulled on his old shoes, Patty's delight over her bread and milk, and his sisters' delight over Patty, more than paid him.

Next morning, when mamma stepped out on the piazza, there lay Harry's new shoes with a little note tied to one string. It ran:—

I can't keep these shoes. I feel too cheap. The coon is yours, anyway. I was mad 'cause you're better off than me. Keep the shoes.
JOE BENTWICK.

"I'll find a way for Joe to earn some shoes," said papa, when he had read the note. And he was better than his word. In time Joe learned to love Patty Coon himself.—Lillian L. Price, in Youth's Companion.

THE BUNNY PLATE.

When Beth's birthday came, her two little friends, Bertha and Edna, who lived across the street, wanted to give her a present. So they talked to mamma about it.

"You might take her a quart of pecans," said mamma; for they had a barrelful.

"Are you sure she'd like them just as well as if we buyed them new?" said Bertha.

"You like them as well every time I let you have them," said mamma.

So it was settled that after their naps they should take them over, and they did not mean to take long naps; but Edna slept so long that, when she woke up, she found Bertha had taken the nuts over, and then had gone down town for mamma. Edna did not like this at all.

“You see,” said mamma, “you slept so long; and Bertha wanted her to have them before dark, so she could eat some. She told her they were from you, too.”

“Oh, but I didn’t hear her say ‘thank you,’” wailed Edna.

“You can go over now a little while,” said mamma.

So Edna went upstairs to get dressed; and then she looked through her box of toys to see if there wasn’t something she could give all alone. “But there’s something a-ailing of ’em all,” she said finally. Then she turned to Bertha’s box; and there she found the “bunny plate,”—a little plate with a bunny’s head painted on it. She had once owned a kitty plate, but it was now broken; and she thought the bunny plate the most beautiful thing in the world.

“My!” she thought. “Wouldn’t Beth just love such a silvernear [souvenir] as that. I b’lieve I’ll take it over; and then I’ll give Bertha a lot of my old things, and she won’t care.”

Edna found Beth setting the dolls’ table with a new set of dishes, out under the trees, for a tea-party. “O Edna!” she cried. “I’m so glad you’ve come. I was just going over after you and Bertha, and I just love the nuts!”

“Here is a present from me all alone,” said Edna, holding out the bunny plate.

Then, although Beth kissed her and said it was lovely, and thanked her ever so many times, yet Edna did not feel as happy as she expected. “I—I—can’t stay,” she said. “I’ve got a bad pain inside me.”

When Bertha came home, Edna was sitting on the lower step of the porch, feeling very unhappy.

It did not make her feel any better to have Bertha kiss her, and give her a bag of peppermint sticks she had bought for her. So she burst out crying, and ran over to Beth’s like a small whirlwind.

“O Beth!” she cried. “You’ll not like me any more; but I—I—stealed Bertha’s bunny plate to give you without askin’ her. And it’s made me sick, ’specially when she bringed me this candy. You can have it.” She said all this very fast and with her eyes shut tight, so she shouldn’t see the dreadful face that she was sure Beth would make up. But Beth took up the bunny plate, and put it in her hand. Then she kissed her again, and said:—

“Never mind, dear! I know how you feel,—just as I did when I took mamma’s stick-pin once without asking; and seems as though it stuck right through me some-way, ’specially after I lost it.”

“O Beth, you are a comfort!” said Edna, hugging her tight.

Then she went home, and told Bertha about it; and afterwards they came over and ate supper with the dollies.

“We had the splndidest time,” said Edna that night to mamma, “and the best little frosted cakes with ‘Beth’ printed on ’em in candies. I ate four, ’cause the pain in my inside works was all gone.”—Churchman.

BLACK-EYED SUSY.

She was only a yellow daisy, clasped tightly in the hot, feverish hand of a little child in the Roosevelt Hospital. It was a sultry August day; and, when the box that the Flower Mission had sent in, fresh from the country, was opened in the children’s ward, a cry of delight went up from the little patients as they caught sight of the mass of beautiful white daisies. Lying patiently on one of the cots was a little flaxen-haired German girl from the East Side; and, as the box of flowers was passed along the ward, the one yellow daisy, with its great brown eye, attracted her attention. The nurse, seeing the wistful look in the blue eyes, lifted the gay flower from the midst of its snowy companions, and laid it on the child’s pillow.

Eagerly the small hand stretched out for the flower, and quickly raised it for a moment to the parched lips; but the daisy thought that never, on the hottest August day, had she felt so warm a wave pass over her sunny head. And then, too, the little hand held her so tight and firm that it sent a sharp pain straight through the daisy’s lungs. She gave a quick little gasp, then smiled brightly up into the child’s face.

Something in the little sufferer’s eyes encouraged the daisy to speak; for you know that children can understand the flowers’ language, though they, somehow, always seem to forget it when they are grown. So this brown-eyed daisy, looking up into the child’s blue eyes, began to forget that her lungs were being squeezed in rather an uncomfortable fashion, and, nodding a gay good-morning, said, “Perhaps you’d like to know my name, and where I come from?”

“I suppose you must be one of the sick children I have heard about. Perhaps you are too tired to talk, so I’ll do the talking, and you can listen. And, when you want me to stop, just turn my face down on the pillow; and I won’t say another word. But, please, if you wouldn’t mind not holding me quite so tight, I could breathe just a little easier. There! That’s better. You know my lungs are mostly in my legs.

“Now I’ll tell you all about myself. My last name is Rudbeckia, and my first Susy. The boys and girls up in the country where I was born and have always lived all call me Black-eyed Susy; but that is such a long name to remember! So you can just call me Susy. Our family all live in big, big fields,—not in great brick houses like this; and we all wear yellow dresses, and have brown eyes just like mine. Our family isn’t as large as my cousins’, the Ox-eyes. They sometimes have whole meadows all to themselves, while we have only patches here and there among the Grasses.

“The Grasses are sort of connections of ours. There are the Sorrels and Clovers, and the great swells, the Blue Grasses; but the Ox-eyes are our own cousins. They are rather proud, to be sure; but then they are such pretty girls, with yellow hair, and they always wear white dresses. They don’t care very much for anybody but the Buttercup boys, who wear such shiny yellow jackets and bright green trousers. The Ox-eyes are very clever girls, and can tell people’s fortunes. I used to wish I could do so, too; but, when I found that they had to have their pretty clothes torn to pieces, and that it hurt them so badly that they generally died of withering, then I wasn’t sorry I was born a Rudbeckia, with black eyes and a yellow dress. You know we daisies had rather die on our own green stalks than wither. If we die on our own stalks, we know we will be buried in the cold earth; but the next year we will come up again,—only, instead of one, we will be two, three, or even five daisies. That’s the reason the family don’t die out. But, when somebody picks us and throws us away, we don’t know exactly what does happen.

“Coming down here, though, I heard something that makes me think that, after all, perhaps it isn’t such a dreadful thing to be picked and carried away from the place where one was born.

“I was out in the field with the family. We had just waved a good-morning to West Wind as he flew by, when I felt myself clutched by a hand,—not a little white one like yours, but a brown chubby one; and I heard a child’s voice say: ‘Oh, my! What a pretty Black-eyed Susan! I’m going to send her to the city for the sick children. She looks so gay and bright, I know they will be glad to see her.’ The next I knew I was in a box with a lot of my cousins, the Ox-eyes. I was the only one of our family, and at first I felt very unhappy and lonely to be shut up in the dark; but something that my cousins were saying soon made me forget all about it and listen.

“July was asking June, who is the oldest of the family, what ministering angels were. June said she did not know exactly; but she overheard the lady that put us in the box say to the boy and girl, when the girl asked if she did not think we must feel badly to be picked and shut up in a box to be sent ’way off from the meadows and fresh country air into the hot, dusty city, that she thought not, if we only knew we were ministering angels, and could cheer the poor little sick children. June said: ‘I listened hard to find out what the lady meant. She told the boy and girl that angels had wings, and that their dresses were white, just like ours. She talked a long time with them; and I think she meant that, if we didn’t scold about being taken away from the meadows, but smiled our brightest and happiest at the sick children, and didn’t complain even when they squeezed us hard, that, when we wither, perhaps we will have wings and fly away.’

“When June stopped, all the Ox-eyes called out: ‘O Sister June! Do you really think we’ll ever fly?’ And July said: ‘Oh, how much nicer than going down into the ground, even if you know you are coming up again!’

“‘Well,’ said June, ‘I can’t say positively; but I know that my grandmother once told me that, when she was young, a butterfly lit on her shoulder, and whispered in her ear, “I once was a daisy just like you,” which frightened her so she shook all over; and the butterfly flew away, and never came back again.’

“When I heard June say she thought we should all be beautiful butterflies, I felt so happy, until I happened to remember I wasn’t an Ox-eye in a white dress,—only a poor little Rudbeckia in a yellow one. I felt a big sob coming right up in my throat, when suddenly I thought, I’ll ask August—she’s the youngest of the family—what she thinks about it.

“August waited a few minutes, and then said: ‘Don’t you know, Susy, there are lots of yellow butterflies? Perhaps you’ll be one of them.’ So all the time I’ve been thinking of that; and, when the box was tossed and tumbled about, and we felt sore and bruised, I said to myself: ‘Never mind! Some time maybe you will be a lovely, big yellow butterfly.’

“But perhaps you are tired now; but, please, before you go to sleep, won’t you tell me what you think? Do you really, truly believe I’ll ever be a butterfly?”

The child’s sleepy little head nodded an assent; and the daisy contentedly curled over on her side, stifling the one homesick throb for a sweet breath from the meadows with the thought that perhaps ere morning dawned she might have spread her yellow wings. The nurse, passing through the ward at early morn, saw only a peaceful little sleeper. A happy smile hovered about her mouth, and in her hand was still clasped a faded flower. But, just as she turned away, the South Wind whispered in her ear this secret: “Just at break of day there floated out through the open window a beautiful yellow butterfly. It soared far above the brick walls and roofs of the houses, until at last it was only a tiny golden spot against the blue, blue sky.”—Selected.

WATCHED OVER.

A Scotch school journal recently published the following pathetic anecdote:—

The crack batsman of a school cricket team was the only son of a gentleman who for many years had been blind. He had played and loved the game in his boyhood; and, when his son was old enough to take a part in it, he would be led to the field every time he played, and anxiously follow every stroke through the eyes of his companions. Upon returning home, the game was eagerly discussed, and the son advised in every detail. Last summer the father died suddenly. The next week, to the surprise of the school, Tom, who mourned bitterly for his father, asked to take his place in the team. He played with unusual care and brilliancy, and, when the game was over, went to the umpire.

“How did I play?” he asked anxiously.

“Never better. You outdid yourself,” was the reply.

“Because,” the boy said, as he turned away, “it was the first time my father ever saw me bat.”—Youth’s Companion.

CONCERNING PINS.

One article of the laws of the ancient pin-makers of Paris was that no maker should open more than one shop for the sale of his wares except on New Year’s Eve and New Year’s Day. Then the court ladies obtained money from their husbands, and flocked to the shops for their yearly supply of pins. Hence the term “pin-money,” which, when pins became more easily obtained, ladies spent in other luxuries; but the term “pin-money” is still in use. So long ago as the year 1347 a royal princess had twelve thousand pins delivered from the royal wardrobe for her use; and in 1400 the Duchesse d’Orléans purchased of Jehan de Breconnier, pin-maker of Paris, several thousand long and short pins, besides five hundred pins of English make. Thus we find how long ago pins were made, and were in use in great quantities, both in England and in France. So we can well understand how, when this country was young, pins were to the colonists a very essential part of their outfit; and, when sending to the mother countries for different articles of household use, pins were never omitted from the lists. We find in an old Boston newspaper an advertisement dated May 11, 1761, setting forth that John and Thomas Stevenson had imported, among other commodities, pins and needles.—Interior.

Doctors and nurses realize the necessity of counteracting the effects of the “shock” which accompanies all accident and surgical cases, and which more often proves fatal than the original cause.

Spirit of the Press.

The Boston Transcript of December 22 thus speaks of the New World :—

A particularly interesting article in the current number of the New World by Rev. George Batchelor, secretary of the American Unitarian Association, entitled "The Mimicry of Heredity," will draw attention both to the subject of which it treats and to the review in which it appears. Everybody nowadays is reading and talking about Kidd's "Social Evolution," and this article is an original contribution to the same subject. The popular theories of heredity which are the slang of the readily wise are here shown to be a mixture of true heredity with quite another thing.

But we refer to this fascinating chapter, which will stimulate complementary as well as complimentary discussion, mainly because we wish to say a word in regard to the New World. One of the notable utterances of Anniversary Week was that in which Prof. A. V. G. Allen declared that no other review in the world is open to the advanced scholars of every denomination, through no other channel can their influence flow. This review is therefore the voice of the foremost men in religious thought,—the only voice through which they may find expression, through which the world may hear them. It is finely named the New World.

Efforts are being made to place this review on a permanent financial footing. They ought to receive generous support, and that from no one denomination alone. In name, in character, in aim, this is not the organ of a sect. The new world in which scholarship is not hampered by creeds, nor bound by ecclesiastical associations, nor dependent upon denominational favor, is the world now to be entered and possessed. That this review is opening up this world, and meeting the great opportunity before it, no one can doubt who looks over the names of its contributors. Leading scholars at home and abroad have both dignified the review and found in it a new organ of power. Holtzman and Pfeiderer in Germany, Réville and De la Saussaye in France, are only a few of the men who have given the New World rank in the Old World. Nor is its range a narrow one for scholars alone. The article we have quoted is, in the best sense of the word, a popular one, and represents the thoughtful consideration of familiar topics which makes the New World a necessity for the layman who would keep in touch with modern thought. But, in the nature of the case, the constituency of such a review cannot at first fully pay its expenses. Its continuance at the present time depends upon the support of those who will give something more than their subscription to maintain this quarterly in the high place which alone among other reviews it has chosen to occupy. No benefaction could be in a higher sense an investment than the gift which should establish the New World beyond peril. We commend it to the magnanimous laymen in every church who love the beautiful and open face of truth. A few such men could make the New World a permanent foundation on which every church would gain new strength and authority.

Charities and Reforms.

The Lend a Hand Home for Soldiers' Widows, at 37 Williams Street, has fitted up a building especially for hospital purposes. This will enlarge their opportunities in their charitable work. There will be simple services of dedication at this hospital at three o'clock in the afternoon of Sunday, January 6. It will be a favorable opportunity for the friends of the charity to visit the home and hospital.

The Immigrants' Homes supported by Methodist women are considered by their representatives as among the best works they carry on. They have one in Boston, one in New York, one in Philadelphia; and hundreds of women have passed through them to good Christian homes, and have, through the care given them in these Homes, been saved from lives which would have been worse than death.

Dr. Joseph Krauskopf is devoting all his perquisites and lecture fees to the establishment of a model farm near Philadelphia, where graduates of orphan institutions and other capable boys and girls may be trained into skilful farmers. It is to be modelled after one in Odessa, now in the third year of its existence. The trade and science of farming, stock-raising, dairying, and gardening will be taught practically and technically.

The first biennial report of the Illinois State Home for Juvenile Female Offenders is at hand. The Home has been open only a year. Seventeen girls have been received, of whom five have already been discharged. The report states that the general advancement of the girls is very encouraging, and that much has been done in these few months to soften their dispositions, improve their manners, and advance their education in the home and in the household.

Manual training in all departments is a part of the education of each girl. Judging from the well-known names of the board of trustees, there is no doubt of the wise, careful management of the Home. Dr. Jessie E. Shears is the physician.

A school for girls has been established in Ceylon which appeals earnestly to Americans for aid. Mr. Peter de Abreio recently visited England to explain the need of education in the island. After his return the Ceylon Educational League was formed, which maintains the Musæus Girls' School and Orphanage. It has two honorary secretaries in America, Mrs. Alice B. Stockham of Chicago and Mrs. C. P. Wallace of Massillon, Ohio. They need a permanent building in place of the present mud-walled structure covered by a roof of palm-leaves. The four English teachers give their services without pay, having left their homes to work for the elevation of women in this country. They ask for contributions to the building fund, and also for money to be used as free scholarships. Fifty dollars will pay a girl's expenses in the school for a year. Money may be sent to Mrs. Marie M. Higgins, Musæus Girls' School and Orphanage, Cinnamon Gardens, Colombo, Ceylon.

A new feature in electric railway work is an electric street-sprinkler used in Philadelphia on the suburban roads where much dust is raised by trolley-cars going at high speed. It has two 30-horse-power motors, holds 2,700 gallons of water, and can run 15 miles an hour while sprinkling.

In 1925 a prize of $1,000,000 will be given to the writer whom the Russian National Academy shall adjudge to have written the best biography of Alexander I. The prize is the outgrowth of a fund of 50,000 roubles given by a favorite minister of Alexander I. in 1825, and left to accumulate at compound interest for a century.

According to the Glasgow Evening News it appears that the latest statistics issued by the German Imperial Health Department give to Berlin the honor of being the healthiest city in the world. The death-rate is given as only 16.3 per 1,000. The unhealthiest city is Alexandria, which, despite its unvarying fine weather, its three hundred fountains, and its soft sea breezes, has a death-rate of no less than 52.9 per 1,000.

Soap is found to be one of the best known sterilizers of water suspected of infection. It seems that for a long time after the cholera epidemic of last summer the people of Hamburg were afraid even to bathe themselves with Elbe water; but MM. Forster and Nijland of that city claim to have shown by experiment that ordinary toilet soap, added at the rate of an ounce to about twelve quarts of water, will kill the cholera bacilli in about ten minutes.

Prof. Holder tells us that deep in the heart of Borneo there is a very curious bird, which is called the garden-bird. The bird is but a little larger than the robin, and builds a mound apparently three or four feet high, which, wonderful to relate, is hollow. This is not its nest, for it has one in a tree not far distant. So this mound of green twigs is simply a pleasure house, a summer home, perhaps, to which this little bird goes for a rest or a change.

Probably the oldest bicycle rider in New York is Mrs. Margaret Ploster of Schenectady, who is ninety-three years of age.

Dr. Mary P. Eddy was the first woman to receive a diploma from the Imperial Academy of Medicine in Constantinople, early this year, opening the way for a new era of woman's medical services throughout the empire.

It is proposed by some of the friends of the late Rev. Seth Chandler to erect, by subscription, a tablet to his memory in the Unitarian church, Shirley, of which he was pastor for over fifty years; also to place at the same time a tablet to Oliver Holden, the composer of that hymn to which Mr. Chandler himself refers in his history as "that divine tune, Coronation."—Commonwealth.

The North Carolina Christian Advocate contains an interesting article on the Webb School of that State and its principals. It is a leading preparatory school, and is called the strong right arm of Vanderbilt University. Thoroughness of work, interest in living topics, and moral discipline are said to be the leading characteristics of the schools; but the following hint of their methods has a strange ring to one acquainted only with the Northern preparatory schools: "The Webbs are disciples of the famous Dr. Busby. In this delicate age it is getting unpopular for teachers to use the rod, or, if they use it, they use one composed of lilies and roses, the latter stripped of thorns." The Webbs have beech limbs to furnish them with the very best material, and I have seen a string of boys somewhat less than a mile long led to the 'thicket.' Accounts of flogging have been greatly exaggerated."

Perhaps the most notable thing about the curriculum of the Philadelphia schools for manual training is the amount of work which is not manual training. There are five departments in the school,—the humanities, mathematics, science, drawing, and manual training. The curriculum is a constant source of surprise. What are we doing with German and analytics and chemistry and political economy in a manual training school? it is asked. We are doing with them precisely what other high schools are doing with them: we are trying to make them the instruments of culture. This misapprehension is doubtless our own fault. One would expect that in new schools the nomenclature at least would be accurate. But ours is singularly inaccurate. The name of one department out of five has been chosen to designate the whole, and a branch capable of representation in all grades of school work has been made to arbitrarily stand for a given grade. In this the movement is guilty of a double inaccuracy, and it is scarcely to be wondered at that the outside world has misunderstood both the content and grade of the schools.—Dr. C. H. Henderson, in the Popular Science Monthly for November.

HARVARD UNIVERSITY.—The "Harvard University Catalogue for 1894-95" is a volume of 623 pages, 40 pages larger than the catalogue for last year. A further comparison of it with last year's catalogue shows that, in spite of the severity of the times, the university has continued its steady growth. The courses of instruction offered by the Faculty of Arts and Sciences last year covered 51 pages: this year they cover 58. Changes are made in the courses given in many of the long-established departments of study, especially in Greek, English, philosophy, history, mathematics, physics, geology, as well as in the comparatively new department in the art of teaching. New departments have been established in architecture and in mining engineering. Last year one course only was offered in architecture. Five courses are now offered; and five more of higher grade are bracketed, a sign in this case that they will be offered when students are prepared to take them. Last year the courses given by the department of engineering did not cover three pages of the catalogue. This year they cover over six pages. This year, too, a course in astronomy is given, and also one in military science. The number of students has increased. In the college there are now 1,667, in the Scientific School 308, in the Graduate School 258, in the Divinity School 50, in the Law School 404, in the Medical School 454, in the Dental School 80, in the School of Veterinary Medicine 62, in the Bussey Institution 12. In the whole university there were last year 3,156 students: this year there are 3,290. In these numbers the students in the Summer School are not included. There were of them last year 346; this year, 493. With the increase in the number of students there is also an increase in the number of teachers. Last year there were 322 teachers: this year there are 337.

Temperance.

Dr. L. Bremner says that he has seen melancholia, more often mania, and very frequently general paresis, hastened and precipitated by excessive use of tobacco. That tobacco really does cause insanity is evidenced by the magic effect seen in some cases after the discontinuance of the drug.

In the County Tyrone, Ireland, there is a district of sixty-one square miles inhabited by nearly ten thousand people, having three great roads communicating with market towns, in which there are no saloons, entirely owing to the self-action of the inhabitants. The result has been that there is not a policeman in the district, the poor rates are one-half what they were before, and the police magistrates testify to the absence of crime and disorder.

Alarming figures are given as to the recent spread of drunkenness—or, at any rate, of excessive drinking—in France. In Marseilles there is now a drink-shop for every forty adults! The proportion of lunatics whose insanity is traceable to alcohol is also rapidly rising. It is believed that the phylloxera disease in the vineyards, by making wine scarce and dear, led to the habitual consumption of ardent spirits. The phylloxera is now got rid of, and cheap pure wine is again plentiful. But, probably, the new and evil habits will not be equally soon got rid of.

Alcohol clearly cannot lessen the power of outside influences which harm us. It can as clearly not increase our own powers in so far as they enter into this conflict with the outside world. It rather makes us less skilful and able. What can it do, then? It can deceive us. It dulls our appreciation of powers outside of us until they seem so much smaller that we are sure we can conquer them, and so we gain a feeling of satisfaction. Nine-tenths of those who take strong drink seek this feeling in alcohol. This is their "refreshing" at eventide, their "rest from the day's cares," their forgetfulness of sorrows; but it rests upon a deceit, and at the least trial falls into ruin. He who to-day forgets is not any stronger to-morrow, and so is constantly tempted to a new appeal to his false friend until his senses are so dulled that every duty is forgotten. His holiest interests are but shadows and mist before his eyes, and he knows nothing more but thirst for the deceitful drink. Even the defenders of alcohol at last call a halt; but they have forgotten that the first steps are much more easily undone than the later ones, when the brain has in a measure lost its power to control. They do not forget through malice, but because they have not rightly understood the physiological effect of alcohol.—Dr. Justus Gaule, in the Popular Science Monthly for November.

TALKS WITH MOTHERS.—No. 3. HAPPY BABYHOOD.

Every mother wants her baby to thrive, because a healthy child is a happy child. The question of how the baby shall be fed is demanding the attention, as never before, not only of the mothers in the land, but of the entire medical profession also, because it is now realized how much the health of a child can be influenced by proper nutrition during the years of babyhood. As the result of the improper feeding of the infant, the vitality of the child is impaired, and he grows up weak and puny. In these days when artificial food is being so generally resorted to for infants, the demand for a substitute for mother's milk has brought out many foods for which great claims are made. Gustav Mellin, an English chemist, was the first to discover and combine the requisite properties necessary for an artificial food, and with his discovery the rational feeding of infants commenced.

Mellin's Food is the only perfect substitute for mother's milk, and it has done more to make babies strong and healthy than anything else that has ever been invented. Mellin's Food possesses all the requisite heat and flesh producing and bone-forming constituents necessary to give a child health, vigor and vitality. Infants are exceedingly fond of it and thrive upon it when nothing else can be retained upon the stomach. If they have been weak, fretful and troublesome they become happy, healthy and active; bright eyes, rosy cheeks, firm muscles and a strong constitution are the inevitable results of using this excellent preparation. Mellin's Food, being highly nutritious and easily digested, is also perfectly adapted to the wants of invalids and convalescents.

Monthly Magazine. Ninth Year.

THE UNITARIAN.

No religious periodical in America has abler writers. Its matter is fresh, living, varied, abreast of the best thinking and scholarship of the age. Contains Sermons from the ablest Liberal Preachers; Articles on religious topics of living interest; Editorials; Literary Notes; Notices of the best Liberal Books; News from the Churches; Woman's Word and Work, etc.

UNSOLICITED COMMENTS:

I take great pleasure in the Unitarian and recommend it right and left. There are few other magazines I read so much.—Massachusetts.

I take a good many papers and magazines, but no other periodical so full of spiritual nutrition as the Unitarian. It is splendid.—Nebraska.

I thought the first number of the publication, years ago, a good thing, and I may say that my first estimate rather increases than otherwise, right up to the current number.—Wisconsin.

RHETORIC OF THE SKY AND SEA.

Within two weeks the following notice has been printed in a paper in one of the largest cities in the Union:—

Salem Baptist Church, Champlain Avenue, N.W., Rev. S. Geriah Lamkins, B.D., pastor: Preaching, 11 A.M., by the pastor. Subject, "The Magnitude, Light, and Revelations of the Guiding Stars of Individuals and Natives in their Respective Firmaments."

If we might be permitted in our glow-worm sphere to have an opinion, we would meekly suggest that "natives" in the foregoing is a misprint for nations. We will not, however, speak carelessly of the colored brother's rhetoric, since to our knowledge a clergyman of the Church of England has recently said in preaching upon Jonah, "And what, my brethren, were the reflections of the prophet in his strange marine abode?" And one of our own ministers,—every drop of whose blood was Anglo-Saxon,—in his early days, being unacquainted with astronomy, preaching from the text, "The Lord God is a sun and shield," began with this sublime strain: "My beloved brethren, have you ever considered how much we owe to the king of day, that mighty orb whose rays bring all things into visibility? Were it not for the splendid beams of the sun, we should have to be content with the pale and insufficient light of the moon."—Christian Advocate.

Editorial.

THE whole country has been protesting against the massacre in Armenia. Does it protest as vigorously against the recent outrages in Georgia? A white man and a Negro got into a quarrel, and the Negro would have been killed by the white man if he had not succeeded in killing the white man first. Then came an outburst of fiendish cruelty and revenge on the part of the riotous mob. Seven or eight Negroes—whose only offence was that they were distantly related to the murderer, and also that they did not know, and therefore could not tell, where the murderer was concealed—were cruelly murdered; and torture was inflicted upon others. The State authorities, however, were not oblivious to the disgrace and the lawlessness; and State troops were ordered out to suppress the riot. The real cure for all this evil is not alone in calling out the militia, but in developing a sentiment of justice and a respect for law and order in the South which shall make such scenes impossible.

FROM the very beginning Christianity showed a great capacity for sect-making. There are indications of the tendency to diverge in the disputes between Paul and Peter which represented different ideals and principles. In the first three centuries the swarm of Christian sects was very large. The unity which Christianity secured through its alliance with the Roman empire was a unity which was geographical and political rather than religious; and, when the Roman empire went to pieces, Christianity broke up into sections with it. The Roman Catholic Church has been able to maintain a unity which is organic, but not spiritual; and to-day, in this country and in Europe, the new Catholicism and the old are arrayed against each other. In the Catholic Church the development of different orders and societies has supplied, to some extent, the demand for variety which is secured yet more fully in the different sects of Protestantism. We begin to see to-day the waste that comes from the multiplication of religious asteroids; and the call for religious unity is an endeavor to counteract, by some centripetal principle of unity, the tendency to fly off into sects. But the best that we may expect to accomplish, and that which is most desirable, is to secure the unity which exists in diversity,—a unity like that which holds the planets in their courses, so that each moves in its own while they all move in some relation to each other, the sun shedding light and warmth and the planets reflecting to each other the light they receive.

THE distinction between Episcopalianism and Congregationalism is often lost sight of. But, when there is any talk of unity between these two branches of the Church, the differences soon come to light; and they are found to be not merely differences of creed or liturgy, but fundamental differences in relation to the source of authority of the Christian ministry. It is the old stumbling-block of the apostolic succession. The Congregational churches might indeed insist that the primitive Church was essentially Congregational, and that an organized prelacy was something of much later origin, and that, therefore, Episcopal bishops ought to receive their ordination from some Congregational church. If historic authority were the main thing, this argument would be valid; but it would be an immediate departure from Congregational principles to urge it, since it is part of the Congregational belief that the real apostolic succession is communicated, not through the Church, but through the Holy Ghost. It is not that Congregationalists place less stress upon ordination, but, rather, that they mean to give it a higher sanction. But this view of ordination does not make it a barrier to ministerial equality or intercourse, and is not, therefore, a barrier to Christian unity. A great deal of elasticity has been introduced in the interpretation of Episcopal creeds and standards. But the Episcopal theory of ordination is still too inflexible to permit the Episcopal Church to enter into the fellowship of other and larger bodies of Christians who share with them the honor of tracing their Christian lineage back to Jesus and the apostles.

ON the other side the Baptists in this country, comprising the largest number of Congregationalists, hold, like the Episcopalians, a tradition which is also an obstacle to their complete fellowship with other Christians. We mean the tradition of close communion. We call it a tradition because, like the Episcopalian tradition of apostolic succession or like the practice of infant baptism, it has no Scripture authority whatsoever. It is the more strange, therefore, that the Baptists, who pride themselves on taking the New Testament as their guide, should impose a usage for which not a single text in the New Testament can be cited, any more than a single genuine text can be found which teaches the doctrine of the trinity. It is very curious to see what doctrines have been built up simply on foundations, not of the New Testament word or spirit, but simply on pure assumption or inference. Thus, from the beautiful words of Jesus, "Suffer little children to come unto me," was drawn the remarkable inference that only children who were baptized would be received by him; and so priests have hastened to put a little water on a child's head before it dies, so that it may not be flung into hell instead of into the arms of Jesus. If such an inference is extraordinary, is it not also extraordinary for the Baptist Church to assume that, when Jesus asked his disciples to remember him at the last supper, he meant only those who had been baptized, and still further those who had been baptized by immersion, and that Baptists should thereupon refuse to observe this beautiful custom with other Christians who have never been baptized after their particular mode? Thus it is that Episcopalians fence themselves round with a theory of ordination, and the Baptists fence themselves round with a theory of communion, so that no Baptist minister would be allowed to administer the communion to the Episcopal laity and no Episcopal layman would be free to partake of the communion in a Baptist church, because, according to Episcopalian theory, the Baptist minister has not been ordained, and, according to Baptist theory, the Episcopalian layman has not been baptized.

It is the ambition of Leo XIII. to bring about a reunion of the Eastern churches with the Holy See; and to this end he has just written an apostolic letter, which is the result of a recent conference of certain Eastern prelates with the pope. In this letter Leo XIII. refers in eloquent terms to the dignity and glory of the Eastern Church, and to the particular customs and modes of worship which it has guarded and transmitted. The pope, therefore, has issued a series of regulations for the preservation of the Eastern rite, in which any Latin missionary who, by counsel or help, shall win over any Oriental to the Latin rite is to be deprived of and excluded from his office. This concession carries with it the right to use unleavened bread, and, we presume, to the communion in both kinds, as is the practice of the Eastern churches. Various other regulations are in the nature of generous concessions to Orientals in the use of their own forms and traditions.

THIS will make the work of Latin missionaries much easier. But that it will go very far to secure a union between the two churches we have no idea. The old theological division under which the Roman Church maintains that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and the Son, while the Greek Church maintains that the Holy Ghost proceeds only from the Father, still remains. It is the difference of two words only, and it is not likely that the Roman Church will expunge from its creeds this interpolation. But a still greater barrier to union lies in the fact that the Eastern churches are national churches, none of which would think for a moment of recognizing the spiritual supremacy of the Roman pontiff. The Greek Church in Greece, in Russia, in Bulgaria, in Asia Minor, and elsewhere, and the Armenian and Syrian churches, have their own separate and independent governments; and the patriarch of Constantinople no longer exercises authority over the Metropolitan of Greece or over the Church of Russia. If the Greek Church cannot be united under the authority of a single patriarch, it is still less likely to accept the authority of the pope of Rome. Too much significance must not, therefore, be ascribed to the directions of the pope to his Latin missionaries.

How easily personal and theological prejudices are carried into broader fields of work where they should be distinctly absent! Father Ducey attended the Lexow investigation, and brought upon himself the condemnation of Archbishop Corrigan. Dr. Parkhurst made a crusade for righteousness and good government, but his own presbytery declined to commend his work. It is curious indeed to find a representative of the Catholic Church on one side, and of the Presbyterian Church on the other, taking a position to furnish aid and comfort which must have made the heart of Tammany glad. The true inwardness of the matter is well stated by the Outlook: "There can be no question about the loyalty of the Presbyterian Church of New York to the great movement in behalf of civic righteousness, but there are many members of the presbytery who have not forgotten that Dr. Parkhurst is more than a leader in the cause of civic righteousness: he is also one of the great leaders of the liberal movement in theology. It is significant that the same papers which announced that a communication had been presented to Dr. Parkhurst, signed by distinguished representatives of all denominations in New York, and headed by Bishop Potter, asking what testimonial would be most appreciated by him, also announced that his own presbytery had delayed action for a month before venturing to approve his work. The trouble comes from the fact that the presbytery has in it so many irresponsible and unrepresentative men."

THE HOARY HEART.

There was never a time, perhaps, when moralizing of the bald, direct sort was more out of fashion than in our own, or when the experience of the old, in some of its phases, seemed to tell less upon the development of the young. The decay of reverence, not for religion and the higher range of morals only, but for what is sweet, lovely, and of good report even in the garnered wisdom of worldlings, is one of the sad signs of our time.

New knowledge has intoxicated the world; but, when the headiness of this fermenting wine has passed, we shall find that the old foundations still stand, based on deductions of the wisest heads, the richest hearts, of the race. Fact-gathering has been carried to the extreme limit in our schools: the children's heads are crammed with facts, ill-arranged and badly assorted, but partially understood, which help little toward a harmonious, all-round development, and in many cases impede growth.

Get wisdom, get understanding, says the sacred writer; but who thinks of instilling wisdom into young minds in our day? It is an old-fashioned, discredited virtue; but in the last resort we shall find it is the only sane rule of life,—the renewing power by which the soul is kept young and vigorous.

A few vital precepts by which life is kept lovely and fresh and vivid to the very end are worth whole libraries of unformulated facts. Our day is so overstocked with information and detail we are in danger of losing the power of living sanely, wholesomely, cheerfully, to the very end. Oh that the teachers, along with the "ologies," would put a few living principles into the children's heads and hearts, to make them hunger for the satisfaction of an ideal temperance and probity,—a rule of life that garners the capacity for enjoyment as something more precious than gold and rubies! Oh that they would give to the children the fine winnowed wheat of experience by which life is gently led into the way of never-failing zest and pleasure! There is no other word in our language, except love, so sadly abused as pleasure. The poor thing is dragged through all the filth and

Many things have contributed to the broadening of this idea. People have come to see that just as much imagination and mental grasp may go into the building of a great bridge as into the writing of a great book. The growth of manual training, the broadening and strengthening of our scientific schools and our institutes of technology, have introduced new ideals, and shown new educational standards. In the case of women this is even more evident. Once a girl's education was rated chiefly according to the number of "accomplishments" she could count on her fingers. If she could sing Italian songs, paint alleged pictures, embroider in wools and silks, she had received an education. It sounds odd to-day to read, in the strong and effective plea made by Miss Willard to the legislature of New York in 1819, her recommendation of "drawing and painting, elegant penmanship, music, and the grace of motion," as necessary branches for a female seminary. Yet her whole paper was an argument for more solid instruction of girls, and there is no more forcible way of estimating the changes brought about in seventy-five years than by comparing the actual facts then and now. Now girls study scientific cookery, practical sanitation, and kindred subjects; and no one hints that these matters belong to a lower class of interests than do other courses in the same college.

Education is becoming democratic. We are going back to the saying of Emerson that caste inequalities exist, not in outward accidents, but in the powers of expression and action; that the common man is the victim of events, the aristocratic man is at home in his own mind. This kind of aristocracy is not to be entered by accumulating a certain number of facts or even principles in one's own mind, only to be forgotten when a university degree is gained: it cannot be won by passing through a required number of courses; but it means getting control of one's own powers, getting mastery over one's own self, mentally and physically. Men now leave college to enter a factory, entering at the lowest grade of work, determined to master every round of the disagreeable, commonplace, necessary details. They endure the dust and grime, the noise of whirring wheels, that become torture to unaccustomed ears, and steadily and manfully work their way up. This is an aristocracy that must be earned, and we are beginning to find out that it means even more than we have expressed here. It means character.

GEORGE M. STEARNS.

How fine a man can be made from a rollicking, mischievous boy, a minister's son, who was known as the "parson's devil" because of his uncontrollable pranks, was seen in the life and character of George M. Stearns. The unique elements in the character of the boy were not lost or stifled in the growth of the man. The loving disposition so demonstrative in his childhood ripened into large capacities for affection and friendship in his later years. The geniality of the man was warm enough to be felt through the whole State. The responsibilities of life, the burdens and attritions of large practice, could not repress that bubbling humor which was one of his most characteristic features, and endowed him with a perpetual youthfulness. Those who heard his address at the Unitarian Festival some years ago will never forget the remarkable impression he made. His father, Dr. Stearns, was a Unitarian minister at Rowe. The son was also closely identified with the Unitarian Church; and the minister who preached in the Unitarian church at Chicopee a few years ago had the responsibility of preaching to two of the most prominent men in Massachusetts,—Gov. George D. Robinson and George M. Stearns. He was a liberal giver, a warm friend and supporter of the ministry, though as far as possible from the old Puritanic or ascetic type. In the old Puritanic scheme there was no provision for such a man in the church. Mr. Stearns would have been altogether too worldly to be brought under that scheme of salvation. Nothing but his conversion would have sufficed. Yet it would not have been difficult to find under the Puritan scheme close-fisted, shrewd, canting deacons, whose thin veneering of piety covered a very worldly nature; and the verb "to deacon,"

the street cars monopolizing the few seats that the street car company vouchsafes to its patrons, and almost never rising for a woman or an older man.

One day last week several passengers entered a car when the conductor was at the front, and did not notice in what order they came. Among them was a tired-looking woman with a boy apparently in his teens. All had to stand. Later a seat was made vacant; and the boy was slipping into it with hot haste, when the conductor, who was a gentleman, said, "My boy, let this lady have that seat." In a shamefaced way the boy stood up; and, half apologetically, the weary woman dropped into it. "This lady" was the boy's mother, though the conductor did not know it. Unconsciously, he had taught that boy a needed lesson in politeness. Why had he not had it before? Was it his mother's fault?

Too often this rudeness on the part of children is considered smart. One of the blemishes of an otherwise clean and attractive play that has been popular lately is that the children in it are so rude. Perhaps it may be said that it would not be a genuine picture of Maine life, were they otherwise; but, if it be true that those are typical children, then that proves what has been already said, that American children need better training in the arts of polite life.

Polite manners are, it is true, a matter of the heart; but the heart may be right, and its external manifestation uncouth. What parents and teachers need to do is to show that inward politeness and outward decorum and courtesy should be inseparable. And boys and girls who are old enough to observe should be incited to select models whom they may imitate to their own advantage and to the pleasure of those who come in contact with them.

It is possible—at least the charge has to be met—that some of this lack of deference and courtesy may arise from our democratic institutions and methods of life. When Cobbett was here, he was much impressed with the good manners of American boys and girls. He noted that they are not as servile as the children of the Old World. But perhaps, in the development of smartness, independence, and freedom, we may have gone to the other extreme, until we are in danger of having the rude standards of the football field introduced into private life. Children uniformly take their manners from their elders; and, if there is something wrong in the manners of our youth, it may be that it is just because there is not that deference, courtesy, and respect for others, that old-fashioned gentility, among their seniors which there ought to be. If the boy did not give the seat in the car to his mother, it may be because half a dozen women may sometimes be found standing in the street-car where a dozen men occupy seats; and, if the car is in the Back Bay, the proportion of selfish men may be quite as great as if going through the South Cove.

CASTE IN EDUCATION.

Our forefathers were a plain, hard-working people, who cut down their own trees, tilled their own fields, and stood much on a common level, so far as outside distinctions were concerned. All were poor together, and shared what would now be called privations. The leading man of the town, he who was elected representative year after year, was quite likely to be a blacksmith or an inn-keeper when at his own work; and, apparently, no one thought the worse of him for it. Still, the possession of education, the power of book-learning, were always grounds for unusual respect from one's neighbors; and the claim of reverence freely accorded to the minister came not solely from his authority as spiritual magistrate, but from his superiority in realms of knowledge but little explored by the busy people of his charge. He shared with the chief dignitaries of the State in honor. Col. Higginson has drawn a graphic picture of the black-gowned, black-gloved, solemn personage known as the Puritan minister. One wonders if he didn't feel a little lonely occasionally, so and does not wonder at the occasional cases of extreme reaction that have been preserved for us. The dignity of the minister has always been shared, however, by the lawyer, and in lesser degree by the physician; and the common reference to these as the "three sobriety and self-control. Brutality comes in from lack of observance of the Greek mean, the point beyond which privilege becomes license.

Dire are the penalties imposed upon us for not learning God's laws of restraint and temperance, and for the too late discovery of the ease with which abused nature turns to disgust. To know the delicate, high, and holy use of his powers is the birthright of every child. Without this our religion cannot be religious,—it will only be perfunctory; our morality will not be moral, our love will not be lovely, all our efforts will lack spontaneity, our prayers cannot be truly prayerful. God cares not for a wilted offering: he asks the sweetest and holiest emotions of the soul.

CHURCH AND STATE.

We publish on another page some extracts from a sermon by Rev. Dr. Hawthorne, a Baptist minister of Atlanta, Ga., on the subject of "Church and State." The Baptist Church has, from the beginning, taken a firm stand against the alliance of Church and State; and Dr. Hawthorne is true to the principles and traditions of his denomination. We often hear such doctrines and principles as he defends set forth by secularists, and those whose interest in religion is somewhat doubtful; but the most ardent secularists could not state more forcibly, radically, or logically the reasons why, in this country, Church and State should not be tied up together. That these utterances come from a Christian minister, who is as deeply interested in the progress of religion as in the progress of the State, ought to add much to their force. It is in the interest of religious liberty as well as of civil liberty in this country that no element of civil or ecclesiastical freedom should be sacrificed through compromise or co-ordination. We have pointed out before in these columns that, while the American principle of separation of Church and State is theoretically accepted, there are various practical departures from it which are illogical and dangerous. The State in this country never seeks to acquire power at the expense of the Church: the encroachments are stimulated and projected from the side of the Church. They are endeavors to secure for organized religion political privileges, concessions, and power. There are those who insist that God and Jesus Christ shall be recognized in the Federal Constitution, or on the use of State funds for sectarian purposes, or on the appointment of chaplains in public services, or on the exemption of denominational school property, churches, and parsonages from taxation. All such agitations, and every concession or compromise they secure, however apparently innocent, are fraught with danger.

Dr. Hawthorne speaks none too strongly in repudiation of such secret organizations as the American Protective Association, which seeks to introduce religious tests into politics, and, while ostensibly seeking to preserve religious liberty, is aiming a blow at the political rights of American citizens. At this time Dr. Hawthorne's words need to be widely circulated and carefully heeded. They are bold and manly, and as religious as they are thoroughly patriotic.

MANNERS.

What is to be done with our boys and girls? "Ours" because we find the failings in our own children, if we look carefully enough. Where does the blame lie, that they are so rude at times,—so inconsiderate, so inclined to take the easy and selfish side of life? Is it our own fault, or can we blame the climate for ill manners as well as for sharp voices? Certainly, there is an outside manner among young people across the sea that is strikingly absent among the great mass of American children. Watch a bevy of young girls on their way to their homes or pitiful boarding-houses in the dusk of evening. How they delight to push against those they meet, as though by accident, and then snicker, and seem to think it the funniest thing in the world, poor things, so few are their opportunities for real fun! Look at a pack of boys—the word "pack" is deliberately chosen—just let loose from school, each trying to outbid the other in rough horse-play and, perhaps, good-natured attacks upon passers-by and upon each other. Every trace of gentleness and refinement seems lacking. See them in degradation of this world, is smutched and tainted with every species of vice and low self-indulgence, and then held up dripping and misshapen as something worthy of desire. It would seem that the world might be reformed, could we but vitally teach the children what pleasure really is,—how chaste and pure and simple, how easily extracted from common things and the mere essentials of existence!

From an age of shams, half-truths, and false science, from the smattering and glossing of minds smart, but not profound, we must return for the training of youth to the foundations of reverence, justice, fidelity, and constancy. Either the science is very poor or the morality is very thin that mutually exclude each other in the schools. To make the youth love virtue, what more than this is required, and what less will satisfy the demands of conscience?

The waste of youthful feeling in all that makes youth desirable, lovely, and blessed to itself and to the world,—especially in our great cities,—is enough to make us shed tears of blood. New-fangled systems of ethics, new and showy styles of economics and political economy, are not going to cure the evil. A man may have all these things in his head; and yet his heart may be gray and hoary if he has not learned the art of keeping the little ray of enthusiasm, the twinkle of deep and healthy emotion, alive in his soul.

It is the day of youth that wishes to appropriate the sheaf of experience without going into the field to reap and bind. Youth pushes and jostles age in the pulpit, at the bar, in the counting-room, in our schools and colleges. Age must often yield the pas, though better equipped for service than ever before.

There is waste of faculty at this end of the line; but it is sadder and more abundant at the other, where too much strain and stress are laid on youth, where mental and physical capital are squandered in few years which ought to last until extreme old age, and still leave a handsome balance.

Youth is only the velvet on the flower of life. While we say it is passing, it is gone: the first gray hairs have appeared, the first wrinkles about the eyes. But sadder far than these physical tokens are the signs that the power of enjoyment and self-renewal has been wasted. While the youthful glow still lingers on the cheek, the heart has begun to grow hoary. It has lost its energy by which it creates its nobler zests and appetites. The awful admonitory and punitive powers that exist in nature can prove to us both God and immortality. The lash of Nemesis was not given for self-flagellation to a creature that may suck poison as often and as long as he pleases, and still enjoy life. The soul, avenging itself for its own sins and abuses, shows that it has a power lying beyond the sphere of will. Its weapons are disgust, powerlessness, satiety, nameless ennui, that lead to suicide, to insanity, or to death-in-life.

The faculty of relish is the most delicate and vibratory and responsive of all the qualities of soul. God has written his sternest laws, most awful and irreducible to formulas, over against the abuse of the good gift of enjoyment. Punishment lies hidden in the nature of every emotion, every impulse, every desire. It is only a benumbing, a lowering, you say; but what more awful than these? The deadly oncoming of indifference; the blasé, worn-out temper; fires burned down to ashes; a black ring of dead things, a smoky pit, where once was a rose-garden; hatred and loathing at the sound of shawm and cymbal and trumpet, the dancing feet of maidens, and the witchery of bright eyes,—can anything be more retributive than these? Beauty, love,—so called,—faith, hope, all fallen to rotteness; cursing and ribaldry in the place of prayer,—these come with the hoary heart, and come too often while the maiden down is still upon the lip.

Do we not see all around us the wrecks made by this species of waste? There may be no actual debauchery, there may be sufficient strength to keep the respectable appearance and to win what is called success in the world; but the gold of youthful feeling has been scattered to the winds, and men are led by mere hoariness of heart to commit suicide without apparent motive.

Temperance and probity, the old Greeks taught, were the health of the youthful soul. These have not been extensively taught in our colleges. We see athletics as a craze, not as a noble and wholesome training in sad to say, has actually been introduced in the dictionary as a synonyme of pious cheating. Mr. Stearns covered his faults with no pious evasions. Everybody knew that he loved horses and a horse-race. And one of the most familiar and characteristic stories about him is his reply to the minister who, having criticised horse-racing in a sermon, felt obliged to apologize personally to Mr. Stearns when the service was through. "It is a mighty poor sermon," said the latter, "that does not hit me somewhere." The man was not a Pharisee or an egotist; but he could quote the Bible as easily as authorities on law or make a speech, earnest and without pretension, at a Unitarian conference.

He stood high in his profession, not only for his inimitable addresses, but for his sound legal knowledge and ability. His nature was one which easily revealed itself, and it was always the same. But only those who got near to his heart knew how rich and deep were his friendships and affections. His reputation extended far and wide; but he was most loved in the town of Chicopee, which he had made his home for so many years, and by those who had felt his hand-clasp and come within the charm of the family circle.

Musings.

SEVERAL of my friends have adopted a new fad. It is that of going without breakfast until twelve or one o'clock each day. The assumption is that dyspepsia in this country arises mainly from heavy breakfasts; and so this rock of stumbling is not reduced to very small proportions, but is to be removed altogether, and consolidated with dinner or lunch. I have a friend who has tried it with great success. Although during the last summer he arose early, at 5.30 or 6.30 o'clock, and took a great deal of exercise in the shape of manual labor, he ate nothing until twelve o'clock. The assumption is that it takes the stomach time to wake up; that it is not very vigorous in early morning; and that it is better, therefore, to wait until noon before putting it in commission. My friend who has adopted this plan has certainly improved in health, and is an enthusiastic advocate of the change. In his case it has certainly worked well. But then I have another friend who, on finding that his supper distressed him, abolished it, and adopted the two-meal plan, and then, finding that his dinner was still an inconvenience, concluded to live on one meal a day, and to take that at breakfast. For many years, therefore, he has eaten a breakfast of remarkable dimensions, enough to satisfy him for twenty-four hours. I am not going to commit myself by attempting to decide which method is better for dyspepsia,—that of making the early breakfast the heartiest and the only meal or that of giving up the breakfast altogether. My experience with the human stomach is that it can be made to adapt itself to a variety of customs and contents. It learns to adjust itself to circumstances with a remarkable power of accommodation. But, after living outside of that organ, and perhaps, to a certain extent, inside of it, for nearly fifty years, I have about concluded that a light Continental breakfast, a mid-day lunch, and a six or seven o'clock dinner, is about the right thing—for some people.

THOUGH I leave to the doctors the question of the gastric value of the annihilation of breakfast, I cannot help thinking that there are certain moral and æsthetic losses in its abolition. It takes away one of the most powerful motives for getting up in the morning. The sluggard will say, "If there is no breakfast until twelve o'clock, I will not get up until 11.30." But such logic will be fatal to the new theory, because it would bring the hour of rising and the hour of breakfast too near together; and the person who rose at 11.30 would be obliged to take his breakfast at 5.30, which, again, would bring his dinner somewhere about midnight. As I look back to my boyhood, better than any alarm clock as an inducement for early rising was the announcement when I was called that there were to be buckwheat cakes for breakfast; and with it is associated the remembrance of huge bowls of bread and milk, which furnished a good lining for a school-boy. There are memories of coffee and hard-tack taken on the plains just as the summer sun was rising; and there are memories of camp breakfasts with my friends the Shaybacks in which the hot Johnny-cake helped to make life worth living; and there are memories of oatmeal breakfasts in Scotland, where delicious cream and oat-cakes were united with "these porridge." If the medical world decides that the breakfast must be annihilated, I may yield to the edict; but it will not be without a pang.

Brevities.

A writer in England estimates that the extra expense incurred by the community at the Christmas season amounts to $65,000,000.

Mrs. Yates of New Zealand is the only woman mayor in the British empire. She is to visit England on a lecturing tour at the close of her term of office in New Zealand.

It is said that a ton of gold used in filling teeth is annually buried in American cemeteries. This presents a new temptation to ghouls, and is another argument for cremation.

The pastoral epistle written by Rev. George M. Bodge of Leominster to his people may find an application outside of his own parish, just as the letters of Paul and John, which were written for special churches, and not for the general public, have, nevertheless, been very useful for general edification.

Just how much the Armenians care for religion and education, and what sacrifices they are ready to make to secure these, may be seen from the fact that the Armenian Protestants in Turkey raised $37,000 last year for the support of their churches and schools. And this is the people the Turks are trying to stamp out.

It is a part of the mission of women to help men fulfil their manhood, as it is a part of the mission of men to help women fulfil their womanhood. When viewed from this aspect, the relation of the sexes assumes a higher significance; and such subjects as suffrage stand on a higher plane because women need the opportunity which it gives and men need the results of the duty it imposes.

It would add a new terror to the ministry if ministers were to be held responsible for holding church property. In England a man stumbled over some railings in front of an East London Baptist church. He sued the minister for damage. The judge maintained that the minister was no more responsible for the chapel in which he preached than the judge was for the court in which he administered justice.

Rev. William R. Lord of Christ Church, Dorchester, has tendered his resignation, to accept the call of Unity Church, St. Paul, Minn. Of course, his resignation in Dorchester is a sad blow to this society. But the courageous, resolute, and generous spirit in which it is accepted shows that societies as well as ministers may be led to take just and reasonable views in regard to the claims in other fields of the cause which it is the duty of all churches to promote. Mr. Lord has worked with great earnestness and self-sacrifice in behalf of the society at Harrison Square; and his influence has been felt in Boston and throughout the whole community in favor of good government, temperance, and other reforms, to an extent which makes his departure a public loss. But the loss to Boston will be balanced by the gain to St. Paul.

Pro and Con.

IS IT THE ONLY EXCEPTION?

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

In a letter to the New York Herald styled "An Interview," Col. R. G. Ingersoll says:

The world is growing better. There is more real liberty, more thought, more intelligence, than ever before. The world was never so charitable or generous as now. We do not put honest debtors in prison, we no longer believe in torture. Punishments are less severe. We place a higher value on human life. We are far kinder to animals. To this, however, there is one terrible exception. The vivisectioners, those who cut, torture, and mutilate in the name of science, disgrace our age. They excite the horror and indignation of all good people. Leave out the actions of those wretches, and animals are better treated than ever before.

Is this the only "terrible exception"? Perhaps the colonel knows of no other. He does not go to church. If he did, he could not enter the portals of any of our fashionable places of religious entertainment without seeing attached to the carriages that line the sidewalk, whose owners are acknowledging their sins within the sanctuary, poor suffering brutes whose backbones have been amputated, and whose faces are distorted by the agonizing pressure of the curb-bit and check-rein.

The great agnostic is constantly inveighing against religion, but this is a stronger argument against some of its professors than any that he has yet adduced.

THE GREENVILLE (S.C.) SALE.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

We wish to thank the many kind friends who responded to our call for aprons for a sale to be held early in December. The responses were very generous; and we feel much pleased at the result, for we realized about $100. Several ladies and children were dressed in Mexican style; and, with the help of a young lady just from Mexico, we made several Mexican dishes, and served them in a room decorated in Mexican colors. The recipes for these dishes were printed in little booklets and sold, but we have quite a number left. If any one will send three two-cent stamps, I shall be pleased to send one. These recipes we have tried in our own family, and find them delightful.

We have tried to answer all contributors personally, but some came with no mark by which they could be identified; but they were very gladly received.

We feel that perhaps the richest result of our sale has been the bond of sympathy that has grown up between us and those who have helped us in this matter. We feel richer not only in dollars, but in friends. The world is wider and sweeter to us than before.

Rev. Mr. Westall of Asheville, N.C., preached for us Sunday, December 23. We held our meeting in the opera house, but it was too cold to be comfortable. He came as a stranger, but left us a new friend. He told us he thought he might be able to help us with our building, so our hopes grow.

MR. CURTIS'S BIOGRAPHER.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

Your "Observer's" criticism of Mr. Curtis's biographer is an interesting one. I find the account of Mr. Curtis's religious life inadequate, and have criticised it as so elsewhere. But I think your correspondent will be surprised when I tell him that Mr. Curtis's biographer is a very radical Unitarian of the unchurched variety, much more negative in his theology than Mr. Curtis was. Certainly, the implication of his statement that "narrowness and bigotry" are specially "the peril of a belief rejecting much of what is most generally accepted" is amusing and a little startling. But perhaps, instead of rebuking Mr. Cary, we should welcome his expression as a reminder that "narrowness and bigotry" are not the exclusive peril of the conservative and orthodox. For myself, I have found much more narrowness and bigotry among extremely radical people than among the orthodox; but that is probably because I have seen more of them. The typically narrow and bigoted individual of our time is—I suggest—Col. Ingersoll; but I have known some Unitarians who would put him to his trumps. (And, by the way, I have seemed to find something less than absolute breadth and perfect liberality, a certain inclination to narrowness and bigotry, in your correspondent's suggestion that all of Mr. Curtis's political and social earnestness and fidelity came from his Unitarian connection, and could have had no other source. In fact, it had many others.) To say that Mr. Curtis was not narrow and bigoted at the end of such a story as Mr. Cary has so admirably told is, of course, very much like saying that he did not steal chickens or cheat at cards. Mr. Cary himself says, "It is needless" to say it. It is so far as Mr. Curtis is concerned, but it is not needless to be reminded by a radical thinker that narrowness and bigotry are the besetting sins of "the dissidence of dissent" as well as of a straight-out Orthodoxy. JOHN W. CHADWICK.

TEN PER CENT. INVESTMENTS.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

The investments to which I wish to call the attention of your readers are not to be had on the stock exchange or, perhaps, of any of the State Street bankers. They are much safer than those in which the bankers and brokers deal. They are the kind which the old epitaph had in view when it said, "What I gave, I have." In this class of investments I observe that there is a very wide variation in the margin of profits. I have no quarrel with those who are willing to put their money into projects that pay only two or three per cent.; but I am a great believer in "gilt-edge securities" that pay a high rate, and that permanently. I see that many persons, apparently from want of experience or thoughtfulness, do not know these high-class investments. They do well to put their money (if they have plenty to give) into the two-per-cent. variety; but it is a pity that they do not know the existence of a superior sort.

For example, I see to-day in one of the newspapers that some kind-hearted person makes an appeal for raising money to give a gold watch and chain to a policeman who saved a boy's life from drowning. At once individuals rush in, and subscribe hundreds of dollars for this praiseworthy purpose. I like this; but what I find fault with is that people will give five, ten, and twenty-five dollars each for the brave policeman's watch, and will give no more, or nothing at all, for certain great and permanent investments,—for instance, such a one as Gen. Armstrong organized to reach millions of souls starving for wisdom and the bread of life, and in their ignorance a menace to the health of the nation.

Take another instance. The Unitarian churches are laboriously supporting the Montana School, which reaches the children of one small tribe of Indians. This is worthy work, though there is no doubt that the national government, which owes peculiar duties to its Indian wards, ought to assume the whole system of education among the Indians. It is also to be hoped that the time is not far distant when we may hold the government responsible for this work. Meanwhile we have recently been told of the work of the Calhoun School, started in Alabama by Miss Dillingham and Miss Thorn. This school has had three hundred pupils, besides a large class of adults in the night school. In other words, it directly educates three hundred and fifty individuals, at a cost of $5,000 a year, or less than $15 each. These pupils are not the members of a little local group or tribe; but they belong to a race, numbered by millions, whose destiny for weal or woe touches a vast section of our common country. The Montana School educates some sixty children, and costs $200 apiece, aggregating more than twice the whole expense of the Calhoun School. Granting heartily that the Montana School yields 2 or 3 per cent., is it not clear that the other is at least a 10 per cent. investment?

Again, at Tuskegee, as at Hampton or Atlanta, you have not simply boys and girls, the average children of the neighborhood, as at Calhoun; but you have the picked youth of their race, those who have enterprise enough to work out their own education, those who will be leaders and teachers in hundreds of communities. There are seven hundred pupils at this one great school. The small sum of $50 a year secures the cost of the training of one of these scholars. Here is another 10 per cent. investment.

I hope that your readers will not misunderstand me. I am not writing to advise them against the good 2 per cent. securities. I write with an eye for true perspective and a sense of due proportions. I wish your generous readers to see the great, remunerative, and truly hopeful things in their comparative magnitude. If people will give ten or twenty-five dollars each to encourage policemen to do their duty and to be brave, how much will they be seized with enthusiasm to give toward the great life-saving enterprises of the nation?

CHARLES F. DOLE.

dicular, cut here and there by little bays that form the mouths of cañons that are in various instances dotted with cottages and hotels. Avalon is the largest of these settlements, standing directly on a crescent-shaped beach, the mouth of a deep cañon that reaches back into the mountains that are gradually lost in the blue haze that hovers about their peaks. Avalon is crowded in summer with Southern Californians; and, possessing a wonderful climate that makes each day like its fellow, never too warm and never too cold, it fills up with Eastern tourists in the winter,—a winter in name alone, as the island is then covered with wild flowers.

Almost the first thing one hears here are the legends about the old islanders and a mysterious temple that was away off in some cañon, a temple to the Indian god, Chinghinich. Then, if it is ridiculed, some one quotes old Torquemada, and gives almost verbatim his description of the temple, which is to the effect that, when he landed, the natives took him to the so-called temple, that was a circular place surrounded by a fence of stones and posts driven into the ground, in the centre of which was a huge god that had the sun and moon painted on its sides; while the posts were decorated with pictures and feathers, certain birds, the Spaniards learned, being sacred to the god. The temple has totally disappeared, but has been the object of search ever since the description of it was found.

The curiosity stores of the little town abound in strange objects in stone that have been taken from the graves and mounds of the natives, and there are many things to arouse the curiosity and interest of the visitor. The principal Indian site has been covered by the Hotel Metropole; but from this place tons of material, it is said, were taken some years ago, and sent to various institutions.

Recently, in wandering through the island, about fifteen miles from this locality, I came upon several sites where the natives had lived, easily recognized by the black earth that had been discolored by the fires built upon them for ages. This earth was mixed with abalone shells, speaking evidence of native occupation, as the localities were two or three miles from the coast where the shells were obtained.

The first evidence I found of the old inhabitants was a cavern. I was following down a small rocky cañon, hoping to find a trail up to a singular boulder I had noticed several miles away, when I discovered what appeared to be the mouth of a cave at the level of the winter stream. Creeping in, I found that it led upward, but had been so filled in from the wash of the stream that it could not be entered. Climbing up the bank, I saw that the cavern was formed of an immense boulder, and, on passing around, found on the opposite end an opening large enough to contain a family, and that had evidently been used by a number of natives. The floor of the cavern was strewn with or made up of the tell-tale black earth and bits of abalone, and numbers of these beautiful shells could be seen in the cave. A huge rent in the boulder had been covered with small rocks as a roof, which had fallen in, showing that an earthquake or something had disturbed the rude home.

On the floor were several articles representing the household gods. Among them was an old stone mortar that had been used to grind their acorns, and near by was the grinder or pestle. Digging in the black earth, several curious objects were uncovered,—an oblong bead, partly punctured and made of steatite from the neighboring quarry; a large oval stone with a hole in the centre, either used as a weight or in some game, like quoits. There were several pieces of bone knives, a piece of a bone flute or musical instrument, which was simply the hollow leg of some animal punctured with holes, and one end stopped with asphaltum. Some of the abalone shells had the holes closed in the same manner with asphaltum, and were used as drinking vessels and for various purposes.

Within a radius of a mile I discovered the sites of four or five Indian settlements or villages, and many curious objects. From one location several feet of native beads were taken that had been buried with their owners. There were ornaments of pearly abalone, fish-hooks of the same, and bands of the shell to bind upon the head,—suggestive of æsthetic tastes; flint daggers, arrow-heads of white quartz; scrapers or grinders, dishes of steatite or harder stone, ground out after infinite labor. Some of the latter would hold a quart: others were small and used as paint pots, the paint being found in one.

Perhaps the most interesting spot visited was the ancient quarry where the steatite mortars were made. Here were all the evidences of ancient manufacture, and on the face of the rock the circular markings of many pots, as they were begun and left years, probably ages, ago.

It is said that the natives were Serranos, and that the last were removed to the mainland by the mission fathers when the missions were established by Junipero, Serra; but nothing definite is known. All that remains to tell the story of the native race are the curious objects in stone that are found here and there on the island.

A BREEZE FROM THE SOUTH.

BY REV. GEORGE L. CHANEY.

When the czar of Russia, inspecting the proposed route of a railroad from St. Petersburg to Moscow, and noting its crookedness, took his pencil and drew a straight line from city to city as the course he wished, he only anticipated the imperious demands of commerce in this latter day. Millions are spent and spending yearly to shorten the time-distance between one industrial centre and another, or one strategic point and another; and, not content with what steam-engine and electric trolley can do, the impatient car of progress is proposing to take on wings, and literally to go by the air-line from city to city. Rapid and cheap transit is coming to be the decisive factor in determining the values of products and the location and growth of cities. As the Suez Canal revolutionized commerce, so the coming Nicaragua water-way will reverse some of the great trade-currents of the world. The Gulf Stream of traffic will run the other way; and the Father of Waters will carry his loads of cotton, corn, coal, and manufactures to the South-west instead of the North-east.

In this bouleversement of trade, how inevitably the Gulf States and cities of this Union will spring into importance and increase! New Orleans, with its deepened ship-channel and its capacious levees, will be the broker between America's abundance of goods and Asia's abundance of people. Galveston, with the jetty-harnessed tide of its great bay, ploughing a furrow twenty feet deep across its bar, will give and take of the abundance of sea and land; Mobile will barter Alabama's coal and iron for the sweets and spices of both Indies; and Pensacola and Tampa will make Cuba and Chicago partners in a reciprocal business.

It takes no prophet to foretell the coming greatness of the emancipated South. Worldly men see it, if the children of light are still in the dark about it. Money by the millions is spending itself in railroad, mining, irrigating, manufacturing, producing enterprises. Long-headed, far-sighted capital is looking South for its future investments. The star of empire, which formerly went West, is now facing South. Many a frost-nipped emigrant from Nebraska and the chilly North-west is moving South or South-west, and erelong these Southern States will have the elect people of the country among their permanent residents.

If we had a prescience of all this before our recent tour from Richmond, Va., to San Antonio, Texas, by the border States, and back to Richmond by the Gulf States, we feel a certainty of it now. And, whatever interest we previously had in colonizing an expurgated Christianity at the South, is intensified by what we have seen. The country needs it; for, with few exceptions, the religious teachers of the South are so committed by their church standards to disproved views of the Bible, and so wedded to superannuated dogmas and methods, that they do not dare or care to approve the results of modern scholarship, even when they know them, or to accept the emendations which science has made upon conventional Christianity. As a consequence, the thinking, reading people, who find the heresy of truth, as it appears in all the live literature of the day, can get no respectful recognition in any of the churches. Cast out and cast down, these sincere people have no remedy but silence, and no companionship but the solitude of their own hearts. They make an appeal to the Unitarian Church which no other church can or will listen to. Whether these isolated protestants of the spirit can be affiliated, folded, brought into correspondence, if not immediate co-operation, with societies after their own hearts or not, remains to be seen. Already something has been done toward this happy end; and, for one, the writer of this letter counts it a high privilege to minister to these sheep in the wilderness.

Not that the South is a wilderness to any other than the honest unbeliever in traditional opinions in religion. In other ways one may find a genial neighborhood and make a contented home in many portions of the South. But liberal Christianity, as it is found under many sectarian names at the North, is not commonly found here.

So much in explanation of our Southern ministry of reconciliation through religious sympathy. We do not ignore and would not conceal the difficulties of the work and the paucity of its visible results. And yet, if there be any virtue or any praise, it must be in the furthering thoughts of whatsoever things are true, honest, just, pure, lovely, and of good report, and their presentation wherever they are needed,—which is everywhere, South as well as North.

It is never pleasant, but it is sometimes necessary, to dwell upon the hard side of the situation. We quote from a letter recently written by the Southern vice-president of the Women's National Alliance,—a woman who has had ample opportunity to know whereof she writes,—as a fair and strong putting of the Southern problem:—

"How impossible it is for the American Unitarian Association to meet everybody's demands, with an empty purse which depends on the wealthier churches for filling, and how hard it is for our Southern churches to realize that exactly the same conditions exist in every society from San Antonio, Tex., to Highlands, N.C.! Numbers few; intelligence and interest out of all proportion to pecuniary condition; indifference, prejudice, or open hostility the attitude of those outside the immediate church; a population migratory and changing; restlessness among the clergy and timidity and self-distrust among the people, combined with enthusiasm and belief in the cause, and great anxiety for success; business depression universal, and results small,—out of all proportion to the force expended. The old simile of using a trip-hammer to crack a nut comes into mind. There is one thing, however, which every Southern minister knows; and that is that, if the man who may be considered the strongest man in the denomination should be put in his place, his success would be no greater than that of the present incumbent. There are some things that cannot be hurried. The ascent of common sense is a slow process. To disabuse a conservative mind or a conservative people of its prejudices is not the work of a day, nor to be achieved by a revival meeting, although I think, if we could only get the masses of the people to come together, to be revived by our thought, the rate of progress might be somewhat increased."

I would add to this extract that nobody down here is afraid or daunted by the lions in the way,—least of all the writer of that letter. On the contrary, we can stand it if the lions can. The present Daniel is a trifle tough. But it takes grit and endurance to be a Unitarian, whether lay or clerical, at the South; and people who are short of those qualities do not undertake it. In time this process of elimination ought to give us a sturdy strain in our Unitarian Church. The survival of the fittest is on our side. It is a hard law, but it works well for what survives.

Between the churches of authority, with Rome at their head on the one side and the Church of reason on the other, the final issue with a progressive humanity ought not to be doubtful. Meantime, however, the former hold the field, and pre-eminently the Southern field. If, as we have been told, the points to be occupied by an enterprising church are the places where the Roman Catholic Church has invested most money, then New Orleans and the Texas cities are our objective points. In Galveston, I was told, the Catholics hold over a million dollars' worth of property. And it is so in every prominent city of the South.

Here we are at the end of our space, and not a word of the three months' tour of the Southern States, during which we visited seventeen cities in nine States, where we have churches, or circles wishing to become churches, or friends waiting for our word. Never since we have known this field did it look to us so inviting, never so discouraging,—inviting, because really needing us and our Church of the two commandments; discouraging, because, while the field is so white, the laborers are so few, and the needful money to put them afield so scanty.

Three months of lecturing, preaching, talking, counselling, spurring, comforting,—in a word, ministering; seven thousand miles of travelling. But why speak of distances travelled and labors done? Do not even the publicans the same? The commercial traveller by my side goes two miles to my one, for the sake of trade; and I doubt not his business perplexities are as great as those of the Church. I hope his pecuniary profits are more satisfactory than are those of the Southern liberal clergy. But these are hard times for everybody, and we must all labor and suffer together. As for the story of these wanderings, is it not told, or telling, with all the interesting details and incidents by the way, in current numbers of the Southern Unitarian? And does not every person really interested in our Southern work take, read, and inwardly digest that monthly book of the Acts?

Enough for the exclusive reader of the old reliable Register, if he sees and considers what is here written.

CHURCH AND STATE.

A BAPTIST MINISTER'S VIEWS.

BY REV. J. B. HAWTHORNE, ATLANTA, GA.

Centuries elapsed after the death of the apostles before Christians ever thought of asking anything but protection for their religion from the civil power. When Constantine, by an imperial edict, abolished Paganism, and established Christianity as the religion of Rome, he was more an enemy to the truth and kingdom of Christ than the inhuman Nero, who illumined his public gardens with the burning bodies of the saints.

The doctrine of Christ, of his apostles, and of all the churches of the first centuries of the Christian era, was that religion is a matter that belongs to the individual conscience, and that every human being should be left free to determine for himself what to believe, what to worship, and how to worship.

In regard to the relation of the State to religion, the people of this country are theoretically a unit; but, practically, they are far from being united. They believe that it is the duty of the State to protect every man under its jurisdiction in the exercise and enjoyment of his religious convictions, be he Jew or Christian or Mormon or Mohammedan or Pagan. They believe that the State has no right to compel any man to support religion. They believe that the conscience of the infidel should be just as free from State interference as that of the Christian. They believe that Robert Ingersoll should be just as unmolested in his rejection of the gospel as I am in the acceptance and practice of it. They believe that no man should be compelled to support any religion, and that all such compulsion is a violation of the rights of conscience. They believe that the solitary function of the State in respect to religion is to protect it,—to see that every man is unmolested in the exercise of his religious faith. They believe that State patronage of religion, in any form, is incompatible with the rights of conscience. If they were only consistent with their principles, how free we should be from the discords and bitter contentions which now disturb the peace of our country, and provoke thousands of our people, not only to reject Christianity, but to despise and hate it!

But the people of this country are not consistent with the views which they hold upon this subject. They believe in the absolute non-interference of the State in all matters of religious faith and practice, and yet millions of them seek the help of the State to propagate and establish their religious doctrines and worship. Every year they are asking the federal Congress and the State legislatures and city councils to do things which violate the rights of conscience.

Let me call your attention to some of these strange and mischievous inconsistenask for your closer acquaintance, confidence and fellowship? His aim and earnest purpose is to be helpful to you now in any way that may offer, and to become such a friend to you and with you that, when trouble or trial may come to either, our friendship shall be a tower of strength and hope. I you are now giving your loyal support to our church, if each Sunday finds you in your place in the congregation, your pastor wishes to express his gratitude for the help and support thus given to his ministry. If you are not a regular attendant at the Sunday service, he wishes you to know how much he misses you, and longs to see you in the congregation.

In these times the church, our church, needs the loyal support of every true citizen, each according to his ability. The church needs you, my friend, to stand with those who are giving it their loyal support. Do you not need the ministry of its faith, its worship, and its kindly fellowship? Is there any more vital interest in life than religion? Every man, woman, and child ought to belong to and help support some religious institution. Our church needs you, my friend: your pastor needs your help and co-operation. Will you not join with him and others in the society to make the "New Year" bright, hopeful, and happy for all?

Sincerely and cordially your pastor,
GEORGE M. BODGE.

Dorchester: The resignation of Rev. William R. Lord as pastor of Christ Church, Dorchester, has been accepted, not without sorrow, by his people, in the conviction that the call which has come to him is a call of duty. In accepting his resignation, the society say: "We accept his resignation and acquiesce in his decision in hearty sympathy with his purposes, and send him to his new and important sphere of duties with entire faith and confidence in his fitness for the work. It is with great sorrow that we consent to dissolve the relations of the past seven years, and we feel a great sense of loss in Mr. Lord's departure; but in this vote we hereby pledge ourselves to an earnest continuance of effort in the work which he has begun and so ably sustained during his pastorate here." The resignation will take effect March 1.

AYER, MASS.—All ministers in the vicinity of Ayer are invited to meet in the town hall of that place at 9.30 A.M. on Tuesday, January 15. It is intended to bring together all ministers who may accept the invitation as fellow-workers, and to recognize their common aims, and to raise the question whether anything more can be done by co-operation to promote these aims. The call has been signed by men of all denominations, and is extended to ministers from any distance from Ayer.

CHELSEA, MASS.—Rev. Henry Powers of the First Unitarian Church of Chelsea has resigned his pastorate, which took effect Jan. 1, 1895. The Standing Committee, in accepting his resignation, passed unanimous resolutions expressing their appreciation of the services Mr. Powers has rendered to the church and city, acknowledging his ability and scholarship, and the good he has done in connection with the work of the Associated Charities and in the no-license campaigns, and regretting that the present condition of the society and the smallness of numbers make it necessary to sever the relations of pastor and parish.

LEICESTER, MASS.—A correspondent writes: "In late years exchanges of Christian courtesy between churches of different creeds have been multiplying, but one in which the First Congregational (Trinitarian) and the Second Congregational (Unitarian) Churches of this town were concerned was sufficiently marked in its departure from traditional usages to warrant special mention. The former church has recently installed a new pastor; and, as he took possession of the parsonage near December 1, arrangements were made for a New Year's reception. Recognizing the fact that Mr. Seaver has even more recently taken up his abode in the town, the occasion was made one of double welcome. In the early evening the Ladies' Aid Society of the First Church entertained at supper its sister society of the Second, with their pastor and family; and the church afterward welcomed in the parish parlor the members of both parishes at a formal reception, of which the honors were impartially shared by both ministers and their families. Exchanges of courtesy between pastors and people of different churches are yearly becoming more frequent, Unitarian ministers in Templeton, for instance, having exchanged with Orthodox and Baptist brothers, been cordially welcomed to membership in the ministerial club of the neighborhood, and, on at least one occasion, have taken part in an installation; but, if this incident is not unexampled in the history of the two divisions of the Congregational Church, it is sufficiently rare to be published with admiration marks. It should certainly be very difficult for pastors or their flocks to be unfriendly after such an exhibition of Christian spirit.

McMILLIN, WASH.—The First Unitarian Church was dedicated December 16. The following persons took part in the exercises: Rev. F. H. Adams, Puyallup; Rev. O. L. Fowler, McMillin; Rev. W. E. Copeland, Salem, Ore.; Mr. James Shippen, Seattle; Mr. A. D. Hale, McMillin. The new church was further consecrated by the marriage of Miss Linnie Hale, daughter of Mr. A. D. Hale, and Mr. John McCollin.

MEMPHIS, TENN.—In accepting the resignation of Rev. Frederick Preston, the congregation voted the following testimonial, addressed to Mr. Preston: "At the annual meeting a committee was appointed to extend the assurance of the gratitude and appreciation of the members of the First Unitarian Church of Memphis for your faithful labors of the past six months in our midst. As chairman of that committee, I offer you our heartfelt thanks for the great assistance you have given us in establishing a liberal church in our city; for your generous self-sacrifice in our behalf; your constant and kindly courtesy to every member; your broad, joyous, and loving views of life and helpfulness that gave us a spiritual uplift every Sunday, and a never-failing help for the duties of the coming week,—for all these with full and heartfelt thanks. Sorrowing that in your accustomed place we shall see your face no more, we bid you God-speed in your every future plan and purpose, and pray fervently may all good come to you now, henceforth, and forever! Lide Meriwether, I. Baker, Fred Schubach, Committee."

NEW YORK, N.Y.—On Friday, January 4, the regular meeting of the New York League of Unitarian Women was held in All Souls' Church. The philanthropic news report was given by Mrs. James D. Smilie, and it dealt with the work of the Charity Organization Society of the city. Miss Warren of Yonkers, N.Y., gave an interesting religious news report. The subject for the day was "The University Settlement." The speakers were Miss Catharine Jones, Miss Ada L. Woolfolk, Miss Doughty,—all college women and workers in their respective settlements,—Miss Mildred Conway, and Miss M. E. Butterick. The subject had been arranged in the following sub-topics: (1) "The Sociological Methods of the University Settlement"; (2) "Its Attitude toward the Problems of City Life"; (3) "Its Attitude toward Socialism, Organized Labor, the Unemployed, and toward Religion." It was a well-attended meeting, and great interest was shown in the work and scope of the University Settlement as described by the speakers.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.—Rev. Carl G. Horst has tendered his resignation as pastor of Unity Church. The Unitarian Congregational church here unites with the Advent, Baptist, orthodox Congregational, Methodist, and Episcopal churches in observing the "week of prayer." The meetings are held in the First Church, and are conducted by the different pastors in turn.

ROSLINDALE, MASS.—The Roslindale Sunday-school is proving a very live and potent factor in the life of the society. Its membership is considerably over one hundred, and its average attendance is very high, and the interest manifested in the work of the school more than is usual. Over two hundred members and friends attended the Christmas services, which were given in a manner that showed a great deal of careful preparation and earnest work; and the annual festival and tree were also well attended and much enjoyed. A social club has been organized in connection with the school, which serves to keep up an active interest in all its work, besides making the members acquainted with each other and establishing an esprit de corps which cannot but be of advantage to all connected with it.

SIOUX CITY, IA.—A correspondent writes: "The poetry section of Unity Club has finished an interesting study of early New England life and character, and closed its work in this line with a New England reception and dinner, where pumpkin pie was considered the height of culinary art. The members of the club and their guests dressed in the quaint costumes of the New Englanders of ante-railroad times, and the pretty young girls who acted as waitresses were charming in the cap and kerchief of the Puritan maiden. Many of the characters of 'Old Town Folks' and 'The Minister's Wooing' were out in force. There were after-dinner speeches on 'The New England Thanksgiving,' 'The Quiltin',' 'Child Life in New England,' 'The Meet-in'-house,' 'The Muster,' 'The New England Kitchen,' and 'The Sunday Clothes,'—spicy, bright, fresh, and original, witty, pathetic, or laughably humorous. 'Auld Lang Syne' was lined out, and sung with vigor."

Personally conducted Tours via Pennsylvania Railroad.—It is at this season of the year that people's thoughts turn to some method by which the rigors of our northern winter climate may be escaped; and a trip to the "Land of Flowers," if only for a short time, offers the easiest solution of the question.

In order to give the public an opportunity to visit Florida at a very reasonable cost, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company has arranged for a series of tours to Jacksonville; and the well-earned reputation acquired by that company for the superiority of its personally conducted tours will be maintained for this year's series. Since the system of personally conducted tours inaugurated by that company has been in effect, none but words of commendation have been received. Its unexcelled train service, experienced Tourist Agents and Chaperons, and, above all, its moderate charges, leave nothing to be desired.

The tours to Jacksonville, allowing two weeks' stay in Florida, will leave Boston on January 28, February 11 and 25, and March 11 and 25, 1895. The rate, including transportation, meals en route, and Pullman berth on special train, is $65.00; from New York, $50.00.

Detailed itineraries will be sent on application to Tourist Agent, 205 Washington Street, Boston, Mass., to whom application for space should also be made.

A Curious Fact.—It is undoubtedly true that twice as much furniture would be bought to-day if people only realized how low are the present prices for fine furniture. For example, at Paine's on Canal Street they are in many instances selling their best work at actually less than half the figures charged for it only three years ago. Yet how few persons know this fact.

Washington Excursions. All Expenses Included.—A series of personally conducted excursions to Washington, D.C., during the season of 1894-95, designed particularly to accommodate the people of New England, will be operated via the Royal Blue Line. These excursions will cover a period of seven days; and the rate of $23 from Boston will include fare for the round trip, hotel accommodations in Washington, transfers, and all necessary expenses. The next excursion will leave Boston Wednesday, January 23; and other dates will be announced later.

For information, tickets, and circulars, call on or address A. J. Simmons, New England Passenger Agent, 211 Washington Street, Boston.

Deaths.

IRA P. FARRINGTON.

The First Parish, Portland, Me., has met with a great loss in the death of Mr. Ira P. Farrington. Mr. Farrington was born seventy-four years ago in the State of Vermont. As a young man, he went to Lowell, Mass., and entered the employ of his brother, who kept a clothing store. In 1845 he came to Portland, and established himself in business. Since that time he has been a respected citizen in this city. He was always a quiet, unassuming man, earnest in everything that claimed his interest, severe toward all false pretence.

He has always been associated with the most worthy charities of the city, and usually in some official capacity. His judgment in business affairs was of a high order. This ability he has always freely shared with the organizations in which he was active.

For twenty-seven years Mr. Farrington was the treasurer of the ministry at large, known as Preble Chapel. This is the means by which the First Parish reaches the poor of Portland. In this office Mr. Farrington had the practical control over the working of the institution.

During his residence in Portland Mr. Farrington was a most regular attendant at the First Parish, serving it officially and otherwise in a most faithful manner.

The large fortune he left was, for the most part, distributed among the benevolent institutions of the city in a wise and discriminating way. Mr. Farrington died December 17. He leaves a wife, but no children.

BY REV. J. M. SCOTT, ITHACA, N.Y.

By this the race has moved up, by it is still moving: by this every gain of man has been achieved, every greater gain must be achieved. Alas for the man or nation that is not haunted by an ideal! For who has not dreams of the night that will not allow his activities to be at rest in the day? And this is the truth of Messiahship, this the origin of the Christ idea. It is the creative purpose of God compelling man unto work, unto growth. Let us all cherish our Messiahs. Let us receive them gladly. Let us

And so can we find in this the secret of the Christhood of Jesus. He gave men ideal life to live, and ideal life to live in the very midst of this present world, as though he said to us, "Be seeds, and transform the soil that cannot feed, that but mocks hunger, into the harvests that satisfy,"—as though he said: "Here is marsh; but you may build it into marigold and show forth the yellow tenderness that is in the sun's heart. Here is dampness where the cattle cannot feed. Transform it into iris that can show the sun's heart of blue. Just where you are, whatever the earth conditions be, you can transform them into a self, into a life, that will show forth the human love in the heart of your Father in heaven. Your very cares and disappointments you may transform into a life, into a self, that will show forth the human truth that is in the heart of your Father in heaven." Jesus showed what a splendid life, what a holy and tender character, what a priceless manhood lies hidden in us all, in these dull earth conditions under which we live. The oak turns the storms that beat upon it into strength with which to play with them. The violet turns the storms into sweetness to breathe out upon their hurry or their following quiet. So Jesus turned all the adversities of this life—all its hamperings, its very cruelties and death—into sublime and deathless love and truth. He turned the blows that killed him into prayers of forgiveness for those who struck the blows. He transmuted all the earth life into a spiritual beauty and power, all the struggling, sinning, sorrowing humanity into a divineness that in wonder we call God. As it is written in the story of his transfiguration, wherein not alone the face nor the body, but the very dust-defiled garments, became a shining splendor above the brightness of the noon-day sun, so did he transfigure all our condition, all our humanity, its very dust-stained garments of sin, into a spiritual worth and grandeur still inspiring men. He turned tears into the soul's deep laughter, which only holiness knows. He transformed earth's sins into a holiness that could look the perfect God in the face, and say in a happy child-heartedness, "Father."

As we cling to our kind, finding humanity the meaning and joy of life, so we have clung to this truth of the unity of Jesus with his Father and our Father. And this faith has made sorrow fill with a human comfort we call God's Spirit. It has made sin shamed into a holiness that we call God's new creation. It has made death fill with a sunrise of hope, the dear master of life's human friendliness; and, with rapturous lips, we have named it resurrection. It has made everything a human kindness, the whole earth shaping unto some grace of neighborliness.

And so we have called after Jesus in our sins, that he might forgive. So we have pleaded his consolations in our sorrows, and found the peace of comfort filling our hearts. We have cried to him when death had made us desolate; and we have grown into a joy of believing that death is not victor, but the vanquished and blessed servant of life, enriching us all.

So this Christ idea is born out of the need of our human hearts, out of ourselves being made. We must have an ideal toward which, in which, to grow, else will death hold all the ways of our being. We must have love and friendship in the universe,—a God and Father who is human in all his ways, to whom the least and most helpless one in his creation is as dear as is her helpless babe to the tender and true mother. Out of this need the Christ has come and taken his place.

So long as he does for us this work, we need not worry much over many questions that may arise in regard to him. He may be history or legend; he may be in reality man, or what some would call a work of art, a great dream of the suffering, hungering soul of man after a love and life endless, satisfying. These are not the essential questions for the vitality of the Christ idea as the story of Jesus realizes it for us. Simply does he make your humanity alive with ideal life, showing you a truth, a love worth devoting your life to its realization? Then to you he is Christ. Cherish him with all tender and holy reverence, as the growing things of the meadow cherish so the life-essential sun. If his story for you gives you an ennobling thought of God,—an ideal God, in whose love you could be at perfect peace, in whose service no sacrifice could be too great; a God worth compelling men to believe in, as you would compel them into the very sunshine of love; if in the face of Jesus you can see the Father of your own life, the human tenderness of your own destiny,—then cherish him as Christ, even as the grape, filling its heart with a love to blush purple in unselfishness, cherishes its life-essential sun. The test of the Christ is in your own spiritual natures. Only him whom your affection can crown i Christ to you. In what quickened nature you experience, in that is his throne, out of that is his worship. If you cannot use him as historied reality, use him as hope's symbol; use him as your life's ideal, whichever you strive to realize; use him as your ideal of the universe, whichever you trust may prove to your whole nature that it is the very everlasting reality.

And now this personal truth: we must reveal to men in ourselves ideals worth living for; we must reveal in our characters, in our lives, a God worth trusting in. It is a sublime thing to so live that these who know and love us shall realize in us how divine is human nature; that in us men may realize how divine must be the universe, that such men are its creation. We can, we ought to, show forth the divinity that is our Father. Alas for us, when we so live as to compel our neighbors to think poorly and meanly of humanity, of the God out of whose creative tenderness we have come! No treachery to life greater than this!

We are just the holiness and worth of humanity to our neighbor,—just to him the holiness and worth of God. We are Christs, true or false, to ourselves, to our fellows. By so far as we have influence over others, we make them see the universe of man and the universe of God in our image and likeness. Therefore may we strive to attain unto the holiness we dream, the splendor of character we behold in the Christ. No more certainly are the glory of the sun and the transfiguration of the earth in the rose than are the glory of God and the transfiguration of man in just our lives, in just ourselves. Ah! the splendor, when we attain it, of being able to say, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father; for I and my Father are one,"—the splendor of being the star-point of light in this dark earth,—the star-point wherein we show the worth of man and the worth of God, the divine humanity whom creation is fulfilling!

"If Jesus Christ is a man,
And only a man, I say
That, of all mankind, I cleave to him;
And to him will I cleave alway.

"If Jesus Christ is a God,
And the only God, I swear
I will follow him through heaven and hell,
The earth, the sea, the air."

It is not true that love makes all things easy: it makes us choose what is difficult.
George Eliot.

Coming down to Jesus, we find him teaching that pure and simple religion which is non-sectarian,—nay, which is the only possible cure of sectarianism. He strove ever to draw attention away from forms, ceremonies, traditions, speculative beliefs,—away from everything external, incidental, secondary in importance, and therefore tending to divisions and contentions, to the deep, central, vital matters, about which there could be no contention.—

THE CATTLE OF NINEVEH.*

"And also much cattle."—JONAH iv. 2.

Everybody knows that the book of Jonah contains a remarkable story about a fish. It is likely that the information of a great many people in regard to this book is altogether confined to the limits of this story. What is the book of Jonah about? It is about a fish which swallowed a man. That would be the answer of a surprising number, even of intelligent people.

The truth is, however, that, while there are four chapters in this book, the account of the adventure with the fish is contained in three short sentences. The book of Jonah is one of the most interesting, suggestive, and instructive books in the whole Bible. It is one of the text books of tolerance. It teaches the universal love of God. It does not hesitate to compare the prophet of Israel, to his disadvantage, with the pagan crew of a Mediterranean sailing-vessel. It records the quick answer that God gave to the prayers of pagan Nineveh. One of the lessons of it is that all promises of punishment are conditioned upon the penitence of the criminal. The most absolute menace of certain destruction is taken back and changed into benediction when the sinner is sorry for his sin. The Book of Jonah teaches us how to read some hard sentences in the New Testament about the damnation of the wicked. It is a book of justice and of mercy, a revelation of the universal fatherhood of God. The least important part of the book is the story of the fish.

To fasten upon that, to emphasize that, to bring that into the foreground, and to put all the great religious lessons of this wonderful book into the dim and neglected background, is as if a congregation should seize upon some petty figure of a great sermon, some singular illustration or momentary error of utterance, and think about that, and talk about that, and forget all the helpful words that had been said besides. That, indeed, is human nature. But we need to be on guard against the mistakes of human nature. Take a pencil and mark out those three verses, and then read this wonderful, wise, uplifting book.

If we are to give attention to any animals in the book of Jonah, we will do well to leave the fish and take the cattle. Let us stand upon the solid ground. Let us turn our backs upon this mysterious fish, which we see but uncertainly beneath the shifting waves, and which, it is possible, belongs rather to the world of poetry than to the world of real fishing-smacks; and let us consider the cattle that we know,—the every-day cows and horses of old Nineveh, which Jonah cared so little about, and which the critics and commentators and indifferent readers have cared no more about, but which were of interest and value in the sight of God.

For we read that Jonah was disappointed when his fierce sermon failed to come true. He stood out in the suburbs of the city on that fatal fortieth day, and watched the sky. He prayed for thunder and lightning, for red-hot shafts of destruction, for fiery hail and brimstone, for Sodom and Gomorrah over again. And, when the sun went on shining, and the day came to an end, and the town still stood, and no torment from the hand of God touched it, Jonah was sore grieved. He felt himself abused. God had dealt unkindly with him. God had sent him to preach punishment, to prophesy hell; and then God had not punished. Better that all Nineveh should perish, Jonah thought, than that his sermons should be thus discredited.

Then God spoke to Jonah. God told Jonah that he loved those children of his in Nineveh; yes, the most ignorant and the meanest of them; yes, even the very cows and horses of Nineveh.* "Should I not have pity on Nineveh, that great city, wherein are more than six score thousand persons that cannot discern between their right hand and their left hand; and also much cattle?"

The lesson that I want to emphasize is that God cares for cattle. God looks down upon this city, and he thinks not only about the good people; and the important people, as we count importance; and the rich and influential people; and the poor people crowded together in narrow and unclean dwellings, living in destitution, physical and intellectual and moral, scarcely knowing the difference between right and left, scarcely knowing the difference between right and wrong; but God thinks also of all the horses in the city, knows what sort of food they have, and what kind of stables they live in, and the work that is put upon them, and all the treatment that is given them. God has regard for all the cattle, for the horses and the cows, for the cats and the dogs, for the birds, for all the living creatures he has made. God is present not only in the house of prayer, but also in the stockyards.

Jonah was willing—yes, and desirous—that the inhabitants of Nineveh, the men and the women and the little children, should all die horribly. He stood by with a certain pleased anticipation, waiting to see the agony begin. There is an unmistakable element of cruelty in human nature. The story of the life of man has fearful chapters in it,—chapters written in red; records of war, of massacres, of murders, of martyrdoms. Jonah has stood exulting a hundred thousand times, and watched the vindication of his doctrine in the torments of his brethren. The whole world over, in savagery and in civilization, in all lands, in the times that are told of in the ancient histories, and in the day that is recorded in this morning's paper, that old inhuman attitude of the prophet by the city is to be seen.

Think of the slaughter by the great armies of Assyria and Egypt! Think of the horrors of the old religions, with their mutilations and their human sacrifices! Think of the slave life of Greece and Rome, where the fair ladies of society thrust the long pins that held their hair into the flesh of offending servants! Think of the vast multitudes of pleasure-seekers who crowded the amphitheatres of the empire, as gayly as people go now of an evening to the play, that they might watch the murder of their fellow-men, and study the agonies of violent death; where the vestal virgins, the women of religion, held down their thumbs to indicate to the victorious gladiator that he was to hack his victim's head off! Think of all the barbarous punishments, the crucifixions, the martyr fires, the racks and wheels, the black dungeons! Think of the tortures of the inquisition, of the woes of Russian prisons, and the agonies of Siberian exile! Think of what is going on to-day in Central Africa at the hands of Arab slave-traders! Or do but read the daily papers. Study there the fearful story of man's continued inhumanity to man. Learn of the injustice, of the oppression, of the real wrong, of the blows and the beatings, of the murders, that day by day take place in every city.

Abel's cry has been echoed all along the centuries.

Here is a man who beats a little five-year-old boy with a clothes-line, doubling up the rope and using it upon the baby, "all over his body and across his face," until he is a "mass of bruises and lacerated flesh."

Another father—not once nor twice, but many times—whips his two motherless children, a girl of seven and a boy of nine, with a whip that was meant for driving mules.

Still another fastens a dog-chain about the neck of his ten-year-old son, and beats him with a heavy strap upon his naked body; and the mother, in the same family, "tortures another of their children by holding his hand, first the palm, then the back, upon a hot stove."

And yet some people think that we have no need of a Humane Society, without which these fiendish crimes would never have been brought to punishment!

One by one the great and conspicuous cruelties of man against man are being done away. The conscience of the race is getting more and more awakened. We are no longer content to stand apart like Jonah, willing to watch the sufferings of our fellow-creatures. The cruelties of the old savagery and the old civilization have almost ceased out of decent society. The prize fight is the last survival of the murders of the arena. Africa is the last stronghold of slavery. The desire of all good people to-day is to preach at least the need of the deliverance of all those who are held captive, even in the bondage of our industrial conditions. The old fierce punishments are mitigated. The whole Christian world reprobates Russia for her toleration of a form of imprisonment which was once well-nigh universal. The race is growing kinder. Domestic cruelty, the longest to survive and the hardest to get at, is being driven out into the light, thrust into the patrol wagon, and brought up at the bar of justice. Public sentiment, which was once as indifferent to suffering as the expectant Jonah, is more tender-hearted, more indignant against the agents of pain, and more Christian than it has ever been before.

Now, we need to carry this tender mercy a little farther on. We need to remember that the Christian spirit of love reaches out and takes in not every human being, but every living creature under heaven. We need to remember that God our Father is the Father also of the cattle.

God cares. He cares for all the little birds. Jesus has reminded us how the heavenly Father feedeth them, and how not even a sparrow falls to the ground without his notice. If the little bird falls to the ground because somebody has shot him or thrown a stone at him, just for the pleasure of shooting or stoning, God notices that. If the little bird is stoned or shot in order that he may be torn to pieces and made into ornaments for women's bonnets, God knows that. And God cares.

God cares for all the horses. Not a horse is overburdened or overdriven or ill-treated without God's notice.

It is evident that a good many people think that they know more about horses than God does. God gave the horse an arched neck, but we have improved that with a check-rein. God gave the horse eyes to see with, but we have provided him with blinders. I saw one day in London an exhibition of the instruments of the Arab slave-traders. There were the yokes that were fastened to the necks of the captives, and the manacles that went about their wrists and ankles, and the heavy chains with which they were loaded down, and the stout whips with which they were beaten. It would be possible to arrange a similar exhibition of the implements of a man's cruelty to his humble slaves, the horses.

There would be the check-rein, by which the head is held up in a constrained and unnatural position and the eyes are brought

AN ERROR.

Do you remember the story of the countryman? They showed him Bunker Hill Monument as the place where, in the Revolutionary War, the brave Warren fell. The countryman said he didn't wonder it killed him if he fell from the top of that thing.

The mistake of the countryman was simply an error of date. He was putting the monument back a hundred years. It is just the same mistake which our customers are constantly making on furniture prices.

Take this Book Cabinet as an example. Because we sold these Cabinets for $185 only a few years ago, many people now conclude that they do not want one. They overlook entirely the fact that we are selling this Cabinet to-day for considerably less than half that sum.

away from the ground, where they ought to watch the way of the feet, into the blinding face of the sun,—one of the inventions of the devil, and the cause of constant and increasing and absolutely unnecessary pain. There would be the blinders, by which the horse, who sees out of the side of his eyes, is rendered incapable of properly taking care of himself, made ready to take fright at sounds which he cannot understand, and has his sight impaired, and learns a new kind of pain in consequence. There would be the sharp bit, which frets and cuts the mouth, and puts the sensitive creature into almost intolerable pain. There would be the whip, with its abundant possibilities of ministering suffering in the hands of hasty or foolish or ill-tempered or ignorant drivers.

One of the most remarkable things that will be pointed out concerning this display of instruments of torture in the museums of the twentieth century, in the days when religion means so much that it is concerned with the discomfort of the humblest living creature, will be their entire uselessness. They will be seen to serve no purpose whatsoever, save to put one of man's most intelligent and willing and faithful servants into a condition of needless suffering.

To do to others as we would have them do to us is a rule so wide and far-reaching that it takes in every creature that the good God has made. It includes the cattle. God looks upon every tortured horse, whether he be tortured in anger by a brute of a driver or whether he be tortured in ignorance and thoughtlessness for the sake of following a foolish fashion. And God cares.

A Hebrew prophet promised long ago that in the millennium "Holiness to the Lord" should be inscribed upon the bells of all the horses. Yes, and on all their harness, "Holiness to the Lord,"—on every strap and buckle! And nothing left in all the harness upon which that sacred phrase could not consistently be set; nothing left which would offend the sight of the righteous and merciful God, who cares even for the cattle.

Christian people ought to be more thoughtful, more attentive to the comfort of those dumb creatures who can only look at us, and cannot speak, and who depend so utterly upon us. Another Hebrew prophet, who looked in his time into the golden age of the ideal future, saw a reign of perfect peace, in whose benediction even the wildest of the animals shared with man. A little child, he said, shall lead them. And a Christian poet, who likewise in vision dreamed of the blessed world to come, beheld those living creatures joining in the adoration of men and angels before the throne of God. "The earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God." The "creature" is the brute creation,—the cows and the horses, the cats and dogs, the sheep and goats, of our fields and streets and homes and stables. And the "sons of God,"—that means us as we ought to be. And the lesson is that God has made these animals dependent upon us for protection, for guidance, for help, for betterment, for inspiration. God has given these animals into our care. He looks to us to minister to them, to be kind to them, to love them. Every man in a stable has a responsibility which God puts upon him. The whole great brute creation, travelling in pain, too often at the hands of man, waits with "earnest expectation" for that redemption of the creatures which will begin when we are all better Christians than we are at present.

To be tender-hearted ought to be one of the characteristics of the Christian. To make this world a better and happier world to live in for all the men and all the women and all the little children and all the living creatures that are in it is the mission of religion in which we ought to be missionaries.

Surely, nobody can always know what is right. Yes, you always can for to-day; and, if you do what you see of it to-day, you will see more of it, and more clearly, to-morrow.—John Ruskin.

In politeness, as in many other things connected with the formation of character, people in general begin outside, when they should begin inside. Instead of beginning with the heart and trusting that to form the manners, they begin with the manners, and trust the heart to chance influences.—Mrs. L. M. Child.

Literature.

Mr. Cary's book ranks high in the series to which it is the last addition. Dr. Holmes's "Emerson" was unique. Putting that aside, Mr. Lounsbury's "Cooper," Mr. Higginson's "Margaret Fuller," and Mr. Woodberry's "Poe" attain the highest excellence, baffling the invidious comparison; and Mr. Cary's "Curtis" makes a fourth with these. It has in it an element of surprise, especially for those who do not know the writer's private tastes. An editor of the New York Times, a writer of excellent editorial matter, a political reformer, deeply interested in the reform of the civil service, closely associated with Mr. Curtis in that reform for many years, we were prepared to find his book complete upon the line of his special work and his special sympathy with Mr. Curtis; and it is not less so than we expected it to be. Yet, if there is a difference of good and better between the political part and the literary, it is certainly not to the disadvantage of the latter. Nowhere is Mr. Cary's mastery of his subject easier, and nowhere does he write with more delicate discrimination, than in the chapters on the Howadji books, "The Potiphar Papers," "Prue and I," and "Trumps." Of these five, the last delights him least; and his reasons for his qualified admiration are stated with much frankness and deliberation. What some have thought a too glowing fancy in the "Nile Notes of an Howadji" and "The Howadji in Syria," he finds simply expressive of the author's sympathy with his subject. The "Nile Notes," it appears, was severely criticised in some quarters; and the young writer's father was troubled not only by the criticisms, but by his own partial sympathy with them. A letter from Curtis to his father stands for what he has written without the least apology. It is respectful and affectionate; but it says, "Had I written the book to please you, I would not have published it, because it would not have pleased myself." A good many readers will think the estimate of "The Potiphar Papers" too favorable, but many more will sympathize with the tender admiration which the biographer lavishes on "Prue and I."

The book has several surprises, and one of the most interesting is that which reveals the maturity of Curtis's thought and expression when he was nineteen and twenty years of age. A common impression has been that his anti-slavery convictions were slow in coming to maturity. It seems that they were not. In 1844—he was born in 1824—we find him writing to his father in the terms of clearest conviction as to the true character of slavery, with sympathies tending strongly to the disunion solution of Garrison as the only hopeful one. Remembering his admiration for Sumner's appeal to Webster in his first great speech in the Senate, Aug. 26, 1852,—"Assume, sir, these unperformed duties,"—one's interest is redoubled in his own anticipation of Sumner's thought eight years in advance; and the expression is but little in arrears,—"How nobly might Mr. Webster, a man too great that we should ever despair, crown his fame in hearts which would fain welcome him, but cannot yet, by assuming this position!" There is abundant evidence that not only the lighter style of his essays, but also the graver style of his editorials and orations, was an early acquisition, if it did not, like reading and writing, "come by the grace of God."

Had Curtis remained in America, he would probably have been shoulder to shoulder with Lowell in the Mexican War,—the war against that foul iniquity; but from 1846 to 1850 he was abroad. And, though he had much sympathy with European revolution, the life of a flâneur was not auspicious for his progressive interest in the anti-slavery cause. After his return, also, immersed in his first lecturing and journalism, in the Howadji books and a round of social pleasures, it took him a little time to orient himself. In 1856 the process was complete; and its completion was signalized by the delivery of his address before the Wesleyan University at Middletown, Conn. From that time forward every stage of the great conflict had its appropriate utterance, more eloquent and more important after the appeal to arms was made than ever before. But there were many other lectures and addresses of the same period; and one very characteristic same period; and one very characteristic one, on "Modern Infidelity," should not have been passed over in silence. On nearly half a hundred lecture platforms in one season it declared the Unitarian doctrine of the right and duty of the freest thought upon the highest themes as clearly as it has ever been enunciated in any Unitarian pulpit. Mr. Cary's touch upon Mr. Curtis's religious thought and action is less intimate than we could wish. His connection with the Staten Island church and with the Unitarian body would have borne some stronger emphasis without injury to the truth or to the proportions of his public life. The American Unitarian Association is not yet quite "National"; but we are obliged to Mr. Cary for that prophetic word, while regretting that he makes no mention of our friend's presidency of the National Conference and the three noble addresses that he made before that body. For matters purely theological he had little thought or care. No one was less sceptical; but he believed much, and not in many things. The outcome at Saratoga would have rejoiced his heart; for he, too, accepted the religion of Jesus as love to God and man, and had sympathies of mind and heart for all honest thought and work, however named.

Himself an editor of first-rate ability, Mr. Cary's estimate of Mr. Curtis's editorial work on Harper's Weekly has a peculiar interest. He finds the secret of its excellence in his imaginary talking with his readers. "He seemed to have his reader as clearly in his mind as if he were sitting before him; and he reasoned with him, appealed to him, suggested to him, as he would have done, had their eyes met. And the editor did not make the mistake of either overrating or underrating the person to whom he addressed himself. I have sometimes thought that this imaginary companion was conceived by him with a very serious reference to the character of the Weekly as it was when he took charge of it, and that his typical reader was one who primarily liked to look at pictures, and whose interest thus attracted was to be directed by the writer." It is certain that Mr. Curtis wrote in pictures very often, but this much more frequently in his orations than in his editorials. Closely associated with him in his civil service reform work, and in his political independency, Mr. Cary deals with these aspects of his friend's life with great sympathy and intelligence. He shows how little suddenness there was in his course in 1884, what ample preparation for it in his previous speech and action. He makes short work of the unmitigable stuff that a delegate to a convention is bound to support its action, showing that a resolution to that effect was rejected by the Republican Convention of 1884, in response to a speech by Mr. Curtis which anticipated his subsequent action. The book is rich in Mr. Curtis's letters, and one of the most admirable is that explaining his political course in 1888. But the most beautiful of all is that which he wrote upon the death of Lincoln, to whom he had been loyal when so many fell away, doing more, perhaps, than any other to effect his renomination in 1864, as in 1860 he had done more than any other to bring back his party from its repudiation of the Declaration of Independence in subservience to the will of Horace Greeley as the self-constituted representative of the border States.

Mr. Cary has given us a truly admirable book. Those who knew Mr. Curtis best and loved him most will best appreciate its quality; and some of these will find, so far have they been heretofore from exaggerating the beauty of Mr. Curtis's character and the nobility of his life, that their admiration did not equal his deserts.

HISTORIC DANVERS.—Not the least gratifying evidence of the increasing interest in the study of general or local American history among our people is the growing number of books that give, separately, a more or less full and popular account of our towns and cities, many of them accompanied by pictorial illustrations of notable striking objects or features of the places thus brought to view. They are all valuable, bringing together and preserving, as they do, for future use a large variety of needed information, much of which might otherwise be lost in the course of years; and many of them, at least, are got up in a very tasteful and pleasing form, at the same time that they are highly instructive. "Historic Danvers" is one of these. It is a small and modest yet pretty and elegant volume, bound in embossed paper covers and published by Mr. F. E. Moynahan, editor and proprietor of the Danvers Mirror, its contents consisting of about fifty pages of admirably written text by Mr. Ezra D. Hines, and of not less than sixty-five charming pictures of the principal things of the old historic town which the reader of the old history would most likely wish to know or visitor would most likely wish to see about. The story of each and all of the latter is graphically told us in the running sketch, whose author is well known in Essex County for various other excellent productions in this line of literary work. We have room to mention but a few of the many attractions which he so felicitously describes, such as the famous old "Train-describes," with its huge boulder memorial; the Rebecca Nurse and George Jacobs' witch-houses; the homes or birthplaces of Gens. Israel Putnam, Moses Porter, and Grenville M. Dodge, Cols. Israel Hutchinson and Jeremiah Page, and Dr. Samuel Holton and Rev. Dr. Benjamin Wadsworth; the venerable but delightful residences of the original hive of the Porter family; the Peabody Institute; the State Lunatic Asylum; St. John's Normal College; "Oak Knoll," or Whittier's last home; the "Endicott pear-tree"; "Folly Hill," and the lane at its base, where was one of Hawthorne's favorite haunts; several conspicuous monuments; and the numerous churches of the town, with the site of the first meeting-house. The neat little book covers, in its way, two and a half centuries or more; and two or three of its last pages furnish directions that only make it still more a capital guide for the stranger. It may be had at Damrell & Upham's Old Corner Bookstore, and is well fitted for a gift to any one who is fond of matters of local interest or annals of the past.

A HISTORICAL SKETCH OF THE SECOND CHURCH IN BOSTON. By George H. Eager. It is not easy, at the best, to make a history of a local church interesting to the general reader. Particularly is it difficult when that history has to be compressed into something less than one hundred pages. We took up and read, easily within a half-hour, the little historical sketch of the Second Church of Boston written by George H. Eager, and were surprised, when we finished its perusal, to find out how much valuable information had been condensed in so small a volume. It was as though we were reading a chapter of the religious history of New England rather than the recital of the fortunes and misfortunes of some one city church. The reason for this larger interest is that, with possibly a single exception, the doings of no one church in Massachusetts has had a profounder influence upon the destinies of the Commonwealth than this old Second Church. One has simply to call to mind Cotton Mather of witchcraft fame, or remember Increase Mather, afterward president of Harvard College, to see what ministers in colonial times presided as spiritual leaders over the historic society. Then there is Henry Ware, Jr., who, with Channing and Palfrey, played so important a part in moulding the new theology in the early days of the Unitarian controversy. With Ware, Emerson stands forth, whose clear-eyed vision and courageous stand as to what he believed true marks an epoch point in the religious thought of our whole land. King Charles was beheaded in 1649, and in that year many of the Puritans believed that their new commonwealth of God was to be forever established. The enthusiasm in old England was felt here in New England, and the Second Church in Boston was founded and started on its eventful career. In a little more than a century it is a "hot-bed" for patriotism. The West Church was pulled down because it had been used as a signal tower to give intelligence to the provincial army. The Second Church suffered the same fate, and thus were "the king," punished for their disloyalty to the church has had as its pastors Rev. Robert Laird Collier; Rev. E. A. Horton, now president of the Benevolent Fraternity; and Rev. Thomas Van Ness, the present incumbent. In 1899 the church reaches its two hundred and fiftieth year. It is meant shall be placed in the present building as a testimonial. This history of the Second Church, it is announced, is to be sold; and the entire proceeds are to be given to the above purpose.

THE BOYS' REVOLT: A STORY OF THE STREETS OF NEW YORK. By James Otis. Illustrated by W. P. Hooper. Boston: strike of bootblack boys in the city of New York, and it abounds with many exciting scenes and graphic incidents. The description all the features of tyranny, cruelty, and suffering which mark the larger and more notorious strikes. The bootblacks were induced by their leader to form a union; and then war was declared against the Italians and all others who would not join. The result shows how much injury was done to many without gaining the end desired. The narrative of the schemes and selfish aims of the boss, and the way in which he used the money for his personal ends, is told with vividness and force. The various characters have a distinct individuality. We not only see the grasping tyranny and cunning selfishness of Baldy and Skinny, but also examples of brave endurance and moral heroism and noble generosity on the part of others. Taken as a whole, the story of this revolt is not only very interesting, but a realistic description of one of the phases of the labor struggle; and it is none the less important in its suggestions because the actors on the stage are boy bootblacks.

RAVENSHOE. By Henry Kingsley. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. In two volumes. $2.—It is a matter for surprise, when one stops to think about it, that Henry Kingsley's novels have been so little known in America; and this new edition of his books is certainly something to be welcomed. Henry Kingsley was the younger brother of Charles Kingsley. He won distinction as a journalist and editor; and many will remember that he went through the Franco-Prussian War, and was the first Englishman to enter Sedan after it was surrendered. Mr. James Payn, the English critic, has been saying lately that his novels are sure to outlast those of his more famous brother. "Ravenshoe" is a good one for the beginning of the new edition, as it reveals admirably the author's power of narration and his delightful humor. The plot is involved and unusual, serving well to bring out the strength of the various characters. It is a book to be enjoyed.

ROMANCE SWITZERLAND. TEUTONIC SWITZERLAND. By William McCracken. Boston: Joseph Knight Company. 2 vols. These two pocket volumes are not designed to be a guide-book, but put in a brief form historical and biographical details such as the tourist will find useful. By way of explanation, it should be said that the term "Romance" in the first volume is applied to those parts of Switzerland where Roman or Latin influences have remained uppermost, while the "Teutonic" embraces that portion where the German element prevails. The author is well known as the historian of "The Rise of the Swiss Republic," and his long and close knowledge of Switzerland enables him to speak with authority. These two volumes will prove of value as travelling companions, and have an interest to those who wish to recall the memory of places, persons, and incidents connected with their previous travels.

AN UNOFFICIAL PATRIOT. By Helen H. Gardener. Boston Arena Publishing Company.—Miss Gardener is remembered chiefly as the author of "Is this your Son, my Lord?" and "Pray you, Sir, whose Daughter?" the general purpose of which was based on such extreme opinions as that expressed in the preface to the latter, which characterized the mothers of the race as "a helpless, ostracized class, pariahs of a corrupt civilization." Remembering their sensationalism and occasional crudeness, it is pleasant to find Miss Gardener relying on other methods for the success of her new book. This is a tale of days before and during the war. The difficulties, both moral and social, in the way of the loyal Southerner who yet felt a conscientious distrust of slavery and an unwillingness to be bound by its tyranny, is well represented. The book will be read with considerable interest.

RECOLLECTIONS OF GEOFFREY HAMLIN. By Henry Kingsley. In two volumes. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.—The new edition of these Kingsley novels is attractive both by reason of general appearance and convenient size. This one is hardly the equal of "Ravenshoe" in interest or in construction. The two volumes are almost as distinct as two separate books, the latter half introducing new characters, new scenes, and new interest. It is true that this very irregularity of plot renders the stories of the book much more like actual experience in real life. Fate takes an erratic course, too, sometimes; and characters appear and disappear in our lives without warning us of the ultimate part they may play in our fortunes.

AN AGITATOR. By Clementina Black. New York: Harper & Brothers.—This is not a story, in one sense of the word: it is rather a character sketch, in which an earnest man is studied analytically. It aims to show the sequences of experience through which he passes to arrive finally at real poise and correct self-estimate. The culminating incidents of the book are the unjust arrest, conviction, and imprisonment of the agitator for stealing ballots, which would have cost him his election. Without the movement or interest that makes a book popular, this yet repays the reading. It is printed in the convenient form of the "Little Novels," easy to hold and easy to read.

THE LITTLE EPICURE: 700 CHOICE RECIPES. By Linda Hull Larned. New York: The Baker & Taylor Co.—The title well characterizes this book, unless one may take exceptions at the adjective. Only an epicure could appreciate the half-hundred sauces; the variety of marvellous entrées and salads; the startling drinks, ranging from a "Virginia night-cap" at a cost of twelve cents to a "champagne cocktail" worth $5. This feature of appending the price of a dish to the receipt for preparing it is something new. The book is one that will make for high living and exceedingly plain thinking. It is by a woman,—the more's the pity!

ST. JOHN'S WOOLING. By M. G. McClelland. New York: Harper & Brothers. $1. This writer will be remembered as the author of "Oblivion" and other books which have won the praise of critics and the interest of readers. This is a pleasant love-story, neither dull, on the one hand, nor sensational, on the other. The hero is a nice clean Englishman, the heroine a bright, brave Texas girl; and the course of their true love is skilfully set before us from the time of their first meeting, under unusual circumstances, up to the final confession and settlement of their life plans. It is all bright and pure and worth reading.

THE PARASITE. By A. Conan Doyle. New York: Harper & Brothers.—Dr. Doyle is sure of an audience in these days; but, even if this book were by an unknown writer, it would attract attention by its vigorous treatment of an interesting theme. Hypnotism is, doubtless, to receive even more attention in the immediate future than now; and, while Dr. Doyle's book is fascinating as a story, it is also a strong protest against the yielding of one's own will to a power that, however helpful it may prove in isolated instances, is yet sure to weaken in the long run. Such a protest is needed.

FOUND AND LOST. By Mary Putnam Jacobi. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. The two stories bound together in this slender blue volume are entitled respectively "Found and Lost" and "A Sermon from Notre Dame," and are reprinted from the Atlantic Monthly of April, 1860, and Putnam's Magazine of February, 1869. They appeal to the reader's own thought and imagination, and he needs to be responsive to their moods and suggestions in order to appreciate their strength. They deserve well of the reading public, but they are not likely to become popular.

A BREAD AND BUTTER MISS. By George Paston. New York: Harper & Brothers. The masculine pen name is particularly inappropriate when attached to such a book as this, which seems modelled after those of the Duchess and kindred writers, though unredeemed by the occasional brightness that often makes even the lightest of light books readable for an idle half-hour (if anybody has idle half-hours in these days). Its pictures of English life as brought out in two weeks of a house party would be sad and discouraging, were they not so manifestly untrue to reality.

Miscellaneous.

The two bound volumes of Scribner's Magazine for 1894 appear in substantial linen covers that open not grudgingly, as do those of many large volumes, but willingly and temptingly. It is only when the magazines take on this new form that one realizes the variety and richness of their contents.

The Magazines.

The New Century is a new monthly paper published in the interest of the Lyceum League, aiming as such to stimulate good citizenship and to aid good government. The December number opens with an article by Mr. Edwin D. Mead on Edward Everett Hale, under the title "A Great American," and the subtitle "Perhaps the Greatest Man in America." With this number comes the new constitution of the Lyceum League, which provides for the co-operation of clubs and societies in general sympathy with its aims, with no regard for sex distinctions.

At the annual meeting of the National Household Economic Association it was voted to have an organ in which the valuable papers and reports of the national and State associations should be published, and which should serve the various interests of the general work. The result appears in the Journal of Household Economics, a monthly magazine, which proposes to treat scientifically the problems of the home in sanitary and dietetic matters. The Women's Educational and Industrial Association will have a department. The opening number, issued in December, contains a leading article by Mrs. Ellen Battelle Dietrick on "The Science of Household Affairs," "Unwholesome Architecture," "Southern Kitchens," "The Boston Cooking School,"

"The Hygienic Bedroom," and similar practical subjects receive attention; and there are also articles by Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells, Mrs. Diaz, and others. The well-known names of contributors and editors are a guarantee of the high rank which this periodical will undoubtedly take in its own lines of work, and the first number is full of interest and promise.

Literary Notes.

Among other articles in the Atlantic for January may be mentioned the opening chapters of a new serial by Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, entitled "A Singular Life"; three short stories: "Joint Owners in Spain," by Alice Brown, a new writer of much promise; part one of a two-part story by Mrs. Wiggin, "A Village Stradivarius," and "A Wish Fulfilled," by Lafcadio Hearn. In this last story there is a graphic description of a young Japanese soldier leaving his home for the war in the East.

REPETITION.

BY HATTIE TYNG GRISWOLD.

The butterflies are but flowers in motion,
Frost forms and ferns to the eye are kin,
Cloud banks and mountains are loving brothers,
The prairie rolls where the waves have been.

Mosses of land and of sea are kindred,
The coral forms are of branching trees;
And even the living things of ocean
Are not sole sport of the land-locked seas.

The splintered crag and the shivered iceberg
Are one to the eye where distance dims;
The curling smoke and the rain-clouds mingle,
And soft in the ether the fleece form swims.

The finny tribes of the wide-spread waters
Repeat old forms of an early day;
The bird yet carries a trace of the reptile,
Though now the impulse to soar has sway.

The carving done in the sculptured cañon
By ice and water in days long flown,
In subtle tracery, but reneweth
Old forest forms in the plastic stone.

The crystal snow has a thousand faces,
Yet every face is a flower-like star;
And world after world in the nebulous spaces
Globes itself as it shines afar.

ABRIDGED FROM MAURUS JOKAI.

BY EVA CHANNING.

In about the year 1667, while the Turks were ruling in Hungary, Kuzuk was pasha of Grosswardein; and the good city of Debreczin had much to suffer from his fiery temper and arbitrary disposition. Finally, the city obtained in Stefan Dobosy a magistrate who was himself not slow to anger. So that, when Kuzuk, on some slight provocation, threatened to come down upon the inhabitants of Debreczin, Dobosy briefly sent him word that he would be welcome. Two days after that the pasha encamped with his army before the city.

Debreczin possessed neither walls nor moats: its only protection lay in twelve brick towers with thatched roofs, which would at once fall to the ground under fire. One of these towers guarded each gate of the city, yet at a respectful distance, so that a hostile invader should not feel obliged to pull it down, and force the inhabitants to build it up again! The roof of each tower was tenanted by storks, which solemnly stood on one leg and chattered by the hour together, as if they were the most faithful guardians of the city. Kuzuk had drawn up his army before all twelve gates at once, and brought a large cannon to bear upon each one. This was the manner in which he proposed to parley with the people of Debreczin.

At this juncture the city sent to treat with him a Greek, by name Panajoti, an old acquaintance of the pasha, who was usually employed on ticklish missions. When questioned, this ambassador began:—

"Your Excellence, as soon as this incorrigible Stefan Dobosy heard your threats, he at once put all the women, girls, and children into wagons, and sent them up to Tokaj. Then he gave orders that all valuable property should be destroyed, and, as soon as the enemy seized the city, fire should be set in forty places at once, all the inhabitants should arm themselves, and be prepared to break out at one of the gates, and leave Debreczin forever. So your Excellence must take the responsibility if the sultan should ask what has become of the great city of Debreczin, which has so faithfully paid taxes to the Porte, and so liberally quartered the Turkish soldiers."

The pasha flew into a violent rage, but had to acknowledge himself beaten. It would never do to destroy such an important city as Debreczin, and he felt that Dobosy was the man to carry out his threats. So he packed up his cannon and withdrew, sending a message of pardon to the city, whose inhabitants drew a long breath of relief. But hardly had Kuzuk reached Grosswardein, when he called in hot haste for Badrul Beg, the leader of his Moorish cavalry, and gave him the following orders:

"To-day at twilight take five hundred mounted men, and start in the direction of Dioszeg, asking the way of every one you meet. At midnight turn off into the swampy meadow on the left, so that your tracks may be lost. Ask the shepherds in the fields the way to Leta, and kill your guides when you reach there. Enter the great forest beyond the town, and get the charcoal-burners to lead you to the end of the wood opposite Hadráz. Then kill your guides again, and remain on the watch. In the course of a day or two, or it may be a week, you will see a procession of four or five hundred peasants' wagons approaching from Tokaj. They will be filled with beautiful women and girls, and probably money and trinkets to boot. You are to take all these women prisoners, and bring them to me at Grosswardein. Any valuables you may find you can divide among your soldiers. Give heed, and remember you carry your life in your hand!"

From Tokaj, along the high road, comes a long procession of wagons in the direction of Hadráz. It is the women of Debreczin,—five hundred wagons full of women and girls, not a single man among them tall enough to raise the whip. The women are driving themselves. Whoever God intended for a man among them has his little hands neatly bound down with swaddling bands, for he is yet an infant! We can almost fancy we hear the gay chatter, as they relate to each other how finely the Turks were frightened away from the city. Some of the wagons were filled only with young girls, who sang the old Hungarian songs as they moved forward. The girls in one wagon would begin; and all the remaining wagon-loads would take up the refrain, until the welkin rang, and the little larks no longer had the courage to vie with them in singing.

At noon the whole caravan halted on a low green hill in the midst of a wide plain. No city or village was in sight. Here and there a little hamlet was visible, surrounded by hay-ricks; but there was no trace of cultivated fields. All was deserted pasture ground. Only the wonderful Fata Morgana—called by the Southerners "mirage," and by the Hungarians "Délibáb"—was in an extraordinarily good humor that morning, and beautified the scene by its charming pictures of billowy seas, blue islands, lofty forests, and stately palaces. On the hill the girls watched the fairy landscape, as it changed and one fantastic shape dissolved into another.

"See!" cried one. "That is just like the church with the high steeple in Debreczin. And there is the watch-tower at the gate of Grosswardein!"

"Girls," scolded a young woman, who stood below with her fat-cheeked baby, "it is not well to joke about such things. It never brings good luck to recognize any house in the Délibáb. Misfortune always comes to a city which appears thus in the air."

"Look!" all cried suddenly in a breath. But the word died upon their lips, and they all gazed spell-bound with horror and astonishment. What was this sudden apparition? In the direction of Hadráz, high above the enchanted ocean, there was suddenly defined against the sky the gigantic shape of a horseman,—a genuine warrior, with a quiver on his shoulder, a pointed turban on his head, and reins in his hand. "Jesus Christ, do not desert us!" murmured the terror-stricken crowd.

The next moment other figures appeared, all armed giants, some of them standing above the mock sea as far as the flanks of their horses, while others only emerged head and shoulders above the waves. Suddenly all this began slowly to dissolve, until nothing remained in the sky but two light blue bands upon a misty yellow background.

"Jesus Christ! Turk and Tartar are lying in wait for us!" shrieked the women, running together panic-stricken in the midst of the barren wilderness. The mothers seized their children, and ran to the wagons. The maidens scattered their cherished neckerchiefs and earrings along the road, that the robbers might pick them up while they gained time for flight. The wagons were turned from the road, and driven at a break-neck pace across the rough fields. There was no singing now. Only the silent prayer went up from many a heart: "O thou mighty God above, thou who hast so wonderfully betrayed to us the ambush of our wicked enemy, protect us, thy weak handmaids, from his wicked persecution, since we trust in no one else but in thee, thou heavenly God!"

And the Lord did have some other little miracles in store for that day. As the illusory visions vanished from earth and sky, the real landscape came out with surprising distinctness. Clouds with silver linings of rose in the sky, followed by darker belts of cloud which gradually obscured the view, while the wind seemed to mutter from afar, "Run, run!" And meanwhile the wagons were plunging on at full speed in the direction of Bössörmény.

Badrul Beg had carried out Kuzuk pasha's instructions to the letter, and had been encamped for two days in the forest near Hadráz. On the third day the advance guards who were posted at the edge of the wood announced to their leader that some distance off on the plain a long procession was visible, which raised a dust as of hundreds of wagons following one another. "It is they!"

Badrul Beg stationed himself on the top of a hill to watch. Perhaps he was that very giant whose image first appeared upon the sky with quiver and turban. "It is they! Only let them come nearer! No one can warn them of the danger,—no one!"

Even as he spoke, however, the approaching dust-cloud halted, remained stationary a few minutes, and then, most unexpectedly, turned in another direction and fled from sight at a gallop. Badrul Beg gazed around him in a fury: "Who can have betrayed us?"

As if in answer to his question, the wind rose, the high birch trunks began to bow and groan, and a terrible storm lifted itself howling over the plain.

"Up with your spears!" he shouted, undismayed, to his riders. "Our spears will pierce the storm, and we must follow the fugitives. Out upon the plain!"

But the whirlwind was before them, and in the next minute had enveloped the troop of Badrul Beg in so dense a cloud of sand that no one could see his next neighbor. Not even the lightning could penetrate the darkness; but they could hear the deafening peals of thunder which shook the earth and drowned even the voice of the wind. The horse of Badrul Beg reared, and the wind tore off his turban.

"O thou God of the Hungarians," bellowed the Negro, shaking his fist at the sky, "do you take sides with your own people? Nevertheless, you cannot save them from me!"

At the moment these blasphemous words were uttered a hard object struck his shoulder with such force that his arm sank powerless at his side. What was this? Nothing more nor less than a big piece of ice, which was the forerunner of all the rest; for now heaven launched its sling-stones thick and fast. Down they came with a crash and a rattle,—some like birds' eggs, others similar to transparent nuts, others still like the butt-end of a battle-axe; while in some of them many separate lumps were welded together, so that these missiles often weighed several pounds.

"Allah Kérím! Allah Ekber!" yelled the terrified Moors, vainly fleeing the pursuing "sling-stones" of ice, which they had never seen in their Oriental homes. "There is no safety but in God, who is God!" bellowed the predestinating Turks. And all scattered this way and that, whither their horses carried them. When the tempest had passed, Badrul Beg found not more than fifty out of his five hundred warriors. Some twenty lay dead and dying around, with gaping wounds and broken ribs; some had been pelted from their horses by the ice; others were actually buried in it, so that only their hands were visible.

"Miracles are happening here upon earth!" cried, in dismay, the Ethiopian leader, who had never in his life beheld ice before. "Who can fight against Heaven? The Hungarians have a special God, who works miracles for them. Allah preserve us from the anger of the strange God!"

Badrul Beg was not clear in his own mind whether Kuzuk pasha would believe his account of the disaster if he returned without his booty and with the remains of a routed army. Surely, nothing could be stronger testimony to the truth of his words than some of these identical "sling-stones" which had made such havoc in his ranks. Accordingly, he took four of the iron-bound chests which he had brought to contain the trinkets of the Debreczin captives, and had them filled to the brim with hailstones. They were then fastened across the backs of horses for the homeward journey. For greater security he pocketed the keys, and sealed up the keyholes with wax.

It was a two days' journey to Gross-wardein, during which time he was joined by the remnant of his scattered army, who appeared in sorry plight, with broken bones and bruises. Meanwhile the sun blazed down from morning till night; and from the iron-bound chests dripped the water, while they steamed at the top.

In Grosswardein Badrul Beg appeared before the pasha with a lame arm and in all humility, and told his story. Kuzuk pasha was incredulous, and the chests were produced as evidence. When the seals were removed and the chests unlocked, lo! they were completely empty,—not a trace of the "sling-stones from heaven." Badrul Beg rent his upper garment. "Allah be merciful to me! The God of the Hungarians makes the stones with which he slew my warriors vanish out of locked chests!"

"Wretched coward!" exclaimed the pasha, who did not believe a syllable. "Many geese can kill a dog. Surely, those heroic women must have given you a fine reception!" And thereupon he had Badrul Beg led out and hung before his gate.

The women of Debreczin reached their home and friends in safety. Kuzuk pasha always believed that it was they who had so thoroughly overthrown Badrul Beg, and from that day he began to respect them highly.

This story stands written in the archives of the worthy city of Debreczin. You who read it, remember that God on high still knows how to protect his faithful, and that his arm is no shorter now than it was then.

A GOOD REFERENCE.

John was fifteen, and very anxious to get a desirable place in the office of a well-known lawyer who had advertised for a boy, but doubted his success, because, being a stranger in the city, he had no reference to present.

"I'm afraid I'll stand a poor chance," he thought despondently. "However, I'll try and appear as well as I can; for that may help me a little."

So he was careful to have his dress and person neat, and, when he took his turn to be interviewed, went in with his hat in his hand and a smile on his face.

The keen-eyed lawyer glanced him over from head to foot.

"Good face," he thought, "and pleasant ways."

Then he noted the neat suit,—but other boys had appeared in new clothes,—saw the well-brushed hair and clean-looking skin. Very well, but there had been others here quite as cleanly. Another glance, however, showed the finger-nails free from soil.

"Ah! that looks like thoroughness," thought the lawyer.

Then he asked a few direct, rapid questions, which John answered as directly.

"Prompt," was his mental comment: "can speak up when necessary. Let's see your writing," he added aloud.

John took the pen, and wrote his name. "Very well, easy to read and no flourishes. Now, what references have you?"

The dreaded question at last! John's face fell. He had begun to feel some hope of success, but this dashed it again. "I haven't any," he said slowly: "I'm almost a stranger in the city."

"Can't take a boy without references," was the brusque rejoinder; and, as he spoke, a sudden thought sent a flush to John's cheek.

"I haven't any references," he said with hesitation, "but here's a letter from mother I just received. I wish you would read it."

The lawyer took it. It was a short letter:—

My dear John,—I want to remind you that, wherever you find work, you must consider that work your own. Don't go into it, as some boys do, with the feeling that you will do as little as you can, and get something better soon; but make up your mind you will do as much as possible, and make yourself so necessary to your employer that he will never let you go.

You have been a good son to me, and I can truly say I have never known you to shirk. Be as good in business, and I am sure God will bless your efforts.

"H'm!" said the lawyer, reading it over the second time. "That's pretty good advice, John,—excellent advice. I rather think I'll try you, even without the references."

John has been with him five years, and last spring was admitted to the bar.

"Do you intend taking that young man into partnership?" asked a friend lately.

"Yes, I do. I couldn't get along without John: he is my right-hand man!" exclaimed the employer, heartily.

And John always says the best reference he ever had was a mother's good advice and honest praise.—Exchange.

HOW CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS HELPED BESSIE.

When Uncle Jack came one evening to take us all to the museum, mamma said she was afraid to trust him with such a tribe. But he said nothing could happen at a museum.

"I'll count them," said he. "A buff girl and a blue girl and a pink girl, and a brown knickerbocker boy, a gray knickerbocker boy, and little Billee in sailor rig, —six in all."

And mamma laughed, and told him never to let go of Billy's hand; and off we went, as soon as we could get our hats on. We had never been to a museum before, and we thought it splendid. There was an aquarium full of fish, and cages full of birds, and some cats in one cage and some monkeys in another. A band kept playing, and a lecturer told us what everything was. Then we went into a room full of stuffed animals and curiosities; and then into another, where there was a gorilla and kings and queens and poets and presidents and singers. The gorilla was stuffed; but the folks were made of wax, with such nice clothes on that they looked like truly people. Queen Victoria was plump, like grandma; but Queen Elizabeth was as stiff as her ruffle.

Little Billy was frightened and cried, and so Uncle Jack took us to the refreshment-room to have supper.

The band played while we had our refreshments; and we could have stayed all night, only a bell began to ring, and uncle said it was closing time.

"Now, follow me, children," he said.

There was a big crowd; and a woman with lots of flounces and a big hat pushed me with her elbow, and I dropped my handkerchief. I stooped to pick it up, and some one stumbled over me. Another somebody gave me a push. I just saved myself from falling downstairs, and somehow got pushed back into the room. It was the round room with the wax figures in it, and I thought I would go back and take one more look at them; and I gave a scamper, and ran around the room. It was such fun to be all alone there! But, just as I got around again, all of a sudden the lights went out—swish! And just at the same time the door banged to, and I was shut into the big room; and, though I screamed and beat upon the door, no one heard me. I began to know the museum was closed, and I was shut up there for the night.

It is very foolish to cry if you can help it, but sometimes you can't. The only comfort I could get was to sit down on Queen Victoria's throne, because she looked just a little like grandma.

Although the lights were all out, the moon shone through the big skylight; and I could see pretty well. And I felt better close to her, though she did stare, than if I had been near Queen Elizabeth, who had Mary Queen of Scots' head cut off. The gorilla was dreadful; but I kept saying, "He is stuffed." And the worst feelings I had were about mamma and Jennie and Kitty and all the rest. They would think I was killed by a trolley-car or lost in the dreadful streets. And all of a sudden I remembered that it was Saturday, and next day Sunday, and that they would not open the museum until Monday. Then I did cry.

If there had been windows, I could have climbed up to them and knocked on the panes; but there was only a skylight, as I told you. The moon was right overhead, and it seemed as if she ought to see me; but she sailed on, big and white, and cold as ice. Queen Elizabeth looked as if she wanted to behead me, too. George Washington looked noble, but he didn't seem to see me. I felt as if they were all live people, who would not speak to me. I got up and began to run around the room, crying dreadfully; and all of a sudden I ran against Christopher Columbus.

"Oh Christopher Columbus!" I cried. "You discovered America. Do discover a way for me to get home!"

Now, they tell me he is always pointing. He is supposed to be just in sight of land, you know. But it seemed to me, there in the moonlight, that he lifted his finger when I spoke; and it was all the same to me as if he had, for I looked where he pointed, and there on the wall I saw a messenger-call. We have one at our house. You pull it once for a messenger and twice for police, and three times for the fire-engines. Christopher Columbus had discovered a way for me to get home. I ran back to him, and reached up and kissed his hand.

"They ought to have been ashamed to put you in chains," I said. "Don't you think I'd better call the firemen? The messenger-boy couldn't get in, the police might think I was a burglar, but the firemen would be sure to come."

Columbus looked kind; and I pulled the call three times, and three times again. It did not seem five minutes before I heard a noise outside, and there were the engines; and feet came flying upstairs, and the door burst open. I stood close to Columbus; and the big fireman walked up to me, and stooped down.

"Hullo!" said he. "Did you give the alarm, little one?" "Yes, sir," I said. "I was left behind and shut up in here, and I rang for you, because I know that the brave fire-laddies always save little girls from burning houses."

"To be sure!" he said.

Then he carried me downstairs, and told the other men, and they all hurrahed for me; and then he took me home to my house, and he carried me all the way.—New York Ledger.

A SUCCESSFUL MAN.

Bertel Thorwaldsen, the sculptor, began life under adverse circumstances. His father drank, his mother was an ignorant peasant, and neither of them could give the boy the slightest advancement in life. His interest in wood-carving seemed to bring out the only signs of intelligence he ever showed at this early age. As one writer says, like Claude Lorraine,—who could never be taught to make a tart, though his father was a pastry cook, nor to read a book,—he was quite dense to the charms of reading. Yet he could carve wood; and, when he was eleven years old, a friend procured for him admission to the Danish Academy of the Fine Arts. And there he made marvellous progress.

At the age of seventeen he won a small prize medal awarded by the academy as a prize for drawing and modelling, and about that time he was required by the laws of the Lutheran Church to present himself for confirmation. The chaplain, however, in examining him, found him so deplorably ignorant of the simplest book-learning that he was about to send him to the lower form, when he happened to ask:—

"Was the student who gained the silver medal your brother, or any relation to you?"

"It was I," responded Bertel, confused; and the good clergyman's tone and look changed at once.

"Herre Thorwaldsen," said he, respectfully, "you may go into the upper form."

In the years of his prosperity Thorwaldsen used to declare that he had never felt such elation as at the first use of that respectful title.

His fellow-students at the academy remembered him as very silent and shy,—a youth who cared little for their sports and escapades, but who worked while they were talking, and who generally finished his preliminary sketch while they were deciding how a subject should be treated. Yet he was not self-confident, and an approaching contest for a gold medal filled him with such alarm that his fellows had only to say, "Thorwaldsen, remember the examination!" to set him trembling.

On the appointed day he appeared with the rest; but, when the subject was given out, "Heliodorus expelled from the Temple," panic seized him, and he rose and fled. On the way out of the building he met a friend, who persuaded him to return; and he won the prize.

The story of his life is full of alleviating incidents of high attainment and idleness, and it was only after he made a visit to Rome that he awakened to the true meaning of an artist's life. Thereafter he lived on the full flood of public favor as very few men have done. Success attended him daily, and to the very end.

CAMBODIAN CHILDREN.

Cambodian children are docile, obedient, quiet in their sports, and very respectful to their parents. They are never seen presenting anything to their father with one hand, negligently or hurriedly; but well-brought-up children, observing well the old customs, offer the object requested with both hands, gracefully bowing. They do not eat with their father unless he invites them, but with their mother and her women, in whose charge they are. They do not sit with their father or on the same level, because it is proper for children to be always placed below their father. They have likewise a great respect for their mother; but it is more intimate than that for their father, who is also master of the house, and is designated by a word that means master and prince.—A. Leclère, in Popular Science Monthly.

A GHASTLY DISEASE.

Different Doctors Give It Different Names.

The Result Always the Same.—Speedy Death.—Until Recently, Considered Hopeless.—Now, New Methods. Salvation.

Nothing is more alarming than diseases of an ulcerous nature. A continual gnawing away of life-generating tissue, until a vital spot is reached, an artery is severed, or from sheer weakness death ensues.

Especially in Gastritis—ulcers of the stomach—is terrible suffering experienced. The symptoms, though not at first alarming (seemingly a slight attack of indigestion), gradually become worse, so that no nourishment can be retained on the stomach, and unless the trouble-causing ulcer produces death by perforation, the patient

Dies of Starvation.

In Consumption, where the ulcers attack the lungs, the termination is very similar, as it is, in fact, in any of the wasting diseases to which are given various names, according to the organs affected.

By the methods of physicians of to-day thousands of lives are being saved in cases that a few years ago were considered hopeless. The first step now taken to effect a cure is to make new blood and tissue, give the patient strength, and keep him "on the gain" by administering Bovinine.

Bovinine is not a medicine, but a greatly concentrated extract of the most vital elements of lean raw beef. The life-maintaining qualities of this wonderful preparation are simply marvellous. Dr. A. M. Cook, of New Castle, Pa., states that he maintained life in his wife, while suffering from gastric ulcers, for three weeks without giving her anything through the mouth, injecting Bovinine instead.

With such results as this, it is not to be wondered at that Bovinine is indorsed by physicians everywhere, and has become recognized as the greatest factor in saving life, hastening recovery from sickness, and warding off disease, ever given to man.

ANNA C. LOWELL.

A FRENCH TRIBUTE.

The following tribute to the late Miss Anna Lowell of Roxbury we copy from our French contemporary, the Protestant:—

We have received from America the sad news of the death, at an advanced age, of Miss Anna C. Lowell, who worthily bore a name dear to all the liberals of America. Profoundly religious and animated by the purest Christian spirit, Miss Lowell was universally loved and venerated in Boston for the great part that she took in all works of philanthropy and of sound religious and moral propagation. We owe to her a respectful tribute of regret, for her Christian generosity extended even unto us. When Rev. Athanasius Coquerel, filis, visited America, he had the honor of being presented to her. She became interested in the charity work of the liberal Protestantism of Paris; and ever since, each year, when the sale of La Réunion Protestante de Charité is held, a check from Boston, enclosed in a touching letter which doubled the price of the large offering, reminded us that Christian love is not limited by distance. The memory of this noble Christian will be piously preserved among us as in America, and we offer to those who mourn her the tribute of our religious and sincere sympathy.

DR. THOMAS HALL.

Died, Dec. 27, 1894, at Coosada, Elmore County, Ala., Dr. Thomas D. Hall, aged sixty-five. The Montgomery Advertiser says: "Dr. Hall was one of the best known physicians of this section. He was a colonel in the Confederate army, a brave man, warm-hearted and true; and his friends are legion." In a region where our views were then wholly unknown Dr. Hall became a strong Unitarian, although he never saw a Unitarian minister, and never met but one person of kindred faith outside the friends in his vicinity who were converted by his own influence. He had outgrown religion known to him only in the orthodox creeds taught around him. The death of his beloved wife made him long for some sustaining faith acceptable to both head and heart. At that time he chanced to see Miss Ellis's advertisement of Unitarian literature, and began a correspondence which ended only with her life, and has been continued ever since by another member of the Cincinnati Branch of the Women's Alliance. Dr. Hall became the most zealous of Unitarians, delighting in nothing more than in lending his literature and influencing others to accept views so precious to himself. As the result of his efforts, there is now a little group of earnest, intelligent people in and around Montgomery, few in numbers, but fine in quality, destined no doubt to be the nucleus of a Unitarian church some day in that capital city. To sow the seed that should lead to the upbuilding of such a church was Dr. Hall's most ardent desire; and, when it comes, his name is sure to be remembered as its pioneer and founder. Not only was his liberal faith a source of great comfort and strength to himself, but it enabled him, as a physician, to speak words of higher cheer and brighter hope to the sick and dying, which were found unspeakably precious and helpful. After he had begun circulating Unitarian sermons, the Methodist minister in his town undertook to expose the new heresy, taking for his theme a sermon of James Freeman Clarke's that had fallen into his hands. As he went on vigorously denouncing both sermon and writer, he exclaimed, "Away with this fellow!" This was more than Dr. Hall could bear without a protest. He arose, and said: "Dr. Clarke is not a 'fellow': no one in Boston is more highly honored and respected than he," and then left the church. These last months, as his disease, heart disease, progressed,—a disease which his own knowledge assured him was incurable,—he felt his religious isolation at times profoundly. It was pathetic to have him write, "I wish I could look once before I die on the face of a Unitarian friend." His Cincinnati correspondent hastened to write that Rev. George L. Chaney was even then on his way South, and proposed stopping in Montgomery to look upon the faces of the faithful few there. But Dr. Hall's fears that he should not live to meet Mr. Chaney were destined to be realized. He met death with entire calmness, watching his own case as a physician to the end, knowing almost to a moment how long he could live.

The thought of this earnest man thinking out his own faith alone, cherishing it so staunchly in a community where it inevitably brought him a degree of isolation, distrust, reproach, should be at once an encouragement to the Post-office Mission work and a stimulus to greater zeal on the part of those Unitarians rejoicing in many church and social privileges, which too often they take as a matter of course, with no feeling of responsibility in laboring to share these opportunities with others less favored in location. M. P. W. S. Cincinnati, Ohio.

GEORGE M. STEARNS.

You ask me to say a word about Hon. George M. Stearns. Let me assure you that, the better you knew him, the more difficult to comply with your request.

He was not one of those men who touch human life at points, but one who was touched on every side, as the atmosphere touches the body, and felt all that this contact with humanity brings with it.

He entered into the joys of life with a vigorous relish; the sorrows of the unfortunate were always eloquent in their appeal to him; and the wrongs that men inflict on man, woman, or child, awakened all the energies of his intellectual and moral nature, and pledged them at once to have the right done for the benefit of both parties. For he was never revengeful.

His mind, whether in preparing a case or at the bar, reading a book for pleasure or in private conversation, was astonishingly active and alert. His powers were all in hand, and along all lines an exhaustless wit bubbled up as naturally as a fountain.

I never saw a man with a finer sense of moral relations. He never called right wrong or wrong right; but he called all acts by good, honest English names, whether his own or those of others. I recollect hearing a venerable lady, who was very proud of him, remonstrate with him when he persisted in calling raffling at a church fair "a lottery." "George," said she, "don't call it a lottery. Call it a gift enterprise." The last word had hardly fallen from her lips when he replied, "Mother, you can't put up any 'umbrill' that God cannot see right through."

His knowledge of the Scriptures was very great, and his use of them was decidedly original. He once persuaded his minister to take a share in a church "gift enterprise," promising the minister that he should surely draw a case of beautiful knives. The fact was fortune favored him. But the next morning they were sent to the parsonage with a letter containing a characteristic Scriptural allusion: "Last night I inveigled you into buying a lottery ticket with the promise you should draw. Remembering the fate of Ananias and Sapphira for lying to a holy man, cowardice prompts me to send this."

To those who knew him, and their number was legion, there was something greater about him than the successful lawyer and finer than the brilliant wit. There was an indescribable charm about the man. Nothing could exceed the sweetness of his social and domestic life, and nothing but a sense of duty could draw him away from the little circle that frequented his fireside. His smile would win a child, and his welcome was a benediction.

No minister ever had a kinder critic or a more considerate listener, and no church a more loyal son. His friends, now that the strong, genial man has gone, must feel the weaker; but they must ever esteem it a great good fortune to have known him.

CALVIN STEBBINS.

Personals.

Miss Lucretia Babcock, who died last month in Milton at the age of eighty-three, had for forty years been a subscriber to the Christian Register. Her father was one of the original subscribers, at the solicitation of Mr. David Reed. So that this paper has had an uninterrupted course in that family.

A correspondent from Pepperell reminds us that a year has passed since the sudden death of Mrs. Martha Blake in a sleighing accident. A year has not lessened the fragrance of her memory in her old home, where she was so much beloved. She was a friend to every one, interested in all good works, and especially the willing helper in religious undertakings, while in her own family she was a perfect example of love and fidelity.

Among the ministers who have served in the upbuilding of the Christian spirit throughout our land, to few has been given a grander work than to the venerable and gracious poet who sang his curfew song ten years or more ago, but the fires upon the hearthstone of whose mortal life were covered but a few days since. Dr. Holmes has fulfilled a grand ministry. He has spoken the noblest word for God. He has always been lovingly reverent to Jesus Christ. His wit has been the solvent of bigotry. He has never in all his fun been a trifler with truth. He has broadly done for the religious thought of the century what Whittier did for the political.—Rev. S. E. Her- rick, D. D.

You're Losing Something.

every day that you try to worry along without Pearline. And what's the use? What do you gain? You can't have washing done more safely than it's done with Pearline. And it can't be done more cheaply—if it's done safely.

Where you lose is in time and labor. Pearline saves half of both. You lose in clothes, too. You can't rub them clean in the old way on the washboard, without rubbing them to pieces. All these things that you lose are money.

Beware Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled; if your grocer sends you an imitation, be honest—send it back. 350 JAMES PYLE, New York.

THE UNITARIAN.

No religious periodical in America has abler writers. Its matter is fresh, living, varied, abreast of the best thinking and scholarship of the age. Contains Sermons from the ablest Liberal Preachers; Articles on religious topics of living interest; Editorials; Literary Notes; Notices of the best Liberal Books; News from the Churches; Woman's Word and Work, etc.

UNSOLICITED COMMENTS:

I take great pleasure in the Unitarian and recommend it right and left. There are few other magazines I read so much.—Massachusetts.

I take a good many papers and magazines, but no other periodical so full of spiritual nutrition as the Unitarian. It is splendid.—Nebraska.

I thought the first number of the publication, years ago, a good thing, and I may say that my first estimate rather increases than otherwise, right up to the current number.—Wisconsin.

HELEN KELLER.

TACITA LOQUITUR.

BY RUTH PUTNAM.

A living spirit prisoned in a cell,
Four jailers guarding each an entrance gate,—
Speech, Hearing, Taste, and Sight forbid by Fate
To bear a simple message or to tell Earth's humblest tidings. Thus in darkness fell
The spirit dwelt, her thoughts or small or great
In utter solitude. Kin, friend, or mate
Bereft of means an ingress to compel;
Yet strong the being of that hidden soul,
And every cruel, cruel bar it has o'erleapt,
By simple touch alone has made the whole
Inspired world her kin, has grown adept
In thought sympathy. By one portal
Has life opened to this soul immortal.

A HUNGARIAN TRIBUTE.

The Supreme Consistory of the Hungarian Unitarians have sent the following letter to the American Unitarian Association:—

Dear Christian Brethren,—Our beloved bishop, the Right Rev. Joseph Ferencz, in his annual report, mentioned very mournfully the death of your distinguished secretary, the late Rev. Grindall Reynolds; and all the members present received the sad record with a deep sympathy, and unanimously agreed to express our sorrow in the minutes, too, and at the same time to let you know of our decision.

And we do this for the reason,—since your highly esteemed secretary has done a great service in the interest of Unitarianism in the United States of America, the inspiring and animating effect of which has come across the ocean to us also,—we do this because the departed one gave so many tokens of his fraternal love to the Hungarian Unitarians that the Supreme Consistory, in the year of 1893, in acknowledgment of his merit, has elected him as an honorary member of the Consistory.

And, when we take sincerely part in your sorrow over the death of the late Rev. Grin-dall Reynolds, we wish the success of your Association, and express our hope that you will find a zealous and indefatigable secretary instead of him, who will carry the useful work of your society in the same spirit. May the blessing of the only one God rest upon your Association!

With kind regards and fraternal greetings
we remain,
For the Supreme Consistory,
L. NAGY, Secretary.

Charities and Reforms.

The call for the third biennial convention of the World Woman's Christian Temperance Union invites all interested to meet in convention June 14-21 in Queen's Hall and Exeter Hall, London. All temperance, women's, purity, and labor organizations are invited to send fraternal delegates. The British Women's Temperance Association holds its meetings contemporaneously. The leading temperance speakers of England and America will be on the programmes; and distinguished Women's Christian Temperance Union leaders of Canada, Australasia, South Africa, India, China, Japan, and the Hawaiian Republic will be present.

A most useful work of the Massachusetts Emergency and Hygiene Association is that done in their training classes of women attendants. These attendants take a regular course of instruction, and fit themselves for care of the sick in cases where the services of a thoroughly trained nurse are not required. Many people will appreciate the advantage of securing an attendant for seven dollars a week instead of a nurse at twenty-one dollars or more, when the patient is not seriously ill. They have had seventy-five pupils, sixty-five of whom have nearly steady employment. The second daily class for this winter will begin soon, as well as the Friday evening classes for nursery maids. No pupil is admitted under twenty years of age. This opens a new source of livelihood to young women, and ought to attract many. Applications may be made to Mrs. D. H. Kinney, 29 St. James Avenue, or Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells, 45 Commonwealth Avenue. The course of instruction consists of forty lessons followed by an examination with a tuition fee of ten dollars.

Art.

An exhibition of pictures of the late Mr.
E. T. Billings was opened last Monday evening in the rooms of the Unity Art Club, corner of Boylston and Exeter Streets, Boston. Many friends have loaned pictures in their possession, but we miss from the collection some of Mr. Billings's best portraits. Nevertheless, there are enough there to show the sincerity, truthfulness, fidelity, and soulful character of his work.
Mr. Billings had not the affectations and extravagance of some of the extreme modern school. He did not paint merely to show what he could do with his colors, any more than a good writer writes simply to show his style. Nor did he have the vices of modern impressionism. His style was candid rather than superficial, sober rather than extravagant. His picture portraits have the verity of a likeness. That of James Freeman Clarke is the best we have ever seen of him; and Mr. Billings had the distinction of painting the best picture of Dr. Clarke's classmate, Oliver Wendell Holmes. His Wendell Phillips conveys something of the orator as well as the man.

A portrait of a little child with golden hair is a beautiful depiction of child life. A portrait of Mr. Billings's friend, George Fuller, painted when a comparatively young man, is full of deep prophetic intensity.
The interior of a wheelwright-shop is worthy of a Dutch master; and there are many other studies, a few of them landscapes, which reveal Mr. Billings's native power in the maturity of its exercise.
Though many of these pictures belong to private and public collections, there are others which Mrs. Billings offers for sale; and the opportunity to secure some example of Mr. Billings's work is one of which American collectors may well avail themselves.

Here and There.

Missouri has the smallest number of women convicts in her State prison of any State in the Union. There are but sixty-nine in a population of three thousand.

In Italy a plant, Agaricus olearius, is found on the trunks of olive-trees, that often emits a bright light of a blue tint that is so vivid that sometimes it can be seen in the daytime.

There are no cats within the limits of Leadville, Col., the thin atmosphere at that altitude (10,200 feet) being fatal to them.
They are, however, not required, the town being free from rats and mice from the same cause.

Envelopes were not used in Japan until recently; and letters were always folded in a piece of paper, which was wrapped with great care, according to prescribed forms, differing according to the relation and rank of the person addressed.

The oldest emblem of royalty in existence is the iron crown of the Lombards. The inner strip of iron, according to tradition, was beaten out of one of the nails used at the crucifixion. Its most distinguished wearers have been Charlemagne, Charles V., and Napoleon.—Port Chester Journal.

In Scotland cock-fights were sanctioned as a school recreation till the middle of the last century; and the master received a fee, called "cock-penny," from the boys on the occasion. As late as 1790, at Applecross in Ross-shire, "the cock-fight dues" were reckoned as a part of the schoolmaster's income. If the income of foot-ball were applied to the salaries of college professors they would be substantially increased.

The Best Food For Children?

is worthy every parent's study; not only what they can eat, but what gives the most nourishment. No children are better, and most are worse, for eating lard-cooked food. If, however, their food is prepared with the healthful new vegetable shortening, COTTOLENE instead of lard, they can eat freely of the best food without danger to the digestive organs. You can easily verify this by a fair trial of Cottolene.

SEVERAL of the London newspapers which have sent or are about to send special correspondents to Armenia have been advised that the sultan will not allow them to accompany the official commission. The Turkish government dreads the newspaper, and it is known that attempts at bribery have been made through Turkish agents to keep details of the massacre from the American press. It is said that the English journals have decided, therefore, to make an independent investigation. The report of the official commission cannot be rendered for several months on account of the deep snow which covers the region which needs to be visited. The British consul in Ezeroum has suggested a preliminary inquiry at that place, to hear the testimony of refugees and other witnesses. The same might be done advantageously at Athens, where a large number of Armenian refugees have congregated.

CURSES frequently come home to roost. In dealing with the Armenian question, especially that phase of it which relates to the protection of naturalized Armenian citizens of this country who may be in Turkey, the United States has been reminded of the fact that it has claimed and exercised the right to exclude from this country such people as it may desire, and, as in the case of the Chinese, even a whole race. The United States Supreme Court has declared the law to be constitutional. This position of our government gives a leverage for Turkey to claim that it has a right to exclude from its dominions people of any class or nationality which it deems objectionable. Thus the result of our own barbaric laws falls upon our own shoulders. Before we can quite reform Turkey, we need some reformation at home; and it would be in order, to this end, to agitate for the repeal of these objectionable and unrighteous laws.

DWELLERS in Brooklyn are now seriously inconvenienced by the strike which was ordered last Monday on nearly all the trolley lines. The difficulty between the men and the managers of the roads is one that would be best settled by arbitration, as it is a difficulty which has two sides. On the one hand, the men claim, with a justice which is admitted by some of the most experienced railroad men, that their services as motormen are certainly worth $2.25 or $2.50 a day. It is work which requires the most constant vigilance for the protection of life and property, and a good class of men is indispensable. On the other hand, the representatives of the railroad companies say, and maintain that they are able to confirm their allegations with proofs from their books, that the roads have not paid during the last year, and that it would be impossible for them to make advances on wages at the present time. These statements and other matters relating to the question of extra trips are such as ought to go before a competent board of arbitration; and it is to be regretted that the efforts thus far made by a representative of the State Board of Arbitration to effect a compromise have failed. A prolonged strike will mean a great loss to the railroad companies, a loss to the men, and great inconvenience to the public.

IN Georgia a minister of the gospel and a layman fell into a discussion on the subject of infant baptism. We are not informed as to which side the minister took; but it is evident that he could not rely wholly upon the strength of his argument, and that his weapons were not drawn from the armory of Scripture texts, for the discussion grew so hot that the minister drew a revolver and fired at his opponent. But his aim was as bad as his intention. Failing to hit him, he drew a knife, and succeeded in slashing the clothing of his adversary. This is not the first time that weapons have been used in theological controversy. When Christianity formed an alliance with the civil power, it was not alone by the cross that she conquered. The sword became an instrument, strangely enough, for the propagation of the gospel, as it did for the propagation of Mohammedanism. But it is as true as ever that force cannot take the place of ideas. This is one reason why, after the political conquests of Christianity, the ideas and customs of the tribes it had conquered continued to live in Christianity itself: the conquest was external, not internal. As for the minister referred to, it would seem that a contest concerning infant baptism ought to be decided by water instead of by fire, and that it would have been more ecclesiastical if he had thrown his opponent into the river instead of attacking him with knife and pistol.

SENATOR HILL maintains that senators should be elected by popular vote. His experience has been such that he will probably be believed when he says that the election of senators by legislatures gives an opportunity for scandalous intrigue and corruption in politics. But, if this is the main argument, it is not a sufficient one. Instead of authorizing the election of senators by popular vote, it is an open question whether it might not be better to abolish the Senate altogether. In the original conception of that body it was assumed that State sovereignty was directly represented through the vote of the legislatures. The Senate thus stands as a political body representing State traditions and interests over-against the popular representation in the House. As a matter of fact, however, the Senate does not represent any more directly or perfectly the interests and sentiments of the whole people of any State than these are represented by the members of the House; and, though the Senate has always been the more dignified body, it is doubtful if statesmanship and political foresight are any more common in that body than they are in the other. The arguments which may be advanced for the preservation of the House of Lords as representing a titled nobility cannot be advanced for the preservation of the Senate.

THE worst evil of this dual system of chambers is not in the federal government, but in the fact that the scheme has been copied in all the State legislatures and in most of our municipal governments, where there is not the slightest reason for the existence of two legislative bodies. Instead, therefore, of beginning with the abolition of the Senate, which might as well be effected if there is to be an election by popular vote, we would begin with the abolition in our cities of the common council, leaving the legislative power in the hands of a single body, such as the board of aldermen. This reform might work up, as the evil it has intended to correct has worked down; and, after we have dropped the State senates, we might find that the national Senate was superfluous. In its history in the past there have been men of statesmanlike power and dignity, who have given great character to that body. There are a few such left; but the influence of such men would be equally potent for good, if not more so, in a single legislative chamber.

PRESIDENT ELBRIDGE GERRY of New York, of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty, has introduced a bill into the legislature of that State for the punishment of wife-beating and some other forms of cruelty by flogging. If there is any criminal to whom such a mode of punishment might rightly be applied, did it seem best to employ it at all, it would be the cruel, brutal wife-beater. But criminal statistics show, and, indeed, the whole history of penology, that cruelty is not repressed by cruelty. The more severe the punishments, the more severe have been the crimes which accompanied them; and one reason for this is, no doubt, the fact that the sentiment which permitted the application of cruel punishments was but coincident with the sentiment which created the crimes. So the establishment of the whipping-post in New York would by no means tend to lessen the crimes for which it was prescribed. On the other hand, it would give a certain prominence to flogging as an instrument of punishment which might find imitation in school discipline and in domestic life. If we are to apply physical punishment instead of moral force to criminals, there is no reason why we should stop with flogging or why it should be limited to certain classes of crimes. The argument that "the punishment should fit the crime" is only another form of applying the Hebrew law of retaliation, which ought by this time to be superseded by more Christian ideas and principles in relation to retribution and reformation.

IN the realm of natural law we may predict some things with tolerable certainty. We can foretell the motions and periods and conjunctions of heavenly bodies, and may calculate eclipses for years ahead, the changes of the moon and the motions of the tide; but, when it comes to the operation of economic laws upon human life and society, we can speak with no such absolute certainty, because the factors are constantly changing, and we cannot be sure that we have included and computed them all. Cities have often been mapped out on the grandest scale in the confidence that a tide of commercial prosperity was sure to bring them growth and wealth. But some unlooked for element has suddenly appeared, and destroyed the whole calculation. Many commercial failures are the result of changes in the price of a commodity so slight that they almost seem inappreciable at first, but, in the aggregate, are of immense force. So we cannot predict with certainty what will be the result of the operation of forces and elements that enter into the industrial and social revolution that is going on at the present time. The introduction of labor-saving machinery has brought about vast changes in the industrial situation, many of which were described and analyzed in the papers we published a few years since by Hon. David A. Wells. We have not yet passed out of this transitional era, and just where it will leave us even the wisest prophet can hardly predict with infallibility. But we may declare with some certainty that, in the social struggle which accompanies this industrial evolution, the political economist is not the absolute arbiter. There are ethical elements which will certainly enter into the solution. This gives us some confidence to hope that the result, whatever it may be, will be better for society and for the individual.

PARISH ECONOMICS.

"The business affairs and engagements of the parish should be undertaken and carried out as sacred trusts, with all the exactness, fairness, and fidelity that can be expected in the acts of any trustee." So writes Dr. Washington Gladden in "Parish Problems," a book published a few years ago by the Century Company, copies of which might be handed about with edification among ministers and laity. The affairs of religious societies fall into looseness, and often into scandalous disorder and damage, merely because it is not quite realized that all business must be managed on business principles.

It is more shame to say that the ethical standard is sometimes below the level of what men of the world call "honor." There are religious societies which are very slack about meeting their engagements, and we have heard an architect say that none of his dues were so hard to collect as those incurred by church building committees. The record of delay and failure in payment of the salaries of pastors, janitors, and other employed persons would supply many shady pages of ecclesiastical history. It is not always easy to fix the responsibility for this form of practical injustice and cruelty; but in every case there is culpable carelessness on the part of those who first make a contract, and then plead the inability act as an excuse for its non-fulfilment. Some restraint ought to be laid upon the tendency to go in debt, and take the chances. This is a rock on which many promising enterprises have gone to sad wreck. Why should not a religious society, like any other family, live within its means? Why should it incur bills, and expect somebody else to pay them?

However it may be with other corporations, a religious society must have a soul and a conscience, or lose its reason for existence. Its hold on the respect of the community will depend, in part, on its business standing; and its moral influence will surely be compromised and impaired by any neglect to fulfil its obligations, or by any unfairness, even toward the boy who raises the wind for the organ.

But good nature and good intentions do not cover the whole ground. There are nice questions concerning the acquisition, holding, and administration of church property, which call for lawyerly wisdom and counsel; and, for want of due attention to these questions, the good cause itself must deeply suffer. Trustees who are chosen for their pious zeal, but who lack practical qualifications, are quite as likely to wreck the ship of Zion as are those who represent only the worldliness and indifference of the average congregation. Good housekeeping and skilful kitchen management are not more necessary to the health and comfort of the family than are prudence, tact, foresight, and considerate attention to the outward and inward prosperity of a church.

It is always in order for the pastor to stir up the pure minds of the people to the performance of duty along every line; but, with rare exceptions, he would do well to leave "temporalities" to the care of his parishioners and their chosen officers and committees, always keeping in sympathetic touch with them, but never weakening their sense of responsibility by taking their duties on himself. Any church which imposes on its minister the necessity of sitting up nights as nurse to a sick treasury must not expect him to be wide-awake in the pulpit nor vigilant as a watchman upon the walls.

No pecuniary outlay ought to bring such large returns of benefit,—and benefit of the finest kind,—both to the contributors and to the community, as the money devoted to the promotion of pure religion and human welfare. This return of benefit depends on two conditions,—the spirit in which it is given, and the wisdom with which it is expended. These two conditions are vitally related: each is a cause, and each is an effect. When we fear that the money will not be well applied, we give grudgingly; and, when they know that the dollars come reluctantly, those in charge of the expenditure are apt to take narrow, niggardly, and unhelpful views of their own service. On the other hand, when we see and feel that our contributions are turned to good account for the church and the world, we can never give enough; and, when the disbursing committee feels itself strongly backed, it is inspired with a just ambition to deserve confidence by undertaking larger enterprises and by placing every appropriation where it will do most good.

There is a call for closer study of parish economics; for, since whatever is worth doing at all is worth doing well, surely the best work in the world deserves to be done in the best way in the world. As in every congregation are some who are fitted to take charge of the music or of the Sunday-school, so there are some who are competent to serve on the Committee of Ways and Means, and to think out such practical problems as these: What are the best methods of providing a regular and dependable revenue for the church? Considering the actual resources of the people, how much can we wisely undertake to raise year by year? To what uses can this money be applied, so as to secure the best results? How can waste and leakage be stopped? And how can the spirit of self-taxation be quickened and sustained, so that giving may be prompt and joyous?

No two parishes are alike in situation or needs: no two committees might reach precisely the same conclusions. But the principles and objects are everywhere the same; and, when we really care enough for these, the will is sure to make the way. One beautiful form of service to God and man may be found in thoroughly organizing and prudently guiding the business affairs of the local church. As the value of the Sunday service may turn, in part, on proper heating and ventilation, so the usefulness of the entire spiritual plant to the community may depend on the wisdom, vigor, and steadiness of its financial administration.

SUFFERING FOR BREAD.

In a land of plenty it seems incredible that people should starve to death, or even suffer the pangs of hunger and be unable to meet their bodily wants, especially if they are able and willing to work. But the pitiful stories of actual need are new every day. From Nebraska, from Kansas, from Ohio, come accounts of destitution and suffering that are heart-rending, and that call for more sympathy because this destitution has come from causes beyond their own power to prevent. Failure of harvests for three successive years in the West, and mining difficulties in Ohio, have left hundreds and thousands of families in want of bread and clothing to meet this severe winter weather.

And, if the whites of those regions are suffering, not less severe is the distress among the Indians. The Indian Rights Association of Philadelphia, through the secretary, Mr. Herbert Welsh, has issued an urgent appeal for food supplies from the general public for the Navajo Indians. It is desirable to have it come in this way rather than through the general government, to avoid the appearance of such supplies being a return to the wretched method of giving rations. For the last few years every effort has been made to put an end to that pauperizing plan; and so successful have the efforts been that three-quarters of all the Indians in the country are now self-supporting. In some cases seed, implements, stock, and other useful things have been substituted for the mere giving of food and blankets, to the great betterment of the Indians and their development in manliness. It would be a great pity to have rations restored, yet these people should not be left to starve.

The Navajoes are sheep-raisers, and the exquisite fineness and native beauty of their blankets are well known to those who have been in the West. Up to the present time they have been self-sustaining; but for four years they have had no crops, and their ponies and sheep have had insufficient food. Wool, too, has been but five cents a pound; and during the hard times they were unable to dispose of it, even at that price. They have been obliged to kill and eat their sheep, the source of their income in good times, and even their hardy little ponies, till now there is nothing between them and starvation but the merciful hand of a generous community.

Nor are the Navajoes the only sufferers among the Indians. As long ago as last October Bishop Walker reported that among the Sioux of Dakota he found in one day eighty families who had nothing in their lodges to eat. They had "planted their wheat, done their best to save it; but there was no crop. He told the following pitiful story:—

"I came upon one wigwam where sixteen women were gathered. Fifteen of them had been invited by the sixteenth, because she had something to eat. I saw the great pot in the centre of the group. It had in it a brown, ugly mixture; and I found it was flour mixed with water and choke-cherries pounded up, with the pits left in 'to fill up.' . . . The woman in Scripture who had a little meal and a little cruse of oil baked a cake for herself and child, that they might eat it and die. That seemed to me to be the condition of this people. They told me they did not know where the next meal would come from, and some of these women had babies in their arms!"

Unhappily, one does not need to go so far to find hunger stalking. Daily we see in the great cities people without work, seeking it everywhere, and bearing in their faces the gaunt look that hunger alone can give. But, whatever the fault, and however far away the remedy for the poverty of the East, this special distress in the West, which comes through no human fault, should be met by human sympathy and human help. Food, clothing, and money can be wisely used; and he gives twice who gives quickly.

CATHOLICISM AND LIBERTY.

One of the most notable of recent occurrences in Boston was the banquet of the Catholic Union on Wednesday of last week, when some ringing utterances were heard from Catholic laymen on the subject of civil and religious liberty. "Religion the Safeguard of American Liberty" was the topic of the evening; and, as a matter of course, it was strongly insisted upon by the various speakers (two of whom were Protestants) that religion must be a necessary element of our growth as a people. This view is so often urged, and is so well established in the minds of a majority of thinking men, that it is not necessary to reproduce the eminently thoughtful and impressive arguments brought forward on this occasion.

But there are features of the history of the Catholic Church which make the question of its present attitude toward American institutions one of considerable interest. Perhaps there ought to be no uncertainty as to the devotion of Catholics to the principle of civil liberty; but such uncertainty undoubtedly exists, and elsewhere than in minds inflamed and excited by religious prejudice. It is this fact which makes the utterance of such sentiments as were expressed last week very welcome to us all. If we had doubts, we are glad to have them set at rest. If we before felt no anxiety, we are still glad to have the anxiety of others so well answered.

We cannot reasonably entertain a suspicion but that these gentlemen are as loyal to our form of government as we could ask them to be,—far more loyal than not a few Protestants, who seem to have concluded that our experiment with government by the people is practically a failure. No such despairing note was sounded at this banquet. Not only was the forward look a hopeful one, and the backward glance one of sincere admiration for the founders of the nation, but such general views of our national life were advocated as give warrant of deep attachment to the ideas upon which it is established.

One of the speakers, while disclaiming the attempt to define religion, said, "We know that it consists of love, submission to an exalted superior, a sense of dependence, reverence, gratitude, and hope for the future." This is a very excellent definition of religion, save for the ambiguity of one of the terms employed. Religion is, unquestionably, man's service of God, and therefore demands "submission to an exalted superior." The religious man must needs reverence whatever and whoever embodies or represents to him the will of God. But does this statement mean that the Bishop of Rome is that particular representative whom all men are bound to obey, on pain of being eternally lost? We suspect the time has not yet come when many American Catholics can be brought to answer that question squarely. Meantime it is of interest to note that there is nothing in the definition thus offered which will need to be taken back. It is only a question of the interpretation of certain phrases, and we are far from wishing to imply that Catholics must put upon these words the narrowest construction.

The great speech of the hour was made by Hon. Charles J. Bonaparte. This is a name so closely connected with at least one important reform that we might expect to find it here set above an unusual expression of thoughtful and earnest patriotism. They who are fortunate enough to read the whole speech will not be disappointed in this expectation. Mr. Bonaparte begins by describing what we must now call the old-fashioned idea of a free State, though he holds, what we may at least hope to be true, that it is still the dominant and characteristic feature of American thought. It is the conception that "government shall not only compel every one in the community to mind his own business, but, in this respect, shall set them all a good example; or, in other words, the very limited scope in our view of legitimate governmental action. . . . In any case of doubt the presumption is in favor of private agencies." He goes on to point out, what deserves the attention of all thoughtful men, that we have religious liberty only because that is one of the far-reaching consequences of this view that we should "strive to make the State's duties as few and as easy as possible." He further says: "We do not deem the civil government competent to determine the comparative merits of different faiths. That function is reserved to the individual citizen. . . . And, as we forbid the State to become a Church, so we forbid or at least discourage its undertaking any business to which anybody else can and will attend. Advocates of communistic experiments among us are men who have not yet become, who, for the most part, never will become, Americans. For the mass of our people their visions of Utopia are unattractive and well-nigh unintelligible. An omniscient and omnipotent government, making everybody happy according to rule, is, to Americans, not only a dream, but a nightmare."

All this is exceedingly good talk, from whatever source it comes. It is a new illustration of the strange things which the whirligig of time brings to pass that a Catholic should now be urging in Boston the ideas upon which the Puritans founded American institutions, as their protest against what the Catholic Church was then doing in the world, while some descendants of the Puritans are advocating a socialism which may fairly be called a reflection of the mediæval Catholic ideal brought forward to the present time.

While the path of a free State, like that of a planet, is found in a middle line between opposing forces, whose extremes are represented by anarchy and socialism on either hand, there can be no doubt as to the direction in which American life heretofore has seen its greatest foe. One ideal is that the government should take charge of everything. The other ideal is that it should take charge of nothing which the people can otherwise contrive to manage and regulate. Practically, our people have found a middle path between the two, always with a leaning toward the latter ideal, and an instinctive fear of the corruption and tyranny that a large measure of governmental authority is likely to bring.

Our liberties have endured for a century on this basis. Monarchy, as a threat to their continuance, has now ceased to be even a bugbear; but socialism, in some one of its many forms, may become a formidable foe. It is some rebuke to those who have wondered whether the Lord were not guilty of neglect in allowing such an institution as the Catholic Church to live so long to find it now arraying itself as one of our strong defenders against a threatening antagonist.

WHAT IS CHRISTIANITY?

A correspondent of the Outlook asks a pertinent question:—

I heard the assertion to-day that the best scientific works, and, in fact, 90 per cent. of the literature that was worth reading, has been given to the world by authors who do not believe in Christianity. Will you give me the names of some leading scientists who are Christian, and also the names of some leading authors who hold the Christian faith?

This question brings forth the following pertinent answer:—

This question, periodically asked, raises a profounder question,—What is Christianity? If Christianity is the belief in three divine Persons (who are not persons in a sense which an unlearned man can understand), in the existence of sin and death through the fault of the ancestor of mankind, in the propitiation of God by the sacrifice of the innocent for the guilty, and in the endless misery of a multitude of mankind, then the assertion above made is true. Mr. Herbert Spencer, in opposing Christianity, regards himself as opposing the above-named tenets and others of like character. But, if by Christianity is meant that conception of God and of the life acceptable to God, and of Jesus Christ as the ideal of that life and the beloved of God, which is presented especially, but not exclusively, in the Synoptic Gospels (the first three), then the exact reverse of the above assertion is true; and it would not be easy to give the name of any respectable scientist or leading author who is hostile to Christianity, so understood. Indeed, Mr. Spencer himself, in his "Data of Ethics," comes essentially, if not formally, upon what, in this view of the matter, appears to be Christian ground.

It will be seen from this answer how much the New Orthodoxy represented by Dr. Abbott is like the Unitarianism represented by Channing, Bellows, and James Freeman Clarke.

Musings.

I FOUND Philadelphia last week, judging from the welcome I received, to be a city of brotherly and sisterly love. I stayed over a train to pay my respects to two souls which, in point of age, are nearly a century apart. One was the little Spring Garden baby, the pride of the Unitarian society: the other was Rev. Dr. Furness, our beloved patriarch, who last Sunday celebrated the seventieth anniversary of his ordination and installation as pastor of the First Unitarian Church. The Spring Garden baby looked very much like spring, and was as blooming as a vernal garden. I had forgotten to take any myrrh and frankincense with me; but, when I got to the place where the young child was, I rejoiced with exceeding great joy. With a mother who is an accomplished architect, and with a father who believes in good government, the fortunes of this child ought to be securely established. It is ninety-three years since Dr. Furness was as young as this Philadelphia baby. The infant is still bound by the infirmities of infancy, which sometimes correspond to the infirmities of age. It has not learned to walk, nor to talk the English language, nor to feed itself. The beloved patriarch, on the other hand, seemed to be altogether free from the infirmities of age; and there are many men of sixty—indeed, of fifty—who are older than Dr. Furness at ninety-three.

WHAT most delights and inspires me with Dr. Furness is not merely his remarkable memory, so faithful and prompt in its delivery of whatever is summoned, but the fact that he is still living actively in the present, with a gladness hold upon the life that now is and a serene and childlike faith in the life which is to come. In this respect he strongly reminds me of another friend of mine of the same age, whose conversation always naturally falls into the events of the day rather than those of fifty years ago. Of course, a life as long and as rich as that of Dr. Furness has a vast deal of reminiscence and of experience on which the visitor would naturally wish to draw; but, fascinating as is the stream of anecdote illumined by flashes of wit and humor, it is still more delightful to feel that this old man eloquent has not been soured by the acerbities of life, but that its attritions have, somehow, added to his polish, and that his nature is as transparent as it is sweet. To me it is rather sad to find an old man whose spirit has been curdled by bitterness or one who has lost his faith and his spirituality, who can spread his hands with no benediction for the world or look forward with no faith to the life that is to come. It is further delightful to find that Dr. Furness has never lost his interest in his own profession. He loves to preach now, and people love to hear him. Though his voice is still rich and deep, though his eye is not dim, nor his natural force abated, it is the spiritual freshness and richness of the man which are most impressive. So, if there was a halo about the head of the infant, there was also a halo about the head of the patriarch; and the man, whether from East or from West, who is wise enough to make his pilgrimage to the inn on Pine Street need not be a magician, and need not carry his frankincense and myrrh. The dear old saint can furnish the magic, the spices, and the fragrance. The gifts he possesses are better than any you can take him.

As I entered the house of my friend in Baltimore, I noticed that he had on a dress suit. "I know where you are going," I said. "Yes," he said, "and you are going with me." As I hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in only twenty-four regular concerts each season, with, say, half a dozen public rehearsals and a few of the Cambridge concerts thrown in, making perhaps thirty to thirty-five orchestral concerts during the season, I was very glad to accept my friend's kind invitation to go with him. Not that I am an enthusiast for a programme wholly made of Wagner's music, when it is divorced from its scenic and dramatic accompaniments. The two absolutely belong together; and, when you divorce them, you separate Wagner from himself. But it is a delight to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra in anything they undertake to play, and some of the music was superb. Then it was a special privilege to hear the orchestra in Baltimore's new music hall. It is a hall of which any city might justly be proud. It is cheerfully and beautifully decorated. Its acoustic properties, judging from my point of hearing, are admirable. The only serious defect in its structure is in the unusual width of the galleries on the sides, so that from the back seats no view can be obtained of the stage. Baltimore has shown itself to be a generous patron of the liberal arts; and the assurance of members of the orchestra that Baltimore audiences were warm and appreciative, and more demonstrative than in Boston, was ratified. The night was thick with snow and sleet; but inside the hall the temperature, emotionally speaking, was of the genial, sunny South. Well, such grand playing as that of the Symphony Orchestra ought to melt an Iceland glacier; and I have seen it actually melt a Boston glacier, and turn it into a vapor of enthusiasm.

It was my good fortune, likewise, to be in Brooklyn last Saturday night, and the fortune of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be there also at the same time. Such a programme as Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Mendelssohn's "Midsummer-Night's Dream" music, and Schumann's Concerto for pianoforte, played by Adele aus der Ohe, was irresistible; and I counted it a special providence that there was a ticket waiting for me when I got to Chandler's Saturday morning, for I had written for it four days in advance. Beethoven's immortal Seventh Symphony can never be worn threadbare, or lose its brightness of color or the tragic solemnity of its Allegretto or the glory of the trio in the Presto. Adele aus der Ohe has tied up her hair, but her hands are not tied; and she plays with the same simplicity, power, accuracy, composure, and fire which mark her as unmistakably one of the few living players whose touch reveals the soul of the piano. I thought again of Gilder's beautiful sonnet, an apotheosis of her genius. And that word "genius" is the only explanation of the fact that Mendelssohn wrote the wonderful overture to the "Midsummer-Night's Dream" music when he was only seventeen years old!

Brevities.

Don't growl: the "Pleasantries" are on page 15.

We do not believe much in Napoleonism, but such Bonapartism as is revealed in the editorial on "Catholicism and Liberty" demands our respect and admiration.

The broad and comprehensive interpretation of modern charity by Rev. Thomas Van Ness shows that the charity lecturer to-day in that ancient and honorable course may find abundant scope for a fresh and invigorating mind.

The road runs to-day from Jerusalem to Jericho, and the priest and the Levite pass by. The good Samaritan is there, too. His spirit is the same; but his conception of duty is still more intelligent, and his service further reaching.

How earnestly some women are devoting themselves to the consideration of social reform may be seen from the article we publish this week on "Methods of Social Reform," the first of two papers delivered before the Philadelphia Women's Alliance. The second paper will be published next week.

The Christian Inquirer (Baptist) declares that the pulpit and press ought to tell millionaires that they cannot afford to die without thinking of the claims of religion. What it means is, not that millionaires must prepare themselves for heaven, but that they "owe something to the world they live in."

The evangelical ministers in Seattle have formed themselves into a close corporation, and shut themselves up in a 9 x 10 creed with a fence around it. No one is admitted to membership who, in addition to subscribing to the Apostles' Creed, does not believe that Jesus Christ was born of a virgin, and that the Bible is the only and infallible word of faith and practice.

A package of tracts published by the Japan Unitarian Association shows that the words of Dr. Channing, Theodore Parker, Dr. Hedge, and other leaders of Unitarian thought, have taken on a fresh lease of life in another country. The printed characters look very strange and difficult; but one has faith to believe that the spirit of their English originals has survived the translation, and may carry inspiration far over the seas.

Pro and Con.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

Allow me to second Mr. True's motion, that the Unitarian Conference come West. I suggest St. Louis as an excellent place, as the location and railroad facilities are excellent, and there are two good Unitarian churches here. Other liberal churches here would also be hearty in welcoming the Conference. It would doubtless give Unitarianism quite a stimulus, although the Western churches are very active.

AN ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

The ladies of the First Unitarian Church of Austin, Tex., desire to acknowledge the numerous and generous gifts of money and fancy articles sent by many of the Alliance Branches, and by other Unitarian friends throughout the North, in aid of their recent bazaar.

The entertainment was most successful, and the sum realized of greatest possible benefit to the little Unitarian church at Austin.

STARVATION IN NEBRASKA.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

Reliable information has been received which fully corroborates the recent statements in the newspapers concerning the destitution in Nebraska. The utter failure of crops has caused wide-spread misery among people ordinarily in good circumstances. Several cases of death by starvation are reported. The situation is serious in the extreme, and immediate assistance is necessary. Contributions of money may be sent to the undersigned, No. 141 Franklin Street, Boston.

RICHARD C. HUMPHREYS.

THE UNITARIAN CURTIS.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

Mr. Chadwick hastens to become the champion of Curtis's biographer. In spite of his acumen, like many hasty advocates in handling a bad cause, he misses the main point under discussion. His formal announcement that Mr. Carey is a radical thinker and very "negative in theology" does not change the nature of Mr. Carey's statement concerning the religious life of Curtis. Religious faith, religious conviction, change the development and affect the life of any man holding such conviction. Father Damien, Theodore Parker, Emerson, differed in their respective faiths; and their lives differed accordingly. Is not this principle of the essence of biography? This is not an occasion for splitting hairs about Ingersoll's bigotry: it merely requires plain common sense.

Carey's biography is interesting, but quite incomplete as a life of Curtis. In parts it is overloaded with details; while other parts of the life, more important, are neglected or slightly treated. Yet it is a sound book, as a whole. For it makes it clear that its own statement that Curtis religiously hovered on the verge of "narrowness and bigotry" is not only a futile, but an absurd notion.

If this Unitarian idea was both the environment and outcome of such a life on the religious side, why be squeamish about saying so? Why drag in the rubbish that the Unitarian idea—in its whole, not in its parts—is a system of negations?

Doubtless, the solid religious convictions which Curtis brought out from Brook Farm and his early associations matured into daily bread, which nourished him throughout his steadfast and enduring life.

Life is mysterious, and not easily comprehended in its beginnings. Much was expected of both the Curtis brothers in the old days. A bright girl of Boston said, "It would be worth while to marry George, to have Burrill around the house."

OBSERVER.

UNITY SERVICES AND SONGS.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

May I, through the Register's columns, call attention to the revised edition of "Unity Services and Songs" just published by our Western Unitarian Sunday School Society? The book has been in use in many of our schools for several years, and the revision has had the help and suggestion of this large experience. Mr. Blake of Chicago, who first compiled these services and songs, has given great care to the revision, assisted by friends engaged in Sunday-school work. The revision follows the same general plan and method as the earlier edition; but the services have been much improved, and the songs have been nearly doubled in number. The noble choral music in connection with the responses is a marked feature in the book. Altogether, the services—fourteen in number, and covering the great themes that touch heart and conscience as well as our deeper thought—combine beauty, dignity, and strength. It is not the perfect book, as the Committee of Revision modestly say in the preface; but it is in the direction of the perfect book. And it has gone further in the way than any other of which I have knowledge, certainly for the schools of our so-called liberal churches. I am sure a stranger to the book would be greatly impressed by hearing any one of these services well rendered in any Sunday-school, and they can all be well rendered with use. They will also educate to a richer service in our churches. I am sure I shall be helping some Sunday-school workers, dissatisfied with the manual now in use and looking to make a change, by thus calling wider attention to Mr. Blake's book, of which copies may be had upon application to the Society, 175 Dearborn Street, Chicago. I think 50 cents is the mailing price.

THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

In a recent number of the New World occurs an article on the above subject by Albert Réville. It contains these words (p. 214): "For myself, in accordance with the adage, 'He did it who profits by it,' I affirm that, if the body of Jesus was taken away, concealed, or destroyed, it was Jews—very probably Jews of the Sanhedrim—that we should regard as the agents of this removal." And he gives, as their motive, a fear lest the sepulchre should become a place of pilgrimage.

We do not read of Jewish pilgrimages except to the temple of Yahveh. Probably they would have been regarded as savoring of idolatry. The sepulchre was not unfitted for a place of pilgrimage merely because the body was absent, as experience shows. And the Jews had everything to lose by the removal of the body; for they anticipated, as the evangelist admits, that its removal might lead to a rumor of a resurrection.

I have been of opinion since 1872, when I thought the matter carefully over, that Joseph of Arimathea was the man who (assisted by his servants) removed the body of Jesus. The story that it was removed by disciples (Matt. xxviii. 15) may not have been quite unfounded, though the apostles were ignorant of it. Joseph seems to have feared lest indignities might have been offered to the body after the Sabbath, and therefore to have made arrangements for a temporary sepulture, to be followed by a removal before the Sabbath should come to an end. The deep sleep of the soldiers may be accounted for by drugged wine, for nothing is more natural than that Joseph should have offered them wine on their going on duty in his garden. The light of the lanterns playing on the eyes of the sleepers may have suggested the dream that a shining one had descended from heaven.

If Joseph and Nicodemus did not know that the resurrection was a fiction, why do we hear no more of them in the annals of Christianity?

EPISCOPALIAN JUGGLERY.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

The Episcopal church in Great Barrington antedates the Revolution. This year it has completed a very expensive stone rectory, upon which is a large indebtedness. Reading constantly in the Register and many Unitarian publications the struggles with the debt upon many churches, it seemed that the simple device of this rector to raise a sum, great or small, might be utilized by all of our churches. Early last spring he distributed one hundred and twenty-five common pottery jugs, appropriately numbered and registered. They cost a little over one cent apiece. Some were sent by members of the society to loyal friends in different States. They were called in for December 7, and on that evening were broken at the rectory in the presence of as many of the society as desired to witness the event. Some of them contained offerings for marriage, birth, birthday, recovery from illness, etc. The smallest contents was sixty cents, and the largest thirty-three dollars and forty cents,—four hundred dollars in all, the jugs averaging three dollars and twenty cents.

The rector's wife served chocolate, which gave a social turn. There are very many Unitarians in towns with no Unitarian churches who would be glad to take a jug, and all societies know such isolated friends. This method is submitted to our varied organizations with the suggestion that jugs be distributed January 1, and called in July 1, when the contributors will receive new jugs. For mutual interest and to spread the method, let reports appear in the Register.

EXPERIENCE.

BY EVA CHANNING.

As every wave that, curling, laps the sand
 Leaves, ere it backward glides, some symbol fine—
 A bit of seaweed or a sinuous line—
 To mark the ocean's impact on the land,
 So passion's ebb and flow, upon the strand
 Of human life, must ever leave its sign;
 And there is naught can change this law divine,
 For where the cause, there the effect is planned.

Shall we lament because the smooth white shore,
 Surrendering its purity in part,
 Is soiled with many a damp and noisome thing?
 Nay, let us rather glory in this store
 Of nature's treasures, and with grateful heart
 Welcome the richness that all life must bring.

THE HOSPITALITY OF ART.

BY JAMES LEONARD CORNING, SR.

The story is told of Oliver Cromwell that he once entered a Romish chapel, accompanied by an escort of soldiers. Merciless iconoclast that he was, he looked about the sacred edifice for artistic plunder; and, seeing a row of silver statues in their niches on the walls, he inquired what they were intended to represent. "Those are the twelve apostles, may it please your Majesty," replied one of the attendants. "Take them down, then," said Cromwell, "melt them, and send them about doing good, as their Master did!"

I never liked Cromwell for that piece of Vandalism; but, remembering that he saved the cartoons of Raphael to England and the world, paying for the lot the ridiculously low price of $1,500, I long ago forgave him. And now, when we come to think of it, there was a touch, at least, of common sense and philanthropy in this Vandalism,—a recognition to a degree of what Ruskin everywhere insists upon, both directly and indirectly; to wit, that art is only to be valued for the quantity and the quality of the lessons which it teaches. And who knows, after all, but those apostles might have been more useful to the world after being coined and put into circulation than they ever were before, especially as it is very probable that they represented the degraded art of the period.

I remember that Mr. Emerson somewhere gives pretty distinct intimation that statues and paintings in private galleries have got into the wrong places, and should be removed to public conservatories, where they can teach the people lessons of wisdom. The loan collections which annually bring benedictions to the masses in our large cities are a partial concession of the truth and justice of Mr. Emerson's words.

I recall at this moment a great painting in a magnificent mansion of New York City,—one of a few, in its class, of superlative worth to be found in the Western World. During the past ten years of its sequestration what lessons of moral heroism, and of truth and grace in form and color, this grand historical composition might have taught to uncounted thousands! But there it has hung, "a light under a bushel," through all these years, its beneficent shining only occasionally visible to a dozen or so of invited guests. I think a flag should be hung at half-mast in recognition of a public bereavement like unto that. But the bereavement is not intentional, for the owner of that painting puts the greater part of conventional philanthropy to the blush with his really regal contributions in money to beneficent ends of all kinds. If he knew how that painting, in its frescoed closet, could bless the people, he would, at least once a year, send it forth to a loan collection, even if he had to hire a squad of policemen to protect it from harm.

Yes, there is great hospitality in art, both in kind and degree. That great gilded masquerade which goes under the name of "society" thinks it knows what hospitality means, with gold and silver dishes, and menus which Ahasuerus might have envied. But the cold joint and pot of ale which Charles Lamb used to set upon the sideboard for his guests, supplemented as they were by the wonderful talk of a rare apostleship of intellect, was entertainment which makes "society" look like a constituency of beggars.

Now and again an opulent collector recognizes the obligations and privileges of hospitality in art (as did Miss Wolfe, for example, in her royal bequest to the Metropolitan Museum), and spreads a board of magnificent proportions for the generation that now is and generations yet to come.

In thinking of regal entertainers like these, one recalls the command of the master of the feast in the gospel parable,—“Go out into the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in.”

Over here in the Bavarian capital, where I am writing, we have, in the relations of social recognition, an exclusive court life,—one of the inevitable accidents of royalty. But in the relations which appertain to culture we have a democracy of the widest horizons and the largest immunities. In the great Royal Library, for example, where I have been for years gathering musty and mouldy things which not many people care much about, I see at the desks and tables all social grades represented; and a literary board, which ranks only third among the great intellectual hospices of the world, is spread for prince and peasant alike. Poor, miserable plebeian that I am, I will endure exclusion from the royal table in the palace if I may sit in this larger and more affluent hospice in my old clothes.

So with the art galleries. People from your side of the big ferry pay their thousands to get over here and see the treasures of our royal galleries of sculpture and painting; and, when they get here, they find that small farmers and men and women of the serving class, in their homespun, get all the Madonnas and holy families, with quantities of entrées in the shape of genres, landscapes, animal pieces, besides the grand painted epics of Kaulbach and Piloty,—all for a few cents of car-fare, or, mayhap, for less than the cost of a mug of beer. I call that hospitality of the noblest dimensions; and a peculiarity about it worthy of notice is that the day on which the Master said it was "lawful to pull an ox or an ass out of the ditch" is the one of all others when this hospitality has its grandest and most populous exhibition. I rather like to see these two-footed proof-texts of the evolutionary dogma pulled out of their ditches on Sunday. Thus much, by the way, concerning the public hospitality of art, of whose conditions and noble immunities much remains unsaid. But it was the successes and the blunders of private hospitality that I was thinking of when I began this paper. On a far lower plane we know much of private hospitality,—the vast outlay of money which it costs, as well as the consuming solicitudes, the weariness of nerve, and the premature senilities which not seldom are inseparable from it. In what is called "society" private hospitality is the most tyrannical and exacting of masters, and, like some Oriental slave-driver of the olden times, scourges its long processions of captives to their tasks. Let me propose resolutions of condolence for all concerned in this disheartening enterprise. It is on the higher planes of culture that I desire to write a few sincere words concerning the ministries of private hospitality, especially as these ministries invoke the aid of art in their realization. But the lessons which such a theme suggests are too many to be crowded into a single article.

BY REV. WILLIAM ROUNSEVILLE ALGER.

I.

What distinguishes man from the rest of the animals inhabiting the earth? The capacity to know God and to obey him with freedom and delight.

No one who is not himself corrupt can believe everybody else to be so.

The more strenuously we strive to undo ourselves, the sooner we succeed in undoing ourselves.

To pluck a flower is to kill it. Abstinence preserves. To enjoy a happiness is to make it vanish. Is it not the same with misfortune, too? No sooner has an affliction arrived, than it is already surmounted. Otherwise it destroys us, and so slays itself.

Glorious memories of the past reflected by imagination into the future kindle noble hopes in the present.

They who consecrate their amusements will not desecrate their employments: they who desecrate their employments will never consecrate their amusements.

Prejudice and partiality limit attention to what favors our side, and thus, as it were, make us deaf in one ear and blind in one eye.

What is the supreme task for every person in this life? To dethrone his private will, and in place of it enthrone the Universal Will.

UTOPIAN FAITH NOT FOLLY.

One is often astonished and pained in noting the sneers cast by the baser portion of the rich and prosperous classes at those who cherish generous hopes of a better future for humanity on earth,—a redeemed civilization, in which universal justice will secure abounding plenty, leisure and joy for all. The satisfaction which any good man takes in his blessings is bitterly alloyed by his knowledge of the deserted and destitute shut out from partaking with him. I do not see how any true man who believes in God can fail to recognize this alloy as a divine pledge of the rightfulness of his hopes, however complacently selfish conservatives may continue to stigmatize them as visionary and Utopian.

EVIL NO DISPROOF OF GOD.

Evil is the incompatibility between what is and what ought to be. We achieve our nobleness by converting that incompatibility into identity. Thus evil is a logical condition for the production of good. Evil is deficiency of being and function. The fulfilling supply of that deficiency is good. But, if that prophetic vacancy did not precede, this supplementary fruition could not come in. Free personality brings its worth to consciousness only by changing evils that are presented as existent into the goods that they show to be wanted. Timely food removes the wasting evil of hunger with the restorative good of nutrition. No good whatever can become actual save as subsequent to something which was merely possible. If there were no ignorance, the acquisition of wisdom would be an impossibility. Empty intelligence, distressed by the evil void, foresees and cries out for replenishment with the good of knowledge. Perfection is the total act of spirit, the complete fruition of its powers. All degrees of evil consist in defects of act. Now, were there no evil pre-existent, as potential ground to be raised into actuality, the successive degrees of perfection constituting the progress of created spirits from nothing to God could not be elicited. Then the sparkling spectacle of existence through all its infinite series of ranks would be changed to a fixed monotony. Evils, therefore, as necessary accompaniments of a free and progressive experience, are no disproof of the existence and providence of God. They are the imperfect acts, the erroneous and perverted tentatives, whereby probationary creatures are experimentally ascending through the creation to the Creator.

The true revelation of God to man is parallel with the evolution of the idea of God in man.

Truth is the platform of God which the politicians wish to shove aside with theirs.

METHODS OF SOCIAL REFORM.*

BY LEONORA D. MONTGOMERY.

I.

It is futile for one to talk of social reform unless one knows what are the social evils; and upon this subject it is almost impossible to appreciate how dense are the ignorance and carelessness of the great majority of our fellow-creatures, this ignorant portion being, in large measure, either the producers of many of our social evils or their result.

What are our social evils? I answer ignorance and sinfulness and carelessness, these three; but the greatest of these is ignorance.

The results of these causes can be read in the faces or lives of the individuals that one may meet in a walk of a dozen squares through our city's streets, and in the streets themselves. Some of them are, socially, disease (hereditary or acquired), drunkenness, profligacy, unequal and unhappy marriages; and, politically, pauperism, anarchism,—including strikes, corrupt administration of government, innumerable evils that result from the war between capital and labor, and, unfortunately, many of the methods that are undertaken to relieve these evils.

So long as we consign to some remote cell of our inner consciousness our impression that things are going wrong; so long as we wait for an expected millennium to come, based on a belief—vague, but consolatory—that something is going to happen some day to clear our atmosphere of all the pestilential fogs that now vitiate it; so long as we are content to remain in passive indifference to our social and political evils,—just so long will they continue to increase and multiply. On the contrary, just as soon as we discover that what is wrong can be righted by patient effort, and just as soon as we determine to study our social evils and begin to do our best to abate them, then, and only then, will some of the evil results of ignorance and sinfulness and carelessness be met squarely. But, if we do not overtake them, they will overtake us.

In trying to define the relation of the individual to mankind and to the State, one of the first puzzles that confront the student is how far the individual in question is responsible for his actions, and how much he is handicapped or helped in his struggle for existence by generations of ancestors. We cannot do ourselves greater injustice than to take it for granted that all men are born free and equal. This is so only so far as the law is concerned, and frequently, in our present time, very untrue there. Otherwise, men are born unequal, shackled with traditions and environments that are far from leaving them free agents, and with mind-forces that are just as dissimilar as the expressions of their faces. It is contended, by some that there are compensating advantages in each individual's life that square his sum of enjoyment with that of other individuals, but this contention seems to be a cousin to that trite remark that "nothing will make any difference a hundred years hence." The best we can do is to accept our lives with their compelling forces of character, and whatever of good heredity and environment have given them, and make the best of the stuff that is possible.

That is the ideal form of government under which individuals are able to attain the highest point of development, notwithstanding handicaps of obscure birth, poverty, or hereditary mischance. As if to make the problem of how a child's life will evolve more interesting to the philosopher and less hopeless to the child, we have those curious paradoxes in which we find children born in the meanest squalor dying in the midst of luxury, and those born with every conceivable advantage of wealth ending their days amid hopeless disease or poverty. The question of environment and heredity is so important that it behooves us to remember that we are the product of what has gone before, and are responsible for what comes after.

To me the most important problem that is at issue to-day is how far our entire population may enjoy a certain degree of comfort in the present and security as to the future, so that none except the vicious and idle need have absolute want to confront them. This brings us at once face to face with the war between labor and capital. It would be a mistake to confine ourselves to what are usually called social conditions, and overlook the political phases of the question. Political and social economy must go hand-in-hand. The recent tendency of capital has been to concentrate in trusts and monopolies, the distinct outcome of which is millionaires and paupers.

Now, while the social reformer will admit that the religion of work is one of the safest and surest methods of reform, when he comes to consider the work that has gone toward the accumulation of great aggregates of capital, it is evident that a great many have contributed, while a few have benefited. It is a matter that scarcely admits of doubt that a man cannot accumulate a million dollars in an ordinary lifetime without irreparable injury to certain of his fellow-men. This has exceptions in rare instances, which I have not time to enumerate.

The labor unions into which men have entered have done a great deal both to educate them, and to strengthen them in their demand for shorter hours of labor and more equitable rates of wages. Their late attitude in regard to strikes has been, however, unhealthy. As regards the forming of labor unions, it may be that the climax was reached in the recent announcement that a new organization was to be formed that should include in its membership all the wage-earners in the country. Social economy hardly admits the organization, certainly not the success, of such a movement. We saw its failure in Debs's recent experiment, which was practically a test among all railway men such as the former would be among all wage-earners. It is right for labor to organize for its own benefit, just as capital may do; but the interests of the capitalist and the laborer are mutual, and should not be made antagonistic, as is the present tendency, aggravated, it is just to say, by the monopolistic attitude of the capitalist and the ignorance of the wage-earner, who, as an intelligent voter, has the inherent power to right himself, if he but realized it.

There are different methods in which persons set about to cure or abate certain social evils; for, in spite of our pessimists, there is a very large number of persons working, according to their light, to make the world better for their having lived in it. This has developed in very many popular reformers a tendency that is constantly met with, and which is most harmful to true reform. It is the adoption of what homœopaths would call a surface cure. They see drunkards and the evil effects of drunkenness, both present and to come; and they set actively to work to close saloons and prohibit the sale of intoxicants, without recognizing that the desire to drink springs from causes, or combinations of causes, having their roots in the worst impulses of men, and that, so long as these dominating desires remain, legislation will be merely a check—and not an efficient one—upon the satisfaction of these desires. It is reported that Miss Willard asked Edison if he was a total abstainer from early good home influences, and that his answer was: "No. It is because I have better uses for my head." Either to make men realize that or to cure them of the desire to drink seems more rational than simply to endeavor to have men sign a temperance pledge. This work is one of slow growth, and seems discouraging; but the creation of a moral sentiment in favor of temperance among our professional men has done a marvellous work in late years. At present, among well-bred people, the turning down of a wine-glass is no more questioned than the failure to eat of a certain dish that is placed before one. It required, not many years ago, moral courage to decline wine, even if one disliked it.

Concerning profligacy I do not feel that I can say much beyond this: that it springs from the immoral tendencies of men and the low wages that are paid for a great deal of women's work; that it has been estimated that, if all women who to-day are dishonored were eliminated, in six months enough would come forward to take their places. This question is probably the most delicate, and at the same time one of the most dreadful, that we deal with. It lies with every woman, however, to demand an unequivocal single standard of purity for herself and the men with whom she associates, and it is a satisfaction to know that public sentiment is beginning to include this subject in its powerful grasp.

There has been violent force brought to bear upon the home life of our country,—a nation's best defence. Those who believe in its sanctity, and that it has reached its highest known development in cultivated American families, need not be dismayed, but reassured. If it is good (and it is), it will stand; and the present agitation will eventually strengthen it. It has for its fundamental principle the strongest emotion in our lives, and one that has strengthened steadily with civilization. But there are black spots upon what should be a fair surface, and soiled pages in what should be a clean book. So much unhappiness and far-reaching misery springs from marriages that have been hastily or ill-advisedly entered into! The tendency of our divorce laws has uniformly been toward greater laxity until recently, when the recognition of the evil resulted in the formation of a National Reform Association, the outcome of the New England Divorce Reform League. It is hoped some day to have a National Marriage and Divorce Law, but at present this is impracticable. The outcome of the earnest work which is being effected by this organization will materially influence our laws and our people.

Probably one of the questions that most closely interest women is the application of charity and the methods taken to relieve want. I do not know whether it has been estimated what theoretic proportion of their wealth should be contributed under present conditions by generous and philanthropic citizens to the poor of their cities. If we think of the money that is contributed annually to the poor who are always with us (I often wonder if we do not keep them with us), through our municipality, the churches, hospitals, schools, and colleges, workingmen's unions, public, semi-public, and private charities, it will soon be seen that an immense sum of money is annually disbursed in this way. In order to lay an uneasy conviction that Philadelphians spend in charity annually an amount altogether disproportionate to the apparent result, I tried to obtain an estimate of it. It was a hopeless task; but I am more than ever convinced that much work that is now done by private individuals should be done by our municipal government, particularly in the slum district. If our streets were well paved; if our building and sanitary laws were enforced, the streets well policed and well lighted at night, and what should be common privileges granted,—enough schools under proper school officers, filtered water, good gas, and a complete separation of the municipal affairs generally from politics,—a better public conscience would be created, that would bear remarkable fruit.

Under present conditions, and with their greater leisure, much philanthropic and charitable work must be done by women. There is no money equivalent for the service which a score of intelligent and public-spirited women are rendering Philadelphia to-day. But they must be broad in their conceptions, definite in their aims, and ready for the largest intelligence in the furtherance of their work. The best work will always be done by men and women working together. Just here I should like to say that my own observation has convinced me that the present undoubted activity of women in charitable and philanthropic work has its logical conclusion and success only in securing to her her right to exercise the suffrage. Without it her most urgent pleas are futile, her strongest endeavors almost valueless, her hardest work unproductive of lasting good, and her valiant efforts to right the present social wrongs only the application of an external cure for an internal malady. It will be a new responsibility, heaviest to those whose share of lifting life's burdens is already heavy, but whose preparation for this greatest right of mankind has been more thorough than that made by any previous disfranchised body of persons.

To show sympathy with those whose lives are not favored, there exist in our city an almost countless number of organizations. Whether the majority of these charities help or injure their beneficiaries, or whether it is part of a system of heaping up unhappiness for the future, or whether the good intention that goes with a great deal of misdirected work is taken into account by the recording angel, it is impossible to say. It remains that the student of social conditions has an immense field to cover, the most perplexing problems to try to solve, and the most profound sense of littleness as a factor in helping to better the social condition that can well be imagined. When we begin to discuss methods of reform, the questions broaden and thicken. That which is helpful to one hinders another, what is reform to one is retrogression to another. However, the interests of mankind demand that the hours of labor be shortened, a living wage with something over be paid to workmen, that the laws of our country be in accord with intelligent sentiment, that the government of our city, State, and nation be administered by men who represent the best element of our citizens, and that the strongest moral sentiment be aroused in favor of each individual cultivating his life to its best uses.

AN EVENING AT THE HONOR CLUB.

BY A. F. M.

The Honor Club is one of the many factors with which Rev. Stopford Brooke is doing his work in the great London world. He founded the club: it bears the name of his daughter, Miss Honor Brooke; and, through his constant help and interest, it is making a bright place in the lives of many working-girls. The club does not differ in its aim and practical workings from many others in our own land, but the life of the London poor seems so narrow and barren of comfort that it is a pleasure to remember and to write about an evening spent with those English girls.

The Honor Club occupies a large, old-fashioned house in Fitzroy Square, only a few minutes' walk from the busy Tottenham Court Road, with its great shops and manufacturing establishments. The house was brightly lighted, and looked very inviting as we stood on its steps one crisp December evening, the guests of a quiet, brown-eyed maid-servant. A little girl with very smooth hair and a big white pinafore answered the ring; and we tarried a moment in the hall, where our companion registered her name and deposited the penny that is the evening's fee. Interested visitors are always welcome; and we received a cordial greeting from the matron, who met us as we turned from the desk. With her we went into the different rooms. Some of those devoted to special work,—the one where drawing and French classes meet, that one set apart for dressmaking, the little gymnasium,—these were not to be used on the evening of our visit; and so the fires were not lighted. It was Friday. The girls would be tired with five days' standing and working, too weary for anything but "a good time," so it was recreation evening.

The two sitting-rooms were very pleasant. They were plainly furnished; but soft-coal fires burned in the grates, deep red table-covers looked warm and cosy, and easy-chairs and low hanging-shelves of books tempted to an hour of reading and rest. One girl had already yielded, and was deep in the second volume of "Little Women." What a far-away world must it have seemed, that of Jo and Beth and Laurie! And yet she was for the time in that same bright, sunny world.

"This is a very popular place," our guide said, as she turned up the gas in a little square room bordered with deal tables, over which hung saucepans, long-handled spoons, and other culinary utensils. It was the kitchen, where the girls take turns in spending Tuesday evenings. The club provides materials, and they are shown how to cook inexpensive, nutritious dishes; and then they have a little feast upon the results of the lesson.

As we went downstairs, the size of the club was spoken of. "How many? Over a hundred belong. Some nights we have seventy-five or eighty, sometimes not more than thirty. There will not be very many to-night. You see it's close on to Christmas, and the girls from Maple's and the other big places have extra hours. But a good many are in small shops, and then there's always some who come just to get warm. Lots of girls who do tailoring have to stay all day long in rooms where there's never any fire, or else just a little stove big enough for the irons." The thought of those cold, damp, oftentimes fog-laden work-rooms made the contrast all the greater as we went into the bright, cheery apartments where perhaps a dozen girls were clustered around a generous fire. These spacious rooms were the "drawing-rooms" of the old mansion in its society days. Beautiful pictures were on the walls; a sweet, womanly face looked down from the portrait over the mantel; a piano stood near the wide-opened folding-doors; and the floors were bare and smooth for dancing.

The girls were cordial in their manner as we joined the fireside group. A pretty, black-eyed cockney lass was the centre of the circle. She was thin, poorly dressed, untidy, and looked as if she knew very well what it was to be cold and hungry. But here she was warm and content; and her jolly laugh made even the pale, sad girl by her side look up with a wistful smile. She was born to rule in her own little kingdom. Just now she was busy on a large, queerly shaped piece of faded red felt. She had impressed her neighbor into her service, and a serious question was under consideration. The binding for the thick, coarse material proved unsuitable; and the only thread available was a reel of bright red cotton. These difficulties did not daunt Hope. "It's too narrer, but they never chinge things where I bought it"; and she and her helper began to trim one side of the ragged edge of the felt with the rusty braid, sewing it on with the brilliant cotton. And such stitches! Evidently, Hope was not a member of the sewing-school. "Yer see it's an apurn for me dad. He said he'd give me a Christmas box, perhaps, if I did as much for him; but didn't yer see the lidies?" And Hope won for us a respectful nod of recognition from each of the new-comers, and she did it with an ease and a grace that many a girl of higher social standing might envy her.

"Did you ever 'ave a Christmas box, 'ope?" asked a shy little girl, the youngest in the room.

"Yes, dear, once. I hung up my stocking last year, and found a ha'penny in the toe. Lucky there wasn't a hole in it that time!" And Hope laughed as merrily as if there was no pathos in the thought of a poor lonely ha'penny in a poor old stocking.

A brief lull in the chatter greeted the entrance of a tall, fair, sweet-faced young lady who had given herself to be the helper and friend of these girls for each Friday evening during the winter. Some one asked for a dance, and soon eight or ten couples were solemnly gliding to the notes of a waltz. It was the most lifeless dancing imaginable, but all seemed to enjoy it. "Ain't it lovely?" the youngest girl sighed. On and on the kind musician played, and our fireside group grew and lessened as relays of dancers came and went. Hope refused many proffered partners, and kept diligently at her work, which was not, æsthetically considered, a great success.

The girls asked a great many questions. America was to them very far away. "What is it like?" "It's some bigger than England, isn't it?" "Isn't it very, very hot?" "You haven't any city as big as London, though." "Do the girls there have any clubs like this?" "Please tell me is everybody in your country black?" This from an eighteen-year-old girl would have been the more surprising, had not a seemingly intelligent carpenter on the banks of the Wye asked the same question a few months before. "Don't you 'ave a great deal of country in America? It's 'most all city here." At this statement one girl said with dignity: "I've been in the country, out to 'Amstead 'Eath; and, my! wasn't it rowdy on a bank holiday!" Poor London girls! To think of Ilkley Moor, with its waves of fragrant heather; of the Cornish coast, where sea-pinks grow close to the gray rocks; of Westmoreland's lakes and Devon's fair combes,—so near, as we count by miles, and yet so far away to them! It makes one give thanks for the quiet "Holiday House" that a friend of the London working-girl is striving to maintain within a shilling's fare from the great city.

The music stopped, and some of the girls went off with the pretty young lady to rehearse for a little play they were preparing for Christmas week. It was the quiet, crocheting girl who proposed a story; and of course it was Hope who silenced some chatters with: "Do be quiet, girls! Put down your piper, Jean. One of the lidies from America's going to tell a story."

So it was that these London girls came to hear about "My Disreputable Friend, Mr. Raegen." It was the first thing that flashed into mind. It was not sad; it did not seem to preach to the girls, who, far better than we, knew what temptations and struggles come into a life of poverty and hardship. I wish that Mr. Davis himself could have seen those girls as they listened, and heard the "Fancy! A biby!" when, with Rags, they first saw Marg'ret. They enjoyed her nestling close and putting her dear little face up to his, grieved when she was suffering, and drew long breaths of relief when the police matron said that the child would not die. And much satisfaction was expressed when disreputable Rags turned into a respectable member of the community, with a milk route and sweet Baby Margaret with him on the front seat.

By this time the Christmas actors had come down, and the evening was almost over. Some—a very few—had paid their pennies at the table in the corner for a cup of tea and a bun.

"Would they accept a general invitation,—let one treat them?" we asked the young lady, who was wrapping herself up for the long homeward drive.

"I think not," she replied: "they are very independent, and very sensitive."

"Please come again. Come next Tuesday. It's cooking class, and we are going to make Christmas puddings."

It was Hope who held out this bright prospect, and the invitation was warmly seconded by some of the older girls.

"Yes'm, we do like this club: it's real homely. We tried the Polytechnic a time, me and Madge; but it was too big, too much going on. It tired us."

This came from a tall, thin girl whom the others called Selina, and whose only remark during the evening had been a query as to whether America had a queen who spent millions of pounds, while some poor girls found it hard to get a shilling.

We lingered for a few pleasant words with some girls with intelligent, refined faces. They had been at their extra holiday work, and had only looked in on their way home for a glimpse of the bright, cheery rooms. They were evidently girls with whom it would be a delight to work. Our last glimpse back showed us Hope kissing the pale, sad girl, with a "Good-night, dear." Then we went out into the clear, frosty night.

During our London life we had heard Mr. Brooke many times. We had the rare privilege of listening to his tribute to Tennyson; we were even then enjoying his newly published volumes; we had heard sung his hymn, "Eternal Peace"; we knew of his labors for the unemployed. No wonder, then, that we came away from the Honor Club cheered, and with new courage for the world, because such a man gives thought and care for the working-girl!

NATIONAL ALLIANCE OF UNITARIAN WOMEN.

On January 11, at 25 Beacon Street, Boston, was held the regular monthly meeting of the Executive Board,—ten ladies present. In the absence of the president, Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells, New England vice-president, presided.

The director for Eastern New York presented reports from every Branch in the section. All seem to be actively engaged in the work. At Lenox Avenue a "Religious New Committee has recently been appointed, which gives at each meeting a summary of our own denominational affairs, and also of matters of interest in other churches." This is similar to the "Committee on Religious Intelligence," which forms one of the most interesting committees in many of the New England Branches, and seems of such value that the directors are authorized to recommend the plan to all who have not adopted it already. The Lenox Avenue Branch has contributed $25 to the Church Fund. Unity Church, Brooklyn, has a large study class of forty-eight members, and is following the course suggested in Leaflet No. 1. Most of the New York and Brooklyn Branches are carrying on the Post-office Mission with success. The Newburg Branch has reorganized with four standing committees; namely, "Visiting, Work, Social, and Study." Meadville reports great impetus given by the visit of Mrs. Dix and Mrs. Davis last June. This Branch has sent large boxes of books South and West. The Branch at Cincinnati is at work vigorously since the return of the national vice-president. Both the First Church and Unity have held successful Fairs. At Toronto the Branch has raised $20 for church expenses. At Hamilton, Canada, the members are discouraged, having lost heavily by death and the continued depression of the times. The Branch has contributed nearly $100 toward church expenses, half of it being realized from lectures given gratuitously by Rev. Mr. Woude. The Branch at Buffalo has sent $50 to Ithaca. Rochester holds regular meetings, and has sent $75 to Ithaca; while the Ithaca Branch is bending all its own energies to help to lessen the debt on its church, by socials and entertainments have already raised $100. The Branch at Syracuse has reorganized with the Alliance as the centre of all the women's work of the church. Mrs. Bell, director for New Jersey, reported that the Orange Branch was active, and had sent a box of articles to Austin for its fair, and a barrel of clothing to Miss Putnam in Dakota. The Passaic Branch holds two meetings each month,—one for work to raise money for the church, and the other for study, Rev. Mr. Camp conducting the class. Plainfield has taken for a subject for papers and discussion, "Our Own Little World," meaning Plainfield. At Rutherford the Branch holds meetings every two weeks during the whole year,—in the morning in summer, and in the afternoon in winter. They are reading "Creation of the Bible," and working for their own church. The Philadelphia Branch is composed of the First and Spring Garden Churches of Philadelphia; the Germantown, Wilmington, and Vineland churches. Three meetings have been held, averaging about eighty members in attendance. Papers were read upon "Individual Responsibility in the Church, in the Home, and in the State"; "Methods of Social Reform"; and "If Unitarianism is the Truth, why does it not attract the Uneducated?" An impromptu collection was taken up for Austin, Tex., amounting to $13; and one for Ithaca, amounting to $20. The Spring Garden Branch, called the Friendly Society, resumed its meetings in October, and has met weekly. The members have been sewing for the annual fair, which was held in November, the proceeds amounting to $427, which is passed into the treasury of the church for its much needed support. A contribution of articles was sent to the church sale at Austin, Tex. The Baltimore Branch has sent $5 to Greenville, S.C. The Washington Branch reports the Post-office Mission work as having been opened vigorously by the new secretary. They sent $5 to Austin, Tex.

The Southern States contain eleven Alliance Branches. Those at Greenville, S.C., and Memphis, Tenn., were organized in 1894. Texas has two Branches; South Carolina, two; North Carolina, two; Tennessee, two; and Louisiana, Georgia, and Virginia, each one. At Greenville, S.C., where we have a Branch, there is no organized church. All the other Branches were formed in existing churches. All have joined the Southern Associate Alliance, which proposes to hold a public meeting at Baltimore in April or May at the annual meeting of the Southern Conference. Every endeavor will be made to have it a worthy and representative gathering. The president of the Branch at Asheville, N.C., Mrs. Westall, proposes establishing a school for the mountain children at her residence on Sunset Mountain, and will be very glad of supplies for school use,—books, charts, maps, etc. At Atlanta the church has met with a serious loss in the sudden death of Dr. Schumann. The Branch is making efforts to purchase a new organ. Concerning Austin the vice-president writes: "This society deserves the most and the best we can do for it. The women are indefatigable. Branch meetings are held regularly, and what they simply cannot do at home they do not hesitate to ask assistance for; and very reasonably, too, since we can do no better work than to supplement such endeavors as theirs, and hold up their hands in the midst of such active opposition as surrounds them. In the Branch at Charleston, S.C., among other changes, the time-worn 'basket' is to be abolished; and the articles for sale are to be produced by busy fingers, to be thus employed while the minds of the members are being improved at the regular literary meetings. The Book and Tract Society, which has heretofore been an independent institution in this community (established 1820), having been dissolved, it has been proposed that the Helping Hands take up their work in the form of a Post-office Mission." At Chattanooga the Christmas sale proved very delightful and profitable, and at the next meeting the Branch hopes to hand $100 to the church treasurer. At Greenville, S.C., the Branch is full of enthusiasm at the success of its recent fair, as nothing of the kind was ever before attempted by the members. Sunday services are regularly held at Mrs. Putnam's house. The new Branch at Memphis, the Branches at Highlands, and at New Orleans are all full of promise. A great deal is being accomplished in Richmond, where the Branch is interested in many lines of work. San Antonio completes the list of Southern Branches, and is quietly working under Mr. Shultz, who is also doing a mission work at South Heights.

The secretary reported the formation of a new Branch at Buffalo, called the Park-side Liberal Society Branch. New Branches have also been formed in Charlestown and Neponset, Boston, Mass. It was announced that the next meeting of the New England Associate Alliance would be held with the Jamaica Plain Branch on February 27, with a most attractive programme.

The following appropriations were reported. First Parish, Dorchester, has sent to Green Harbor $50. First Parish, Cambridge, sent $25 to Green Harbor, $10 to Sherborn, $10 to West Somerville, $25 to Austin, Tex., and $50 to Montana. First Religious Society, Roxbury, sent $25 to Green Harbor and $25 to Montana. New South Church Branch, Boston, sent $10 to Green Harbor. Milton, Mass., sent $10 to Ithaca; and Watertown, Mass., sent $5 to the same and $5 to St. John, N.B. Yonkers, N.Y., sent $1.84 to the American Unitarian Association; and First Congregational Church, Providence, sent $32 to Miss Deane.

In discussing the various activities in which the Branches are engaged, the Executive Board instructed the directors to remind all the Branches that the aim and purpose of the Alliance is denominational. While much of the charitable and philanthropic work done by Unitarian women is necessary and noble work, which should not be neglected, the Alliance stands for "something deeper and higher." According to the by-laws, its object is, "primarily, to quicken the religious life of our Unitarian churches, and to bring the women of the denomination into closer acquaintance, co-operation, and fellowship"; and, secondly, "to promote local organizations of women for missionary and denominational work, and to bring the same into association." Where all the church work is done by committees reporting to the Alliance, a "Committee on Benevolent Work" or "Charities" looks after that special part; but the real work of the Alliance is religious and denominational.

Rev. Mr. Chaney, the Southern superintendent for the American Unitarian Association, was received by the board, and gave a most interesting account of the Southern field. Mr. Chaney enlarged upon the proposition he had before made of sending resident ministers on missionary "circuits" in their own sections. This the ministers will willingly do if travelling expenses can be assured. Mr. Chaney has formulated a plan for ten such circuits which would cover a large part of the Southern States. The Branch of the First Parish, Dorchester, has already appropriated $200 for one such "circuit"; and it is hoped that other single Branches, or two or more uniting to send one man, may enable Mr. Chaney to fully carry out his wishes.

It was voted by those present that the urgent recommendation of the Committee on Appeals be made known to all the Branches; namely, that Branches contribute, in such measure as seems to them best, funds to aid in the circuit missionary work to be done in the South under charge of Rev. Mr. Chaney, and that all moneys therefor shall be sent to Mrs. George L. Chaney, 611 East Franklin Street, Richmond, Va. If any Branch desires it, direct communication can be established between it and the person engaged in the proposed circuit work.

The important needs recommended by the Committee on Appeals are at present those of Ithaca, N.Y.; St. John, N.B.; Hamilton, Ont.; Rochester, N.H.; Chelsea, Mass.; Sharon, Mass.; San Antonio, Tex. EMILY A. FIFIELD, Rec. Sec'y.

A BRAVE MOTHER.

A hunter in Kansas narrates the following: "I had shot a sandhill crane. Other birds were near; but every one took to its wing on the instant, except the mother bird, who came immediately to the rescue of her half-grown offspring, which I had wounded so that it was unable to fly. She guided its movements until it planted its feet on her back, and then flew slowly away with the smaller bird to a place of safety." This cruel hunter of a harmless bird should have learned a lesson from this brave mother. So should girls and women learn it, for the man was probably shooting the birds for bonnets and hats.—Selected.

The Sunday School.

THE UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION OF BOSTON.—The fourth regular meeting, twelfth season, 1894-95, will be held in the parlors of the Church of the Disciples, corner of Warren Avenue and West Brookline Street, Monday, January 21. Subject, "Special Sunday-school Features": (a) "The Offer of Rewards," Rev. Edward A. Horton, Boston; (b) "Sunday-school Concerts and Entertainments," speaker, Rev. E. J. Prescott, Kennebunk; (c) "Lend a Hand Clubs and other Philanthropic Work," Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer, Providence, to be followed by three-minute talks by the members. Reception Committee: Mr. Frank A. Drew, chairman; Miss Mary E. Glidden; Mrs. Mary May Eliot; Mr. Alexander W. Wilson; Mr. M. M. Burdick; Rev. C. C. Carpenter. Louisa P. Parker, Secretary.

The usual Channing Hall "talks" at the Unitarian Building, 25 Beacon Street, will be held next Saturday, January 19. Subject, Lesson XVII., "John the Baptist in Prison." Primary at 2 p.m., conducted by Miss A. C. Dockham; Intermediate and Advanced at three o'clock, led by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford. All cordially invited.

Miss Lilian Freeman Clarke continues the publication of her excellent leaflet lessons on the "Life of Jesus." No 5, on "Jesus in the Synagogue," is now ready; also a succeeding issue entitled "First Lesson on the Sermon on the Mount." These sell for 2 cents a copy, or 50 cents a hundred, and can be obtained at the Unitarian Sunday School Society Rooms, 25 Beacon Street, Boston.

The one-topic graded lesson leaflets on the "Life of Jesus" are now out for February, the subjects being: "The Parable of the Sower," "Jesus sending out his Disciples to preach," "Jesus at the Pool of Bethesda," "Death of John the Baptist." The Intermediate are prepared by Rev. Edward A. Horton, and the Advanced by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford. They are printed together in one leaflet, the price being 50 cents a hundred for both.

The tidings from Belmont are interesting. Just before Christmas a class of young ladies in the Unitarian Sunday-school gave an afternoon and evening entertainment, realizing about $80. Half of this was kept for the school's use, and the other divided between the Montana Industrial School, the Tuskegee Institute, the Kindergarten for the Blind, and the North End Mission. The Belmont church and Sunday-school are good friends of the Unitarian Sunday School Society, thanks to the zeal and faithful loyalty of Rev. Hilary Bygrave, pastor of the church and superintendent of the Sunday-school. He also has charge of the movement at Waverley, which goes bravely on. The Belmont church has sent for the current year a generous donation to the Sunday School Society, as it always does, and will follow it up with another good contribution to the same society from the Sunday-school itself.

Religious Intelligence.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning: announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.]

REV. W. I. LAWRENCE has accepted a call of the Unitarian church of Meadville, Pa., to become its pastor, and has already taken up his residence in that city, and will enter soon upon his duties. The church at Meadville and the Theological School are alike fortunate in securing the inspiration which Mr. Lawrence's ministry is sure to awaken.

Hubbard will give an address on "Trade Schools."

BELMONT, MASS.—A correspondent writes: "The local Branch of the Women's Alliance is holding a series of open meetings one afternoon in the month in the beautiful Sunday-school room of the church. There is first a formal meeting, and then an informal cup of tea, while the open fire gleams and crackles on the hearth. Last Thursday afternoon Mrs. Barrows left the Register office, not in a storm herself, but while a tremendous storm was raging outside, and came out to our meeting at Belmont, and spoke to us out of the fulness of her heart on 'Armenia and the Armenian Outrages.' Her talk was a very instructive and inspiring one, and out of it we trust that something may grow for the larger good of the larger whole. Mrs. Bygrave presided, as usual, at the meeting. The clock and mantel ornaments given by a gentleman of the parish in memory of his wife are much appreciated. On Christmas Sunday, when our church was finely decorated with evergreens, the pastor appeared in the pulpit in the gown which had been presented to him by Mrs. Smith, the beloved and sweet-souled wife of Rev. Amos Smith, the first minister of the parish."

GREENFIELD, MASS.—All Souls' Church, the beautiful new home of the Unitarian society, was dedicated to its religious and social purposes last week with services of peculiar fitness and interest. The church has been described and pictured in the Register. Its solid style of architecture, with the solid square tower as its most imposing feature, faithfully reproducing the shire-town English church of six centuries ago, is an appreciated gain to the town; while the ancient model has yielded perfectly to the modern requirements of church housing. Its location sacrifices a little of the charm that ampler grounds would have added to the beauty of the church, with the gain of a good position from a business point of view; and the church stands physically, as it is hoped it will spiritually, very near the heart of the town. Its cost, by the report of the Building Committee read at the dedication by Hon. E. A. Hall, is shown to have been $27,000; and the society is but $2,000 in debt for its construction. It was formally accepted by F. E. Wells, Esq., chairman of the church committee. A house-warming on the evening preceding the dedication was attended by several hundred people, representing all the churches of the town. For the dedicatory services the auditorium proved itself none too large, and the aisles and open spaces were crowded. The order of service was prepared by Rev. Arthur Anderson Brooks; and its inspiring passages, read responsively, finely presented in dignified form the liberal and more reverent idea of consecration. The sermon by Rev. Minot J. Savage was practical because it adequately defined the relation of a church to the higher life of the people,—its text, "The church of the living God,"—and dedicated the church to the progressive revelation of God; to a reverent, earnest, loving worship; to the service of God, of which the highest form is the service of man.

The other ministers having a share in the service aside from the pastor were Rev. C. B. Elder of Keene, N.H., Rev. Bradley Gilman of Springfield, and Rev. W. F. Greenman of Fitchburg. But none took a larger or more touching part in the exercises than Rev. John F. Moors, D.D., who was brought into the chancel on a couch, and could only listen, because of his enfeebled condition, to a service which marked the fulfilment of one of the most ardent wishes of his life, full as it has been of spiritual church-building.

The following Sunday found the society settled in the new house; and Rev. A. A. Brooks made an earnest completion to the act of dedication in a deeply serious sermon, on a text suggested by the name the society had chosen for its church, "All souls are mine." H. C. P.

HAMILTON, ONT.—The society here has been very much stimulated and helped by two very interesting platform meetings which were held on the evenings of January 8 and 9. At the meeting on Tuesday evening addresses were delivered as follows: "The Religious Situation To-day," by Rev. Thomas R. Slicer of Buffalo; "The Transient and Permanent, the Local and Universal in Religion," by Rev. W. C. Gannett of Rochester, N.Y.; "What the Modern Church must stand for," by Rev. D. W. Morehouse of New York. On Wednesday evening the following programme was carried out: "The Religion of Jesus an Undogmatic Religion," by Rev. W. C. Gannett; "Salvation determined by Character, not by Creed," by Rev. D. W. Morehouse; "The Duty of the Hour for Unitarians," by Rev. T. R. Slicer. Rev. J. H. Long, pastor of the church, presided, and conducted the services. The church was well filled at both meetings by attentive and appreciative audiences; and a deep impression was made, which cannot fail to result in a greater interest in our cause through the city. Such meetings are very helpful to our isolated churches, and should be held more frequently.

LACONIA, N.H.—A friendly visit was paid by officers and members of the Concord Branch of the Women's Alliance to the Branch in Laconia on Saturday, January 12. The afternoon was given up to the visitors. The president of the Laconia Branch presided. Miss Mary A. Downing, director for New Hampshire, gave an interesting account of the Branches in that State, with hints about the best methods of local work. Mrs. Lilian C. Streeter, president of the Concord Branch, urged the importance of the missionary work, reminding Alliance members also that the association exists to quicken their religious life, and emphasizing the importance of the religious study class. Mrs. F. L. Phalen read a thoughtful and suggestive paper on "The Work of Women in our Churches." The meeting resolved itself into an informal reception, after which the Branches parted, feeling helped and strengthened by the friendly visit.

MANCHESTER, N.H.—The Unitarian society has extended a call to Rev. Charles J. Staples to become its pastor, and the call has been accepted. The society is looking forward with much interest and confidence to welcoming their new pastor, and has fresh hope of new prosperity.

MIDDLEBORO, MASS.—Rev. W. C. Litchfield has resigned his pastorate here, to take effect March 5. The resignation is received with regret by the many friends, both within and outside the society, which he has made since his location in town.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.—There was a large attendance last Sunday at the First Unitarian Church in commemoration of the seventieth anniversary of the ordination of Rev. William H. Furness, D.D., and of his installation as pastor of the First Unitarian Church. The attendance was very large, and the pulpit was beautifully decorated with flowers and palms. From the Philadelphia Ledger we take the following abstract of his discourse: "Dr. Furness began by saying that he was ordained pastor of the church Jan. 12, 1825. He was more thankful than he could tell to all his friends. The world changes too rapidly to those growing old. The art of printing inaugurated a mighty revolution in human affairs, but the numerous inventions of the past fifty years are working greater changes. We are having irresistible proof that the freest government is the strongest government. Those early connected with the First Church were men of marked character. Among those mentioned was John Vaughan, who was distinguished, among other things, for his charitable labors among the poor. Some other early members were James Taylor of Scotland and Ralph Eddowes. Then there was Mr. Birch of England, Mr. Small, Mr. James Wood, and William Turner. It was to men of this stamp, said Dr. Furness, that seventy years ago a boy of two-and-twenty was invited to minister as their teacher. Throughout this vast universe nothing is standing still, and we are all soon forgotten; but immortal is He in whose name we are gathered in this place. Those who heard Dr. Channing preach felt they were walking in the triumphal procession of truth. He had a grave, slight figure; and his voice was flexible, sensible to the slightest emotion. People in New England, said Dr. Furness, were Unitarians long before the name was published. Thousands of converts have been found already made. There is no creed so important as the simple lesson of human respect. That is the special office of Christianity. Dr. Furness has never been inclined to preach what is called doctrinal sermons. Unitarian thought, said he, is pervading all denominations; and why, therefore, should we be anxious to have more Unitarian churches? That denunciatory ex-cathedra spirit that characterized Orthodoxy has disappeared. In this community I have found many friends among all denominations. The lapse of seventy years admonishes me that the day is far spent, and the shadows are deepening. May Heaven's best blessing be on you and yours forever more! Seated on the platform were the pastor, Rev. Joseph May, D.D., and Rev. Dr. Robert Collyer of New York. A reception was tendered Dr. Furness and Dr. May in the parlors of the church on Saturday evening. Many prominent men, both among the laity and clergy, met the doctor, and congratulated him upon the conclusion of seventy successful years of service in the church."

STONEHAM, MASS.—The First Unitarian Church will celebrate its freedom from debt by holding a festival Thursday evening, January 24. With its financial freedom it hopes to enter upon a new era of spiritual prosperity.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH.—The Salt Lake City Tribune, giving a detailed list of the churches, sixty-two in number, of Salt Lake City, Utah, on New Year's Day, says of our organization: "The first shall be last, and the last first," says the Bible. If this article were not arranged alphabetically, the First Unitarian Society would have a higher place. Although one of the youngest church organizations, it has steadily increased; and the year just passed has been an important one: first, on account of the resignation of Dr. Utter and the advent of Rev. Stanley M. Hunter as the pastor; and, second, the removal from the Salt Lake Theatre to Unity Hall, where the society has found a permanent home. The congregation numbers now over two hundred; and the Sunday-school has six teachers and fifty pupils, under Dr. Utter's care. The Unity Club was organized by the new rector, Mr. Hunter, and has made rapid strides. The Ladies' Unitarian Society is an executive body, and has done excellent work through the year. Mr. Hunter also conducts a class for the study of the different doctrines of the sects of America, and the meetings of this class are very interesting."

WORCESTER CONFERENCE.—Twenty-eighth annual meeting with the First Unitarian Society, Clinton.—James C. Duncan, minister.—January 23, 24. Programme: Wednesday evening, 7.30, sermon, Rev. S. M. Crothers, Cambridge. Thursday, 9.30 A.M., devotional meeting, conducted by Rev. J. H. Weeks, Westboro; 11 A.M., essay, Rev. A. J. Culp, Winchendon,—subject, "Faith or Agnosticism,"—discussion opened by Rev. F. W. Greenman, Fitchburg; 12.30 P.M., collation; 2.30, essay, Rev. V. E. THE MICHIGAN UNITARIAN CONFERENCE. The dedication of the People's Church in Kalamazoo was held in connection with the annual meetings of the Michigan Conference on December 18. It began with a supper given in honor of the men who had helped to build the church. Two hundred guests were present. Rev. Caroline Bartlett introduced Rev. A. N. Alcott of Elgin, Ill., as toastmaster. After the driving of the last nail, Mr. Edward Frobenius delivered over the finished building with words that were responded to by Miss Bartlett. The architect, the stone-cutter, the carpenter, the decorator, and the organ-builder then spoke in turn, after which all the guests were invited upstairs to the Stone parlor, named in honor of Mrs. Lucinda H. Stone, who delivered an address of welcome. Portraits of Mrs. Stone, Miss Helen Blount, and Mr. Silas Hubbard were presented and hung.

Wednesday morning the session was opened at nine o'clock with a devotional meeting led by Rev. A. N. Alcott of Elgin, Ill. At ten o'clock Mayor Osborn delivered an address of welcome, which was responded to by Rev. Mr. Gould of Chicago, Rev. W. A. Taylor of Jackson, Rev. T. B. Forbush of Chicago, Rev. J. T. Sunderland of Ann Arbor, Mich., Mrs. Agnes D'Arcambal of Detroit, and others. At eleven o'clock Rev. A. W. Gould of Chicago gave a talk on "What to teach our Young People." At two o'clock P.M. Rabbi Grossman of Detroit gave a fine address, "What is Judaism?" followed by Rabbi Fischer of Kalamazoo and Rev. A. N. Alcott of Elgin. At 3.30 the business session of the Michigan Conference opened, Rev. Mr. Sunderland acting as chairman. A nominating committee was appointed, and the report of the treasurer was made and accepted. The conference then adjourned. At 7.15 the formal dedication of the People's Church began. Rev. A. N. Alcott offered the prayer of thanksgiving. The Scriptures were read by Rabbi E. K. Fischer and Rev. A. N. Alcott. After an anthem Rev. Miss Bartlett introduced E. E. Brownson, chairman of the Church Building Committee, who gave a short history of the committee's work. After closing, he presented the keys to the society represented by Mrs. Harry B. Hoyt, chairman of the Board of Trustees, who responded for the board and society. Rev. Clarke G. Howland spoke of his past association with the church, and greetings were read from Dr. Edward Everett Hale and Rev. Dr. Small of Chicago University. The dedicatory sermon was by Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones of Chicago. Rev. Miss Bartlett paid an eloquent tribute to the late Silas Hubbard. Then followed a responsive service by the minister and congregation and a dedicatory prayer by Rev. Marion Murdoch of Cleveland, Ohio.

Thursday morning the conference opened at nine o'clock with a devotional meeting, led by Rev. W. A. Taylor of Jackson. An address on "The Importance of Business Methods in Church Matters" was given by Rev. T. B. Forbush of Chicago. At eleven o'clock Mr. B. F. Underwood of Chicago gave a most scholarly and interesting address upon the "Positive Side of Liberal Religious Thought," and Rev. Marion Murdoch also read an able paper upon the same topic. Mrs. Emma Curtis Hopkins of Chicago gave an address upon "The Jesus Christ of Christian Science," followed by Mrs. Delia Robb of Jackson.

The business session of the conference was held at 3.30. The Committee upon Nominations reported as follows: for president of the conference, Rev. J. T. Sunderland of Ann Arbor, Mich.; vice-president, Mr. Delos C. Brownell of Kalamazoo; secretary, Mrs. F. P. Jordan, Ann Arbor; treasurer, Mr. A. M. Tinker, Jackson. Missionary Committee: Rev. J. T. Sunderland, Ann Arbor; Mrs. Delia Robb, Jackson; Rev. G. W. Buckley, Sturgis; Rev. Mr. Rowan, Detroit; Rev. Caroline J. Bartlett, Kalamazoo. All of whom were duly elected. It was moved that the conference extend their heartfelt thanks to the People's Church for the courtesy and royal entertainment extended to the delegates and friends from away. Adopted. It was moved that a vote of thanks be extended to the papers of Kalamazoo for the full and complete report of the several meetings held during the conference and dedication of the People's Church. Adopted. On motion the conference adjourned. A platform closing meeting was held at 7.15 P.M. Four twenty-minute addresses were given upon "What can Religion do for this World?" participated in by Rev. Marion Murdoch of Cleveland, Ohio, B. F. Underwood of Chicago, Rev. Lee McColester of Detroit, and Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones of Chicago, after which the organ was very appropriately dedicated. The benediction by Miss Bartlett closed one of the most interesting and inspiring meetings in the history of the Michigan Conference. J. C. Richardson, Secretary pro tem.

THE AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.—The board of directors of the American Unitarian Association held their regular monthly meeting at their rooms, 25 Beacon Street, Tuesday, January 8. There were present Mrs. Hooper and Mrs. Wells and Messrs. Ames, Batchelor, Dole, Fox, Gaffield, Hale, Howe, Lincoln, and Savage. The record of the last meeting was read and approved, and the monthly statement of the treasurer was presented. It being the day for the consideration of work in the Southern States, and the superintendent, Rev. George L. Chaney, being absent, all appropriations were postponed for one month, excepting one of $185 to continue the Southern and Indian work for six months. It was voted "That the Executive Committee be instructed to examine and audit the accounts rendered by the secretaries and superintendents of the various departments for traveling and incidental expenses, and receipts for preaching, and report the same at least once a year to the directors."

Upon the recommendation of the Western Committee it was voted that $800 be appropriated to the First Unitarian Society of Helena for the year beginning Nov. 1, 1894.

Upon recommendation of the Publication Committee it was voted that new editions of the following books be authorized, at a cost not exceeding the sums mentioned, for "Unitarianism: Its Origin and History," $150; for "The Perfect Life," Channing, $75.

A communication from Rev. Edward B. Payne of Berkeley, Cal., was referred to the Pacific Coast Committee. A letter from Rev. Charles W. Wendte, describing the many openings for work in California of which we ought to avail ourselves, was also referred to the Pacific Coast Committee.

At the last annual meeting it was "Resolved, That we heartily recommend the formation of a ministry-at-large, to co-operate with our local secretaries in opening and establishing preaching stations at all available points throughout the land."

After discussion it was "Voted, That the Secretary be instructed to correspond with our superintendents and with secretaries of local conferences, with a view to ascertain how far it may be possible and expedient to carry out the plan of opening and establishing preaching stations as recommended by the Association at its last annual meeting, or how far it may be possible and expedient to further our cause by holding local conventions, and to what extent such measures are likely to meet with sympathy and pecuniary support from the population we desire to reach, or from our own churches in the different sections of the country."

A letter was received from Rev. Frederick Preston asking for an appropriation of $500 to establish a Unitarian church in the City of Mexico. This was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Coast.

A letter from Rev. C. H. Rogers of Oklahoma, asking for an appropriation of $100 for a printing-press, was referred to the Western Committee.

Adjourned.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder

Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

Bronchitis.—Sudden changes of the weather cause Bronchial Troubles. "Brown's Bronchial Troches" will give effective relief.

A Hint on Household Decoration.—We give our readers to-day a valuable hint on household decoration. Nearly every family has some bits of bric-a-brac of greater or less value. It is surprising how much their value is enhanced if they are framed in a small cabinet, and placed on exhibition in the parlor. Collectively, they are always effective; and it costs very little to secure a very charming small Curio Cabinet at Paine's on Canal Street.

Washington Excursions. All Expenses Included.—A series of personally conducted excursions to Washington, D.C., during the season of 1894-95, designed particularly to accommodate the people of New England, will be operated via the Royal Blue Line. These excursions will cover a period of seven days; and the rate of $23 from Boston will include fare for the round trip, hotel accommodations in Washington, transfers, and all necessary expenses. The next excursion will leave Boston Wednesday, January 23; and other dates will be announced later.

For information, tickets, and circulars, call on or address A. J. Simmons, New England Passenger Agent 211 Washington Street, Boston.

A Great Institution.—The Royal Baking Powder Company is perhaps the widest and best known manufacturing institution in the world to-day,—everywhere popular and ever growing in public confidence. The good qualities of the "Royal Baking Powder" have been tested by the world's millions of housewives; and, from the beginning of the manufacture of this highly favored article of kitchen excellence, it has been in constant and increasing demand. Great credit is due the company for producing such a high-class article of baking powder and keeping it uniformly pure and free from harmful ingredients in its manufacture. The Royal Company is a business institution of almost inconceivable magnitude, and its lines of trade reach out into the remoteness of all sections of the civilized world. It takes both brains and money to successfully conduct the affairs of such a business institution, and the article of manufacture must itself be superior indeed to so thoroughly attach itself to the consumer.

Pennsylvania Railroad's Tours to "The Golden Gate."—Apart from the rare pleasure of visiting new places and witnessing novel scenes, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company's tours to California will prove better educators than any number of lectures or books on travel. The immense scope of territory traversed will expand the ideas of all tourists, indelibly impress upon their minds enlarged views of this mighty Union and its vast possessions; and they will return to their homes prouder than ever of the great land whose borders are protected by the Stars and Stripes.

These tours have been arranged under the company's renowned personally conducted tourist system; and passengers will travel in magnificent Pullman trains, heated by steam and lighted by electricity. Parties will leave Boston on February 19 and March 19, 1895.

Detailed itinerary will be sent on application to Tourist Agent, 205 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

Deaths.

At Littleton, 2d inst., Mrs. Sarah L. Converse, aged 75 yrs.

As the wife and widow of Rev. E. G. Adams of Templeton, who died in office eighteen years ago, Mrs. Converse was widely known for the notable place she filled in church and town during the thirty years' of her husband's pastorate in Templeton. Childless herself, her motherly heart adopted early all the children of the parish. Magnetic, enthusiastic, and sympathetic, she was largely gifted with the potencies of personal influence, and wielded them for good, suggesting Wordsworth's description of another,—

"A woman nobly planned
To warn, to comfort, and command."

In the church in Templeton, which had furnished the field of her more active labors, and in the church in Littleton, which assisted in the nurture of her earlier years, she preserved to the last a warm and generous interest. Her sunny disposition and cheerful faith helped to relieve the long days and months of her last illness. Death for her had no terrors, and we felt that the line recently called to our attention had beautiful fulfilment in her case,—

"Death is but a tenderness."

HEAVEN.

BY MARY WOODWARD WEATHERBEE.

Oh great, wide country, border land to this,
Home of the souls who've entered into bliss!
We strain our eager eyes
To where thy summits rise:
A veil of splendor hides from sight
The wonders of thy world of light.

Oh undiscovered land, beyond the hills!
To make the journey, all our being thrills.
Is there some shining way,
That leads to perfect day?
A path along the starry blue?
For half, meseems, it shineth through.

Where hang the heaven-lit lanterns of the stars,
Where sunset draws its gold and silver bars,
Is here the jasper gate,
Where our beloved wait,
To give us welcome on thy peaceful shore,
To lead us, children, to a Father's door?

Oh restless soul! that thou should'st wish to know,
What could not profit until God bestow!
To try to look beyond
May but disturb the bond
Of simple trust: then rest thy peace,
And fear in deep tranquillity shall cease.

For thou perchance shalt find heaven is within,
The shining way where duty does begin;
God and the angels there,
Giving unceasing care;
Thy soul shall be the jasper gate,
Where thy beloved ever wait.

THE MODERN SAMARITAN:*

A NEW INTERPRETATION OF CHARITY.

BY REV. THOMAS VAN NESS.

"The cause that I knew not I searched out."—JOB.
"But the greatest of these is charity."—PAUL.

Once or twice before we have tried to get at Paul's exact meaning when he uses the Greek word ἀγάπη, so differently translated in the old and new version of Corinthians. Evidently, some eighteen hundred years ago, the word had not within it the large meaning which Paul desired to express. Possibly it was used loosely, to cover a variety of qualities, much as with certain very admirable words in our own language. Be that as it may, it is apparent that no better word could be found, even in the most cultivated tongue of antiquity. Consequently, the apostle is antequity required to make use of it. In his letter to the Corinthians we find it as the subject and centre for a remarkable exhortation. To guard against misunderstanding, Paul first carefully excludes the things he does not mean by ἀγάπη, and then adds, in sentence after sentence, what he does mean by it, until the word comes to the listener's ear freighted with such a wealth of significance that, up to the present hour, no word in any language has greater import or deeper meaning.

We shall not now analyze the word, but simply stop to inquire what one element within man is capable of manifesting itself under such different characteristics as patience, kindness, generosity, humility, courtesy, unselfishness, good temper, guilelessness, sincerity.

Surely, nothing less is defined here than the very qualities of the soul itself. Our translators, in taking the word "love" for the English equivalent, must have had in mind not so much its smaller modern interpretation as its good old Teutonic meaning; for, as you know, love comes from leben, to live. To love, then, is to live: not to love is not to live. Love, therefore, is life. As Luther puts it, when I say I devotedly love another, I mean that I desire to be in perfect union with that I love,—his wishes my wishes, his joys my joys. No more will my acts be done simply to please myself. In proportion as my love is strong do I give up myself,—the self disappears in others. I lose my little life, and find it larger, more complete, in union with that life which is beyond and outside the petty circle of conscious personality.

What sweeter, finer definition of God than that which is in the New Testament, "God is Love" (ἀγάπη), because God is infinite Life? There is, then, the element of sacrifice in this word "love." In some way it means the renouncing, to a certain extent, of our own life, or, to more exactly state it, the sharing of our personal life with those around us. Judged from the religious standard, it is only in so far as we do put self into our actions that there is anything either moral or unmoral about them. A man may give of his wealth, his eloquence, his knowledge, his property, as Paul would say; but, if in this giving there is nothing of himself, of his own "life-fibre," then it is not the giving of love we witness, but merely an automatic semblance of the same, out from which there is extracted all soul quality.

Thus much being understood, the practical question arises, To how great a degree must the sacrifice of self be carried? What actions in this direction shall we applaud, what condemn? As we look back over history, we see a great wave of enthusiasm arising, which sweeps hundreds and hundreds of men into the ranks of the Crusaders,—those who enlist, and give up home and property and family to devote themselves to the deliverance of the holy sepulchre. Apparently, they carry out most literally the injunctions of Jesus to sell all that they have, to renounce father and mother and wife and child for what is thought imperative duty to the Christian cause. What shall we say, then, of the Crusaders? Are they worthy of our highest applause? As we ask the question, there comes to our mind that second children's crusade which the empire of Russia so lately knew. A children's crusade I call it, because the young men and maidens who went forth from the cities to preach to the peasantry the gospel of socialism were little more than children. Analyze that stage of Nihilism, the period of propaganda, and you find it as unselfish, as enthusiastic, as fully dominated with lofty religious zeal, as fully consecrated in its efforts to reclaim the lost, as any period in mediæval days. I know of nothing more pathetic than the picture of those university students and well-born sons and daughters forsaking comfortable homes and going forth to live with poor, dull, unlettered peasants,—to work with them at the hardest and most menial employments, in order that, when night came, they could gather these same mujiks into some thatched cottage, and by the light of a dim smoking candle read and expound the new gospel of Nihilism; and in Western Europe to-day we find men devoting themselves to a political idea, and committing acts or writing articles in its name which send them to prison or to worse. Yet, even as they go, they shout with a glad confidence their faith, in the phrase, "Long live anarchy!"

Are all these, then, to be commended along with the early Christian saints, martyrs, and teachers? At once we answer, No; for, as Paul has expressly stated, something more is requisite than mere blind faith in a cause such as would remove mountains, or a willingness even to give one's body to be burned.

These self-regardless acts have no more reason to be classed among those termed "charitable" than the needless sacrifice of Xerxes's nobles to please a whim of that sovereign, who, when he so commanded them, paid him reverence, and then plunged into the wild sea to their certain death; or than the brave generosity of certain members of Napoleon's old guard, who at moments of danger rushed in, and took the blows intended for their general. Love may be willing to go to such lengths if needs be, but the cause or the man for whom so much is given must be well worthy of the sacrifice. A right-acting intelligence as well as a strong-moving emotion is essential, otherwise the most extravagant generosity may be worse than useless,—more, it may be sheer folly or blind madness.

What we can thus see so plainly in regard to these more exaggerated enthusiasms should not be lost sight of when we come to examine the less dramatic actions in our own every-day experiences in business or domestic relations. A mother must not carry her devotion to her children to that point where her own health is ruined, a father must not slave at his business so that he is worn out before his time, nor must a wife completely sink her individuality in order that her husband may better enjoy the things of the world. In short, proper love for others may often imply due regard for self. It is exactly here where a great amount of intelligence needs to be brought to bear on the simplest acts of every day, in order that each may do his charitable duty, not only, as he supposes, to others, but as well to himself. We repeat, illuminated intelligence should go hand in hand with fervid emotion,—the head yoked with the heart. Otherwise, the best-intentioned person, by a sudden act, may do more harm than can be corrected by many after years of the most conscientious and painstaking labor.

Having now a firm basis upon which to stand, let us go forward to ask when, as it were for others or for society's welfare, we should give of ourselves, and when even to the point of death. I think Ruskin helps us to the answer; and, because of the pertinence of the quotation, I give it entire:—

Five great intellectual professions exist in every civilized nation. The soldier's profession is to defend it; the pastor's, to teach it; the physician's, to keep it in health; the lawyer's, to enforce justice in it; the merchant's, to provide for it. And the duty of all these men is, on due occasion, to die for it. On due occasion; that is, the soldier, rather than leave his post in battle; the physician, rather than leave his post in plague; the pastor, rather than teach falsehood; the lawyer, rather than countenance injustice.

Supposing the captain of a frigate saw it right, or were by any chance obliged to place his own son in the position of a common sailor,—as he would then treat his son, he is bound always to treat every one of the men under him. So, also, supposing the master and owner of a manufactory saw it right, or were by any chance obliged to place his own son in the position of an ordinary workman,—as he would then treat his son, he is bound always to treat every one of his men.

And, as the captain of a ship is bound to be the last man to leave his vessel in case of wreck, and to share his last crust with the sailors in case of famine, so the manufacturer, in any commercial crisis or distress, is bound to take the suffering of it with his men, and even to take more of it for himself than he allows his men to feel,—as a father would, in a famine, shipwreck, or battle, sacrifice himself for his son.

"As a father would act toward his own son." Here is a partial answer to our question: here, at least, is the rule to put into effect in our relations with those persons who are of the lower classes. Lower, did I say? Yes, lower, but only in the sense that a son is lower than his father; for such persons have the same inherent capacities we possess, only those capacities are latent, not yet developed. Like as with a child, so with them: their misfortunes, their sufferings, come mainly through unregulated emotions, from an inability to realize to their own imagination the needs of the future, and, consequently, an improvident waste of the things immediately at hand. Thus are they content to lead a happy-go-lucky existence, bounded each day by the hours of that day; and, just as we notice in the boy the hasty temper that would destroy its possessor united with a generous self-abandon which comes from inexperience, so can we find counterpart characteristics in the poorer and improvident classes.

What is our method with the child we love? Because the qualities of disposition which betoken unripeness and youth appear in him, do we therefore cast him off? Nay, for the very reason that he is so in need, so weak in the things that give success in life, do we strive the more earnestly to see that his education is not neglected. It is the aim of every intelligent and loving father to have his son learn self-control and economy, to know how to make the will supreme over the emotions and passions, more especially to learn the right relations which should exist between man and man in business and social intercourse.

To how great an extent is the merchant striving to do this same thing with those in his employ? How much time and thought is the manufacturer expending in trying to develop the bodies and souls of his work hands, as well as in trying to get every iota of labor out of them? "The function of wealth," it has been said, "is to secure perfection of character and the promotion of social welfare." The promotion of social welfare! How largely does the income of the millionaire go toward the social uplifting of the masses? how far to the perfection of his own character? In the light of our text these, indeed, are most pertinent questions.

In this connection, possibly, it may not be altogether out of place to refer to the late Pullman strike, although, as a rule, it is not well for purposes of illustration to point to recent actions, where passion and prejudice make it difficult for men to see events in their proper proportion. Nevertheless, it is fair to ask whether Mr. Pullman, after having induced a certain number of working people to come to the town which he had built, where they were largely at the mercy of his will and dependent upon his power, acted toward them, in their first exhibition of childish anger, as a father would toward his own son. And it is equally fair to ask whether, if such had been his procedure, there would have followed the strikes, riots, and bloodshed, the loss of property, and the prostration of a happy and thriving industrial centre, with the present hard and strained relations between employer and employees. Further, it is not inappropriate to inquire whether such forbearance, such an intellectual attitude, would not have been more truly charitable, and therefore more worthy of applause, than the giving of ever so many hundreds of dollars to missions, churches, or the relief organizations of Chicago.

Let us pass now to another phase of the subject. If charitable feelings are correctly developed, they will lead us not only into more just relations with our fellows, but, concomitantly, there will be on our part a more earnest study of present social and political conditions.

Civilization is in a transition stage. Real freedom of opportunity for all men is but a phrase. There exist to-day in society many hindrances to individual progress, such as inherited privileges, unjust discriminations, legal monopolies, etc. These mainly help one class to the detriment of another. The love and tenderness exhibited by the Samaritan are admirable; but for us, in order to duplicate his good act, it is not necessary to wait until the traveller is knocked down on the Jericho road, beaten, robbed, and left half dead by a ruffianly gang of fellows, before we go to his assistance. While not so ostentatious, it is certainly more useful, and consequently more commendable, to inquire how it happens that the Jericho road is unsafe, and to bring the whole weight of our influence to bear upon the police system, in order that the safety of the public roads may be maintained. The act which seeks to prevent is certainly as charitable as the act which, after the mishap, steps in with brotherly help and sustenance.

But intelligent charity will go one degree further. Not only will it require of us to give our time and our energy to public duties as citizens, but it will command as well that we spend some thought on the consideration of what is wrong in the present conditions of society. Why are men out of work and compelled to tramp from one State to another, often under the temptation of robbing and stealing from the travellers on the Jericho road? How comes it that we have hungry ones, when there is more in the land to eat than can be used? How comes it that certain people are cold, when there are millions of tons of coal in the ground, and many of these people are willing to dig it? How comes it, I repeat, that people have no home but the highway, when whole counties and districts of land are lying idle, of no good to either man or beast? No, it is not enough to visit the sick and give alms to the poor. These do not now express the whole duty of philanthropy. Jesus commanded his first followers to comfort the sorrowing and visit those in prison. But, as it has been well said, "he commands you and me in this century to investigate the causes of physical evil; to master the science of health; to consider the question of education with a view to intelligent action on the part of the poor, the question of labor with a view to their prosperity, the question of trade with a view to the business health of the body corporate." And, while all these investigations are made, with free expense of our energy, our time, and our means, let us not afterward be afraid to try to work out in society that rearrangement of human life which is in accord with the results such investigations give. Let us awake, then, from our apathy. To such study each one of us is called. The times demand it, loyalty to the kingdom of God demands it. Remember, we are accountable not only for the evil which we ourselves do, but for the evil which we might have prevented. "The cause that I knew not I searched out." This spirit of the ancient writer must be ours to-day.

Lastly, what does charity imply to equals? i.e., what does it impose upon us when we are with those who are of the same station in life? First of all, a patience with their weaker characteristics and a disposition to suffer long without complaint for their sakes; added to that, a kindness and an instant generosity where actual need arises; combined with these, a humanity which should be the very opposite of that egotistic forwardness so common in the average young American; then a gentle courtesy, which willingly takes a subordinate position in public or on a committee, and gladly joins in the applause to one who perhaps may be considered a rival in business or professional life, "is not easily provoked" by opposition or perhaps in the midst of a monetary or free-trade discussion, but lays aside social prejudice and acts with a Christ-like guilelessness, not believing the evil told of a neighbor, and refusing absolutely to join in the petty social gossip that finds amusement in picking to tatters and holding up to laughter the reputation or pretensions of a friend.

As Drummond has well said, "The business, the real business, of our lives—of your life, of my life—is to have these characteristics of charity fitted into our own characters." The supreme work to which we need to address ourselves is to learn love. Life is not a holiday, but an education. The one eternal lesson for us all is, How better can we love? The greatest of these is charity, life. Without that all else is as nothing. Friends, are we willing to give self? To such renunciation, and to nothing less, do I invite you this morning. Said Garibaldi to his Roman friends before he would accept them as his soldiers: "Citizens, what I have to offer you is fatigue, danger, struggle, and death; the chill of the cold night in the free air, and heat under the burning sun; no lodging, no munitions, no provisions, but forced marches, dangerous watch-posts, and the continual struggle with the bayonet against batteries. Those who love freedom and their country may follow me." So, for the ideal kingdom and the promised land, saints, apostles, martyrs, and confessors have gladly given their all, suffering privation and hunger, disappointment and sickness, sorrow and death; for they looked forward to a city which hath eternal foundations, whose builder and maker is God.

Now, behold, the word of our leader comes to us, saying, "Advance!" Shall we alone prove unfaithful?

THE HOME SCHOOL.

BY REV. LYMAN CLARK.

Parents having children to educate, and needing, as many do, the help of a boarding-school, may well seek these conditions.

The best educational facilities are required. The teachers should be well qualified, and should have the needful facilities with which to work,—well-furnished school buildings, dormitory, class-rooms, laboratory, library, gymnasium, and campus or grounds for recreation. With these facilities the education, health, and physical training can all receive the proper attention. The home care and training that will be provided at the dormitory will be a very important feature of the school situation. There should be a distinct recognition of the need of training in the habits, manners, and social usages that belong to good society. The education should be furnished under conditions favorable to the acquirement of good social habits. The religious associations should have careful consideration. If the school gives proper attention to the elementary virtues which are the foundation of every good life, the special religious associations preferred by the parents may be found in the neighboring churches. Denominational teaching has no proper place in the class-room. Catechisms are not good text-books for school use.

It is easily seen that the supply of all these facilities requires a liberal expenditure of money. When President Eliot outlined for the Unitarian Club a high-class fitting school, "polydenominational," as he described it, the cost was estimated at $500,000. About $500 is needed for the apparatus with which to prepare a pupil for Harvard College in the single study of physics.

Various good schools are found, under Unitarian or liberal management; but, because of the fact that other denominations have done more in the direction of the thorough furnishing of their denominational schools, Unitarians have often sent children to these schools. And not unfre-quently the pupil has sent the parents an invitation to come and see him confirmed, as the result of the proselytism of such schools. Such a case was reported to the writer last week. Many of our churches have suffered the loss of some of their young people by this process. There is need of a Unitarian mission to Unitarian children. They have, in a measure, been a missionary field for the other denominations by means of the denominational schools. We should earnestly ask the question, What can be done? The will of the late Mrs. J. M. Hunt of Nashua is reported as containing a bequest of $3,000 for Proctor Academy. Unitarians have, individually, given more for undenominational education than President Eliot asked for in behalf of a polydenominational school. Jonas Clark gave several million dollars to establish Clark University at Worcester, Mass. Brewster Academy, Wolfeboro, N.H., was established by the gift of a million of dollars. Both of these benefactions came from Unitarians. The writer hopes to see the time when good home schools, under Unitarian control, will receive that liberality which is called for to put them in condition to do the best work. Proctor Academy and the Prospect Hill School have both, for the past dozen years or more, been seeking an endowment. These and other schools ought to have it. Rev. Brooke Herford, in a report made as chairman of the Council of the National Conference, called for a high-class school. Such a school might well be built up at Concord, Mass., or some other desirable location. The object is worthy of having a half million of dollars devoted to it, perhaps in memory of some one of the noble benefactors of humanity whose names are a part of our history.

By comparatively recent action of the American Unitarian Association we have now a school committee for the denomination. The writer is not aware that there has been any meeting as yet for the consideration of the general situation. Such consideration is needed, and some report might well be made which would embody a denominational policy. There is no good sense in our committing our children to other denominations to educate while we whet our zeal in behalf of missions to the great world about us. If Unitarianism is good for the world, as we believe, it is good for Unitarian children; and they ought not to be sent to schools that will deny them the privilege of attendance at a Unitarian church or Sunday-school.

We need good home schools, equal to the best. There is no good logic in our taking the position that, as others have conducted denominational schools in a way that we disapprove, therefore we will do nothing. We should rather educate in what we think to be the better way. The example of Mrs. Hunt in aiding the educational endowment that is so much needed is to be commended.

Several of our ministers are devoting themselves to this work. Such as have the needed scholarship, sympathy with young people, good business sense and administrative faculty, may well do so. The educational work is a distinct interest of the denomination that ought to have its corps of ministers devoted to its effective advancement.

Our Committee on Education might well examine the work or status of existing schools, and recommend to the denomination such as are worthy of the support of our people. The Year Book ought to contain a satisfactory list of such schools, which may thus be commended to Unitarian patronage.

NEW YORK LETTER.

One is reminded by the new spirit of reform that is at work in our municipal affairs of Emerson's address on "Man the Reformer," delivered in 1841. Now, as then, all things seem to hear the trumpet and rush to judgment. The last thing to be publicly assailed is the gross abuses connected with the public schools in this city. Last spring one of the commissioners of the School Board took it upon himself to visit personally every school-building in the city, and to take notes upon its condition. For his valuable services in this matter he lost, some time ago, his position on the board. His report disclosed a state of things which was a disgrace to those who were responsible for it. The abuses seemed to exist largely in the schools for the poorer children. These were outrageously overcrowded, in one case one thousand little ones being packed into a building containing sixteen inadequate rooms, with not a safe exit in case of fire. The disclosures regarding unsanitary plumbing, lack of light and air, were too dreadful easily to credit. Yet these facts have just been substantiated by more recent visits to the schools made by reporters of the New York Times. The semi-annual report of Mr. Snyder, Superintendent of School Buildings, shows that few, if any, of these abominable conditions have been remedied since first disclosed. "It is lack of money," says the Board of Education. "Not a sufficient excuse," say the reformers. "New York may not spend sufficient money on its schools, but it is entirely certain that what it does spend is wastefully used." Aroused public sentiment, the ultimate force in the American government, and courageous Mayor Strong will undoubtedly bring about a reform of these evils.

Emerson, in his address above referred to, says that the very extravagance of abuses often makes the reformers tend to an extreme idealism. Such is evidently the opinion of Hon. Dorman B. Eaton, one of our best authorities on all matters pertaining to civil service and good government. By means of a series of newspaper articles on "Police Reorganization," Mr. Eaton has endeavored to turn aside the immanent danger of too extreme and experimental reforms in the police service. He does not favor a single-headed police commission, which some prominent men have advocated; and he does not believe in a too sweeping and immediate change in the personnel of the present police force. He advocates the adding of three new members to the present Board of Commissioners, each to hold office during good behavior. His plan also includes the preparation of a well-digested police law, and the reform of many other unwise present arrangements.

All Souls' Church has been the centre of a large share of our denominational activities of late. On Friday, January 4, at a spirited meeting of the New York League, "The University Settlement" was discussed by some of the workers in this noble social movement. Miss Catherine Jones traced the historical development of the University Settlement, and described its sociological methods. The movement originated in England, spread into Scotland, and came finally to the United States in 1889. Hull House in Chicago, under the charge of Miss Jane Addams,—there reverently and affectionately known as the "angel of Hull House,"—and the house on Rivington Street in this city, were the first American settlements. Briefly defined, a University, Social, or College Settlement, is a house located in a poor district, and filled with earnest, educated, warm-hearted men or women, who attempt no sudden and strange reforms, but quietly study the needs of the neighborhood, and then try to supply the initiative force which will help the poor people to do for themselves.

Miss Ada L. Woolfolk gave a talk on the attitude of the settlements toward the problems of city life. One of her most striking statements was that life among the poor prevented the making of and the giving of support to unwise laws. As an example, she took the temperance question. While continually fighting the evil of intemperance, no settlement would give its support to the closing of the saloons on Sunday. Men would have their beer every day in the week. Depriving them of a legitimate way of obtaining it led to bribery of the policemen, and to general dishonesty all around. Even the little children were not exempt. They fibbed glibly to protect their parents.

Both Miss Jones and Miss Woolfolk spoke without notes, and with an ease and eloquence which testified to good training. Miss Mildred Conway continued the discussion by giving an account of the men's settlement at No. 10 Delancy Street. Miss M. E. Buttrick gave a thoughtful paper on the attitude of the settlements toward religion. Miss Doughty of the Philadelphia Settlement said that, unlike working-girls' clubs, the settlements did not isolate an individual member of a family by bestowing all its advantages upon one. It reached the child in the kindergarten, the mother, the father, and the grown-up children in the various clubs and training classes that it fostered. She had known one member of a working-girls' club who grew to be ashamed of her ignorant mother. Such a tragic outcome was impossible under the working methods of a college settlement.

The meeting of the New York Sunday School Union held at All Souls' parish house on January 7 was an extremely interesting one. The admirable address by Rev. Samuel A. Eliot on "What shall we sing in our Sunday-schools?" drew forth an interesting and instructive discussion. Mr. Eliot has also recently given a highly commended address before the New England Society of Brooklyn on "The Poets and Poetry of New England."

Cards have just been issued for a reception to be given at the parish house by All Souls' Church to its new assistant minister, Rev. Frederick J. Gauld. Mr. Gauld is winning the approval of all for his able and efficient services in connection with the mission work of the church. In order the better to provide for this work,—which, under the management of the Friendly Aid Society of this parish, has developed to considerable proportions,—a building has just been purchased on Second Avenue where this branch of the church's work will in the future be largely centred. It is to be called the All Souls' Friendly Aid House.

A paper on "Some Recent Novels," by Rev. Dr. James G. Townsend, was read at the last ministers' lunch, held, as usual, at the Reform Club. Dr. Townsend was severely critical of the modern novel, and his strictures drew forth an animated discussion. The stories of the lamented Stevenson did not escape Dr. Townsend's criticism. This is the more interesting because of the recent memorial meeting at Carnegie's Hall to do honor to the memory and genius of Mr. Stevenson. The audience was a large and brilliant one, and the literary men on the platform seemed to tacitly testify by their presence to the high place of honor that the late romancer had won in literature. Mr. Edmund C. Stedman presided at the meeting. Of the six addresses made, none was more tender than that of Dr. Edward Eggleston, a friend of Mr. Stevenson, who knew him, he said, to be one of the most lovable of men, never set up with his own reputation, and whose matchless literary work was free from the taint of the "eroticism" of the modern novel typified in Flaubert and Guy de Maupassant. Likewise, none of the addresses was more eloquent than Mr. Carnegie's, who fittingly spoke for the first time in his own hall to do honor to the genius of his fellow-countryman. The other speakers were George W. Cable, John Foord, and David Christie Murray. The latter told a story of himself and Sir John E. Millais. Being asked by the latter if he would like to become a great painter, and replying that he would, the artist said, "Well, Mr. Murray, you have only to put the right colors in the right place." So in literature it was putting the right word in the right place,—an art which Mr. Stevenson had apparently mastered.

Another genius whose work is just now receiving attention here is the late George Inness, two hundred and forty of whose pictures, belonging to his estate, are on exhibition at the galleries of the Fine Arts Society in Fifty-seventh Street. At the American Art Galleries on Twenty-third Street a score or more of paintings by the same artist are also on exhibition. Of No. 7 in the latter collection Mr. Benjamin Constant has taken pains to say in the press that, "if signed by Millet, Turner, or Corot, it would be worth $10,000 or more. No warm and stormy day in June has ever been better felt or expressed better." Both collections present an embarrassment of riches to the picture-lover. Word-pictures from some of the poets flash to mind while standing before some of these remarkable canvases, many of which deal superbly with such difficulties as the representation of "A Quiet-colored End of Evening." It is hoped by many that the New York Metropolitan Museum will secure some of these pictures at the public sale in February of those belonging to the artist's estate.

EMERTON'S "MEDIÆVAL EUROPE."*

The work that lies before us is one that will be of great use to the young student of history, for it fills a real gap in English historical literature. The work of Hallam is long since superannuated; Guizot's "History of Civilization" is teeming with errors; and the latest work on the subject, Henderson's "Germany in the Middle Ages," is too rugged in form, and too much a mass of detail, to be of service to the beginner. Whatever slight faults we shall have to point out later in Prof. Emerton's style, there is no doubt but that the narrative flows on gracefully and easily, and that the reader is led on very naturally from one event to another. The "philosophic grasp" which he praises in Otto of Freisingen is a quality which Prof. Emerton possesses himself to a considerable extent. The second chapter, for instance, on the development of the papal power, from the earliest times to the end of the Carolingian period, is remarkable as a logical treatment in small compass of an intricate and difficult subject. Extremely useful are the rich literary references which head each chapter, although it is much to be regretted that the author did not know of the later edition of Wattenbach's "Geschichtsquellen" (1885 and 1886), which might have furnished him occasionally with references to better texts of original sources. The new edition of "Dahlmann-Waitz," which gives a complete bibliography of German history, came out too late to be of use.

The greatest fault that we have to find with Prof. Emerton's book is a certain one-sidedness and want of proportion: certain subjects, which seem to have interested the writer especially, are treated with great fulness; others, equally important, are disposed of in a most cavalier manner. Thus the conflicts of the empire with the papacy fill nearly half the book; but the reign of Henry VI., in which no such conflict took place, but which, nevertheless, is one of the most important in the history of the empire, is sadly neglected. Mention is made, indeed, of Henry's vain effort to make the throne hereditary in his own house; but nothing is said of the fact that the princes at first acquiesced in the plan, and at the diet of Wurzburg (April, 1196) drew up charters to that effect, having been promised, not, as Prof. Emerton has it, that fiefs should be hereditary, but that they should be transferable to daughters and collateral relatives in default of direct male heirs. Henry was obliged to relinquish his plan, and did so with a good grace, but, nevertheless,—a point on which Prof. Emerton has not a word to say,—succeeded more nearly in realizing the old imperial ideal of world-monarchy than any of his predecessors or successors. The hand of death was laid upon him in the moment of his triumph, but not until he had gained the rule of the Sicilian-Apulian kingdom, not until he had forced the king of England to become his vassal for the moment, and had wrung such tribute from the Greek empire that the tombs of the emperors had to be sacked to pay the lordly demands. Surely, the man who did all this deserves to have devoted to him more than one-tenth of the space given to a Conrad II.

Take another instance of the author's tendency to be one-sided, and to tell but half the story. The vain efforts of Otto I. to carry on the administration of his great monarchy by the aid of the national dukes are told with some detail; but no mention is made of the new policy which the disappointed emperor adopted,—how he rested his hopes henceforward on the clergy, and commenced making them those huge grants of lands and immunities which, continued on a still larger scale by his son and grandson, until whole counties had been deeded away, were so to enrich the Church as to make the later war of the investitures a struggle for life or death between the empire and the papacy.

Decidedly, one-sidedness is the author's besetting sin. It is one-sided that, in a chapter which deals with the intellectual life of the Middle Ages, there should be no mention of the "Nibelungenlied," or of that great exponent of the highest chivalry, the "Parsifal" of Wolfram of Eschenbach. It is one-sided, too, to dwell on the French and Italian communes, and not to attempt to trace the growth of those German cities which, on the empire's fall in 1250, were to become heirs for a time of the imperial or at least the royal power.

Of actual mistakes there are few to chronicle, though the startling assertion cannot well be passed by that the conversion of lands into feudal proprietorships was more rapid and more complete in Germanic than in Romanic countries. Nor was it ever possible in Germany to lay down the general principle, "Nulle terre sans seigneur." There were always allodial holdings, though the latter were sometimes dignified by the euphonious title of "fiefs of the sun." In ending our review, we would like to call attention to one or two colloquialisms which might well be eliminated in a new edition. Other expressions had better be used for the "direct lord, who 'took it out' of the tillers of the soil"; for the "Roman party, which had 'tossed up its hat' for Otto III."; and for the "pilgrims of the cross, who were now 'cutting their eye-teeth' with a vengeance." ESSAYS AND ADDRESSES, RELIGIOUS, LITERARY, AND SOCIAL. By Phillips Brooks, late Bishop of Massachusetts.—Edited by Rev. John Cotton Brooks. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.—Phillips Brooks is known to the public as the great preacher. His brother has now given us a collection of essays and addresses comprising all of which there is any satisfactory record of his public utterances outside of the pulpit. These are of value, both for their intrinsic merits and also because they give us a fuller insight into his general opinions and intellectual methods. His printed sermons have already made evident the breadth of his sympathy and the elevation of his thought. The same spirit which made him the great preacher pervades these general addresses. We note in him the peculiarities which marked both Stanley and Frederic Robertson,—the power of seeing the truest and best features in different and even opposite opinions, and so stating them as to make them appear as one side of the truth. His mind was not critical, but receptive; and this enabled him to come into agreement where the critic would find reasons for dissent. Thus, like the bee, he gathered honey from very unlike flowers. He looked on all subjects from a broad and elevated point of view, and his mind was fresh and alive to what he saw. This he urged upon others. "The Church has no unwritten law, no interpretation of her creed to which her children must conform. That is a truth concerning her on which we always must insist. She has her creed, in which all her children alike believe; and all believe differently. Thus she keeps the union of identity and variety, which all living things must have. Thus she bids each believer be a sharer in the belief of all, while at the same time he holds his own personal conviction clear. Dogmatism loses the liberty and life of personal conviction, scepticism loses the largeness of universal faith. The Church, if she holds her creed as a creed ought to be held, is neither dogmatic nor sceptical, but keeps both the special and the universal, and makes them minister to each other. This is why she is the home of generous belief." Akin to this breadth of thought was a vivid belief in the power of truth, and that man is a child of God. He made his appeal to the human soul with the deep conviction that, in its best moods, it would respond to that which was truly noble and heroic. Both in his preaching and addresses this is marked. Thus, in his address on Luther, in speaking of the reformer's great central truth of justification by faith, he says: "It was of the soul and the experience, not of the reason. Faith was not an act, but a being; not what you did, but what you were. The whole truth of the immanence of God and the essential belonging of the human life to the divine; the whole truth that God is a power in man, and not simply a power over man, building him as a man builds a house, guiding him as a man steers a ship,—this whole truth, in which lies the seed of all humanity, all progress, all great human hope, lay in the truth that justification was by faith, and not by works." Again, in his address to the Children's Aid Society, he asks: "What is to keep the world safe in the midst of all these dangers? The great, everlasting, primal things underlying history. In new regions of danger, amid forces of greater comprehensiveness than ever before, it is human character: it is the simple nature of man known in his divineness as a child of God." Once more, we see how much stress he placed on the power of personality. Thus, in his address before the Divinity School at Yale University, on "The Teaching of Religion," he asks: "And now what is this primary comprehensive conception of the religious teacher's work which grows in the mind of the Christian minister through many years of work? I answer without hesitation. It is the personal conception: it is the notion that his task consists in bringing the personal Christ to the personal human nature, to the human soul. I am sure that the highest delight and the highest effect of a man's preaching comes just in the degree in which all the circumstances of his work,—first, its great perpetual departments, the instruction in doctrine, the awakening of feeling, the enforcement of law; and then all its minute details, the methods of preaching, the habits of study, the ways of parish government, the relationships to individuals,—all find their dignity, their interpretation, their urgency, and their harmony with one another by being included in one simple conception of a personal introduction of person to person, of the teacher by every means in his power, making real and influential the personality of Jesus Christ upon the personalities of the men whom he is teaching. . . . The minister who has reached and holds always the simplest picture of what his ministry means, that he is to make the personal Christ known to men, in the same way, in the same sense, only with infinitely more of responsibility and joy than that with which one man makes his brother know another man who has helped him, and who he knows may help them both,—the minister to whom this picture of his work in life is always clear, to whom all the duties and circumstances of his ministry play within this picture, giving it vividness, but never making it confused and dim,—he is the preacher, in every land, in every age, who really teaches men religion." We have given only a few thoughts which this new book suggests. As a whole, it is very inspiring; and, if it does not present any newer features of the great preacher's thought and method than have been already given in his printed sermons, it represents him in a broader field. And it cannot fail to remind us once more of the power, vitality, and inspiration of the personality of Phillips Brooks.

SOCIALISM AND SOCIAL REFORM. By Richard T. Ely, Ph.D., LL.D. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell & Co.—Prof. Ely does not belong to the ranks of the unemployed. No man who wields a hammer or a hoe can be more industrious than he. His volumes, of which this is the last, form a little library on social and industrial problems; and this volume is more interesting from the recent attacks made upon Prof. Ely by the Superintendent of Education in Wisconsin. His book bears out the claim of the preface, that it is written in a conservative spirit. It is not revolutionary, and certainly not anarchistic. Prof. Ely is a conservative of the progressive order, who is not satisfied with the existing conditions. A large proportion of his book is descriptive and analytical of socialistic ideas and schemes. The word "socialism" is generally used very loosely; and a good deal of space is devoted by Prof. Ely in defining, explaining, and clearing away misapprehensions. His attitude is apologetic, sympathetic, expository. Some of his vindications would apply to one system of socialism, and not to another; for there is nothing clearer than that there is socialism and socialism. There is a great difference, for instance, between the English Fabians, who are students and observers of socialism, and the extreme and dogmatic schools, such as may be found among German socialists or communists in this country. The rapid decline of Nationalism is recognized, and its general absorption into the Populist movement. Mr. Ely draws distinctions between socialism and social reform which it is necessary to quote to indicate his position: "Socialism, finally, must be contrasted with social reform. The two often favor similar measures, and are confounded by loose observers; but, the more carefully one looks into them, the greater appears the difference. Socialists themselves have come to see this, but it has not been so generally perceived by the more pronounced opponents of socialism. Social reform has been called by a German writer 'positivism,' to indicate its positive constructive nature. It does not hold that an entire social reconstruction is necessary, but believes that much which has been done in the past and is incorporated in the existing society is very good; and it proposes the careful development and improvement of existing institutions. Social reform does not find any one panacea for social evils, but holds that remedies are numerous, because society is many-sided and complex. Social reform views with favor what socialists and adherents of the panaceas generally look upon with impatience as mere patchwork. Social reform looks to the Church and voluntary associations of men as well as to the State for further growth and improvement. Social reform is very generally willing to extend the functions of government, and is not unfrequently willing to go so far as the socialization of monopoly; but it does not see the desirability of the socialization of the entire industrial field. Social reform is conservative, and not revolutionary." The second part of the volume deals with the strength of socialism. The waste which comes through competition is shown by instances of which there are a multitude; but the good results of competition, which are often exhibited in increased accommodations and opportunities for the public, are not fully exhibited. That some of these wastes would be reduced under socialism is evident, but there are elements in individualism which the abolition of competition would sacrifice. It is clear that Mr. Ely sometimes states the objections to socialism without really answering them. In the concluding part of his work the author presents what he calls "The Golden Mean, or Practical Social Reform." He favors the socialization of national monopolies and wide diffusion of property under laws of inheritance, public employment bureaus, and public ownership of forests. Many other ways of social reform are suggested. The variety and breadth of Prof. Ely's suggestions; the fact that he has no single panacea for the cure of all ills, but is rather a general practitioner,—create confidence in the reader. The man who shows how much may be done is not so dangerous as he that claims that to do anything is impossible, or he who advocates a single cure-all for the diseases of society. An appendix contains valuable matter for reference, and the excellent bibliography at the end will be a great help to the student of socialism.

GREAT COMMANDERS: GENERAL LEE. By Fitzhugh Lee, his Nephew and Cavalry Commander. New York: D. Appleton & Co.—The present generation of readers is fortunate in being able to estimate the worth of the great actors in the war for the Union, undisturbed by any of the prejudice and heat which were apt to attend all contemporary discussions, North and South, of the men and operations of that critical time in American history; and Gen. Fitzhugh Lee's story of the life of the great Confederate soldier will aid in furthering a dispassionate view of the spirit which led the South to battle. The story is told with great love and reverence for its hero, as, indeed, no picture of such a character could be justly presented without admiration for his high order of military skill, his disinterested devotion to what appeared to him to be his plain patriotic duty, and his constant modesty and gentleness toward friends and opponents. To put into such limited compass a fairly full account of Lee's campaigns would be a difficult undertaking; and so it is chiefly the beginnings of the war which obtain here their best presentation,—the times when Lee was making his first impressions upon the imaginations of lookers-on, which were to be deepened as the war proceeded through temporary victory to final disaster. Concerning Gettysburg, it is evidently the biographer's judgment that to Longstreet and Ewell belong the responsibility of the Confederate defeat, which is recognized as the turning-point when hope of a successful maintenance of the Confederate nation began to fade into doubt. The military criticisms of Union commanders and campaigns are such as would come from any impartial critic, and are fair and kind.

THE FAIRIES' FESTIVAL. By John Witt Randall. Edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Illustrated by Francis Gilbert Atwood. Boston: Joseph Knight Company.—Although born in 1813, the author of this poem is unknown to fame. Dr. Abbot tells us that in 1856 he published at his own expense a volume of his poems, with the title "Consolations of Solitude." The sale was meagre, and the remnant of a small edition was soon withdrawn for gratuitous distribution. It would be interesting to know how many readers of this volume were readers of that also. The writer of this notice congratulates himself that he was one of them, the gratuitous copy coming to him from Stanley Abbot, a brother of Dr. Abbot,—one of those for whom Harvard built her Memorial Hall,—when he was at Phillips Exeter Academy in 1859. "The Fairies' Festival" is well deserving of its tardy publication, and of the beautiful and sumptuous book in which it is enshrined. Mr. Atwood's illustrations are in perfect sympathy with the poem, and are very charming by that sign. The only shadow of regret that rests upon the poem is that it is not addressed to the intelligence of children, but to the maturer mind. It is very bright, and it is very beautiful, and it is very far from being orthodox. Its comment on the traditional theology is by no means flattering. Dr. Abbot informs us that it is part of a longer poem, and that the rest will some time be printed, and with it the "Consolations of Solitude," revised by the author. Those who love poetry for its own sake will find abundance of it here.

GREAT COMMANDERS: GENERAL HANCOCK. By Gen. Francis A. Walker. New York: D. Appleton & Co.—Gen. Walker's story of the career of a famous Union corps commander is full of personal affection for an officer with whom he was in intimate official relations in the Second Corps, and awakens in the reader the author's admiration for Hancock as a man, a soldier, and a patriot. The delineation of battles is spirited and vivid, bringing back to at least one combatant, in some of the momentous occurrences in which Hancock bore a leading part, the memories of the field in certain life-like ways which few recent narratives of battle have so stirred. With outspoken praise for the great company of lesser officers to whom the Army of the Potomac owes its fame quite as much as to the more renowned generals, there are also some brief but effective characterizations of faults, blunders, and malicious falsehoods of soldiers and historians, which are a confirmation of the judgment of some other students of the campaigns of the Army of the Potomac.

THE MANXMAN. By Hall Caine. New York: D. Appleton & Co.—It is not too much to call this a wonderfully strong novel,—strong in its study of different characters, its analysis of the opposing desires in a single human heart, which impel alternately upward and downward; and strong, too, in its plot, which culminates in a climax not unlike that of the minister's confession in "The Scarlet Letter." There are many elements making up this book, of which one would like to speak in detail. The character of Philip is one that deserves thoughtful study, so true is it, both in its strength and weakness, to the real humanity of which we are all a part. Peter Quilliam is a nobly conceived and developed creation, like none other that we know in fiction. Manx life is pictured with the best kind of realism, and the local coloring is distinctive and probably faithful. Taken in its completeness, this is a remarkable novel, and establishes the place of its writer as none of his other books have done, despite their power.

MINISTERS OF GRACE. By Eva Wilder McGlasson. New York: Harper & Brothers. $1.—There are actresses and actresses; and even one who seems flippant and impossible socially may be as true as steel and as good-hearted, if not better, than if she had been born in the purple. That is one thing that this novelette seems to say, and another is that intolerance and self-righteous pride are not the lightest of sins. Moreover, the book says these things very well, though the character of the old parson seems too strained and overdrawn to be quite natural. A little more restraint as to his eccentricities would have been more artistic, perhaps; but his point of view is well suggested. The gentle, reserved daughter who breaks his heart is a lovable creation.

CHRIS, THE MODEL-MAKER: A STORY OF NEW YORK. By William O. Stoddard. Illustrated by B. W. Clinedinst. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $1.50.—This boys' story is written in a way that would please Alice herself, as it has "plenty of conversation." The bright boy, the strong boy, the talented girl, the musical wash-woman, and the other characters talk a great deal; and, if they repeat themselves and are not especially brilliant, perhaps they are all the more natural. The characters are all attractive, with high motives, who conquer their distasteful surroundings without becoming either painfully moral or goody-goody.

IN THE DOZY HOURS, AND OTHER PAPERS. By Agnes Repplier. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.25.—Miss Repplier is the kitten's friend. She is also the book-reviewer's friend; and her papers on "Gifts," "Guests," "Sympathy," and the rest, show her the friend of many others. There is a charm about these papers that makes one long for a cloudy day and an open fire to read them in the most appropriate atmosphere. Yet at high noon the bright sunlight does not dispel their attractiveness. When the book is finished and laid aside, the reader feels that he has been talking with a friend.

Miscellaneous.

Leach, Shewell & Sanborn, in their "Students' Series of English Classics," have issued two new numbers,—Tennyson's "Elaine" and Goldsmith's "Traveller" and "Deserted Village." They are carefully edited with notes, introductions, biographical sketches, and suggestion for class-room study. (25 cents.)

Other English school-books just out are published by the American Book Company, New York, in the series of "Eclectic English Classics." The current numbers are "Woodstock"; "A Midsummer-Night's Dream"; "Silas Marner"; Macaulay's "Essay on Milton"; and Milton's "L'Allegro," "Il Penseroso," "Comus," and "Lycidas." The text in each case is supplemented by an introduction and foot-notes.

"Introduction to English Literature," by F. V. N. Painter. Leach, Shewell & Sanborn. This work aims to solve the problem of teaching English literature by bringing examples of the different periods before the pupil, in connection with the lessons on the history and development of style. The seven periods are illustrated by representative works from the greatest writers of the times, and suggestive references to the lesser writers are also given.

The Magazines.

The Quarterly Journal of Economics for January opens with an article from the celebrated Austrian economist, Dr. Böhm-Bawerk, in answer to Prof. J. B. Clark's criticisms on his theory of capital. Prof. Macvane of Harvard writes on "Some Neglected Duties of Economists as regards Public Opinion." Mr. Warde Fowler of the University of Oxford gives a detailed account, with topographical illustration, of the agricultural development of an English rural parish, the existence of which dates from before Domesday. Dr. J. H. Hollander of Johns Hopkins has a short, abstruse article on "Marginal Rent." Mr. William Smart of the University of Glasgow describes some of the industrial enterprises of that city; and W. B. Shaw writes his annual review of "Social and Economic Legislation in the United States." Among the notes is one on the need of more thorough provision for the effective redemption of bank-notes than has been made since the war. The usual Bibliography follows; and an appendix contains the text of the new income tax act, with notes showing the origin of its various provisions.

Napoleon, as he entered upon his Jacobin career, both in Corsica and France, is the topic of the January instalment of the Century Magazine; and Mr. Sloane starts off with the assertion that this period has been hitherto neither described nor understood. He gives with minuteness the history of this time immediately preceding the thrilling episode which brought the young officer to the public gaze. One of the most interesting articles is "Scenes in Canton," which portrays the features of criminal and social life, and brings before us many striking peculiarities of this unique people. Mr. Brooks continues his "Glimpses of Lincoln in War Time," with several fresh anecdotes which throw light upon the President's character. "A Lady of New York" is photographed by W. L. Metcalf; and the "Festivals in American Colleges for Women" is given, with the varieties which characterize them. Passing from the terrestrial, we have a sketch of "Maxime's Experiments in Aërial Navigation," which is full of faith in the future flying-machine. Mr. Maxime says, if half the time and money and talent were spent on this special invention that has been given to the balloon, "aërial navigation would soon be so perfected that flying-machines would be as common as torpedo-boats; and the whole system of modern warfare would be completely changed." In addition, we have other articles of interest, besides the usual departments.

DRIFTING.

BY MABELLE P. CLAPP.

A wide expanse of sky and sea,
A tiny open boat,—
As silently I float.

Unbroken stillness broods o'er all,
Even the gulls have flown,
With not the smallest sail in sight,
And I feel so alone.

I cannot bear the solitude,—
My heart is filled with doubt
When in the deep, far-reaching dome
The friendly stars shine out.

And now I feel no more alone
Upon the restless sea,
Those loving stars are keeping guard,
And watching over me.

How often on the sea of life
There comes a breathless calm!
Drifting alone 'neath solemn skies,
We feel a vague alarm.

But, when the silence and the dark
We can no longer bear,
God always sends some ray of light
To tell us of his care.

THE BOY WHO WENT TO DO-NOTHING LAND.

BY HELEN T. CLARK.

He "hated" to split kindlings, he "hated" to do errands, he "hated" to bring a pail of water, he "hated" to go to school, he "hated" to wash his face and brush his hair.

His mother was almost in despair; his grandmother said he would outgrow it; his Aunt Lydia thought that "a good spanking would take it out of him"; and his father, a dreamy minister, said mildly to his wife, when she implored him to interfere,— "Manage the child in your own way, my dear."

The boy was by no means vicious, only "constitutionally tired." His head always ached on "composition day"; and his back always pained him at house-cleaning time, when every little lift is welcome. He loved nothing better than to lie stretched out under a tree in summer or on a soft rug before the fire in winter. He was almost too indolent to come to his meals, and that is saying a good deal for a boy. He refused fresh shad, because he "hated" to pick out the bones, and declined cherry-pie, because it was "such a trouble" to take out the stones. The active sports of other children had no attraction for him; and he disliked reading, because it tired his hands to hold the book.

One lovely June morning his mother and his Aunt Lydia insisted that he should pick the strawberries for dinner. Tears and excuses were of no avail. If Master Maurice expected to eat, he must work. His mother was canning cherries, the "girl" was baking, his father was writing his sermon, and Aunt Lydia tied on a flapping straw hat and began to pick peas.

"Oh, dear!" groaned Maurice, after he had picked about half a pint: "how my back does ache! Why can't they grow on bushes like other berries? I wish I lived in a country where nobody ever had to do anything!"

"Oh, you do, do you?" said a tiny, squeaking voice close beside him. "You actually have mental energy enough to wish. I am surprised."

Maurice turned more quickly than he had ever done in his lazy life. A green-capped gnome was staring at him out of a cluster of strawberries.

"Did you ever read about 'the Do-nothing Kings'?" asked the gnome, swaying lightly on the slender stalk.

"N-n-no, sir," chattered Maurice, trembling as if with a chill, though the day was unusually warm.

"Do you suppose they had a good time? They didn't. The people whom they called their subjects hated and despised them, and their names have been handed down through history with the disgraceful title aforesaid."

Maurice hung his head, and slowly picked another berry.

"No doubt you have often heard this elevating jingle," continued the gnome:—

"I wish I was the President
Of these United States.
I'd eat molasses candy,
And swing upon the gates.

Now, wouldn't that be a dignified position for the chief magistrate of a mighty nation? Don't you suppose presidents have to do something, and emperors and kings and queens? It makes 'a pretty kettle of fish' in any country when the monarch leaves everything to his prime minister. To come down to common folks, how would you be fed, clothed, sheltered, and kept in repair if your parents didn't do anything for you? Don't you suppose your mother would enjoy reading the latest magazine or the daily paper many a time instead of darning your stockings or patching your jackets and trousers? (By the way, it is a mystery to me how you manage to wear them out, since you neither play nor work.) Your Aunt Lydia recently spent half a day in arranging the new carpet, curtains, and furniture in your room; and then you were so ungracious as to whine when she asked you to put away the hammer and tacks. I suppose you wonder how I know all these things, but gnomes have their own way of finding out."

Maurice hung his head still lower, and picked two more berries.

"Since you have expressed a wish to live in a country where nobody ever has to do anything, I think I can arrange for a short visit to such a place. We call it 'Do-nothing Land.' Just stretch yourself out flat on this grassy spot near the Seckel pear-tree, close your eyes, and fix your mind on vacancy, and we shall be there long before you could say 'Jack Robinson.'"

Maurice glanced at the house, but no one was in sight. He looked over toward the pea-vines, but Aunt Lydia's flapping hat presented its back to him. He set down his pail, and slowly followed the gnome's directions. In a few seconds he felt himself softly sinking through the earth, which seemed to part like waves of water. When he opened his eyes at the gnome's command, he was lying on a couch of the softest moss, directly under a well-laden cherry-tree. The sky was as blue above him as it had been in his own country, the air as balmy, the sun as bright; and the only noticeable feature was the entire absence of buildings, roads, fences, bridges, and tilled fields. Hosts of little people were lying on other beds of moss under other cherry-trees, and occasionally they opened their mouths to let ripe cherries drop into them. Their clothing appeared to be green leaves plastered to their bodies with a kind of clay.

Maurice looked around for the green-capped gnome. Instantly the brisk, sharp-tongued little fellow stood beside him.

"Ask all the questions you wish. You are curious to know how these people get a living, are you not? When the cherries have all dropped from one bough, they move themselves slowly along the ground until their mouths come directly under another well-laden bough. They are thus fed more simply even than the birds of the air. They are enabled to swallow the stones of these cherries without the slightest injury to their constitutions. Think what a terrible exertion it would be to contract the muscles of the arm sufficiently to take out the stones and throw them away!"

He looked piercingly at Maurice as he spoke.

("He knows all about the cherry-pie business," thought Maurice. "I can tell by the way he eyes me!") "What do the people eat when the cherry season is over?" he asked.

"They wait for early apples, plums, peaches, pears, and grapes to ripen. In winter they crawl into caves, and lie dormant till fruit time comes again. They are forbidden to stand, walk, or even sit, under pain of death. This country would have no right to exist longer, as a country, if a single one of its inhabitants ventured to do anything. Their clothing, you observe, has grown to them naturally, and requires no washing, ironing, or mending."

"Is this country on any of the maps?" asked Maurice, a little ashamed of showing his ignorance, yet anxious to learn more about this wonderful "Do-nothing Land."

"I shouldn't think you would know much about geography or any other study," was the tart reply. "No, it is not on any map. It was thought best to leave it out, lest too many children would want to come here on days when the lessons were hard. It is located near that vast domain, the Chinese empire. It had to be in one of the temperate zones, for obvious reasons. In the frigid the inhabitants would starve and freeze; in the torrid they would be obliged to fan themselves, to say nothing of keeping off fierce animals and venomous serpents. Moreover, tropical fruits are too large and heavy to drop comfortably into their mouths; and cocoanuts and pineapples would require effort to prepare them suitably."

"How are the people punished when they break the laws?" asked Maurice.

"A peculiar kind of electrical shock first strikes the culprits speechless and senseless, then gradually withers them up like autumn leaves. As you crawl from tree to tree, you will occasionally observe such withered law-breakers, whom you must avoid as you would a pestilence, inasmuch as the shock is communicable long afterward."

Maurice shuddered.

"Look out there!" cried the gnome, hastily. "I wouldn't do that kind of thing, you know. Too much muscular action about it. You'll be getting into trouble if you are not careful, and I feel responsible to your friends for your safety."

Maurice began to heartily wish himself at home. He would have given all the ripe cherries on the branches above his head for one glimpse of Aunt Lydia's straw hat flapping over the pea-vines, and even an order to bring wood for the baking would have been music to his ear.

"Right over there," continued the gnome, with a sweep of his arm, "lies another country. Cast your eyes in that direction (without lifting your head, however), and tell me what you think of it."

Maurice obeyed, and saw, to his amazement, flourishing cities and villages, with busy mills and shops, ripe fields, well-tended flocks, and throngs of cheerful, active men, women, and children, all carrying useful implements or hastening to take part in some occupation. Contentment shone on every face, hand grasped hand in hearty comradeship, pleasant voices gave greetings that bespoke thorough respect for self and others.

"That," said the gnome, "is the 'Country of Happy Industry.' Its customs, laws, and penalties, as you may well imagine, are the exact opposite of those here. Now, from all you have seen and heard, tell me honestly which you would prefer as a permanent residence."

"Oh, that one, that one!" cried Maurice. "Let that country be mine while I am away from home!"

"It is already yours, my boy, and has been all your life. Is not your very own land the 'Country of Happy Industry'? I am enabled to show you this vision by means of a peculiar trick, but it must soon fade. I fear you do not yet fully appreciate the advantages of living in such a land; and so, for your own good, I have arranged for you to spend some months here, where there is absolutely nothing to do."

"Oh, no, no!" Maurice almost shrieked. "I will do better. I will carry wood, and chop it, too. I will run all the errands, and pick all the berries—and—and!"

"Maurice! Maurice! Maurice! Wake up, child! You have been sleeping here in the sun till your face is as red as a winter beet. Get up and put cold water on your head, or you will have sun-stroke."

Maurice flung his arms around Aunt Lydia until the flapping hat was so squeezed out of shape that it might have been taken equally for a coal-hod or a wrecked market-basket.

"O Aunt Lydia, I've had such a dream! I don't believe I shall ever be lazy again as long as I live."

"Blessed be dreams, then!" said his aunt, looking ruefully at the hat, which nevermore would flap again; "but who would have dreamed that you had such strength in those good-for-nothing arms of yours!"

PITAPAT AND GOLDIE.

Pitapat was a gray cat, with a white forehead and black stripes, and white stockings on her feet, and big, big eyes that shone like stars.

Goldie was a canary, with bright golden feathers and long legs, and a sharp bill, and bright black eyes. When he wanted to see anything, he turned his head sideways. He came out of a dear little egg, in a long green cage at grandma's house. I often saw his mother feed him and his three little baby brothers and sisters. When he was old enough, grandma gave him to me. He sang beautifully.

Aunt gave me Pitapat. When she was a kitten, I put ribbons about her neck. Some were blue, and some were red. She would run after a ball. One day she went down cellar, and caught a mouse. I told her how wrong that was, but my papa said that cats would do such things as long as they were cats.

One day mamma took me to a china-store to buy a little pink bath-tub for Goldie, who loved to bathe, and a saucer for Pitapat to drink milk from. We stopped at the drug-store for cuttle-fish and a paper of seed for Goldie, and bought a little package of dried catnip for Pitapat. The things were all in mamma's shopping-bag, and she let me carry it. I could hardly wait until the door was opened, I was so anxious to get in; and I ran up to the play-room two steps at a time.

Generally, when I opened the door, Pitapat cried "Mew" and Goldie chirped a "How-do-you-do!" This time I heard not a sound.

The window was open; and outside, on the roof of the porch, sat Pitapat, with her back up* and her tail as big as a sausage. And—oh, alas! I shall never forget that moment!—there on the floor was Goldie's cage, upside down, the bottom out, and empty.

I gave a great cry. Mamma said: "Oh, dear! How dreadful!" And papa came in at that moment.

"Just as I thought," he said. "Pitapat has found Goldie too great a temptation to resist, and has eaten her, bones and all. But who took the cage down?"

"O papa," I said, "I left it on the bureau. I forgot, but the door was shut."

"The door is shut now, but the bottom is out," said papa. "Don't cry so. I'll get you another bird."

"It won't be Goldie," I said. "Oh, cruel Pitapat!"

"Mew!" said Pitapat. "Mew, mew, mew!"

She came in at the window, and rubbed her head against my dress; but I just hated her.

I caught up my little red-handled broom, and chased her out of the house and into the street.

"Stay there, you wicked thing!" I said. "You shall never come into my house again! You are a murderess! You killed my sweet, sweet Goldie, and ate her up!"

Oh, how I cried after that! I almost made myself sick. When dinner was ready, papa carried me down in his arms; but I could not eat anything. I kept thinking of Goldie, all munched up, and of Pitapat, that I used to love so and had driven away; and I did not feel like the same little girl,—oh, not at all!

After dinner we went into the library. Mother made me lie on the sofa, and covered me with an afghan, and played on the piano for me. Papa asked me if I wanted a little dog. But I said:—

will produce about 700 calories of energy. The same money spent in "No, please. I will never have a pet again."

And just as I said that the door-bell rang, and in came the girl.

"A lady to see you, ma'am," she said.

And in walked a stranger.

"I don't think you know me, Mrs. Brown," she said. "I live next door. To-day, just after you went out with your little girl, my big cat, Whiskers, jumped out of the window upon the porch, and went into yours, call him as I might. The next moment something fell; and Whiskers came flying out, with your gray cat after him. And I saw your canary fly out, too, and up into our tree. Whiskers must have tried to catch it. He is wild for birds. But your Pussy fought dreadfully with him. I was shocked. And all the while I heard the poor bird crying out up in the tree. And the wild birds kill canaries, you know. So I called in a lad out of the street, and asked him if he could catch the canary. And he said he thought so, for it could not fly far. And he has been up in the branches all this while. He has just caught it, and I do not think it is hurt a bit. I am so glad!"

Then in came the boy with Goldie in his hands,—my dear, pretty Goldie, alive and well, and mine again!

How mamma and papa thanked the lady! And what a lot of money papa gave the boy, though the lady had given him some before!

It was worth anything, papa said, to see his little daughter happy once more. Bridget ran for the cage; and we put Goldie in it, and gave him his seed and sugar and water and cuttle-fish.

"After all, Pitapat was innocent," said mamma.

"Oh, my poor Pitapat!" I cried.

And I ran to the door, and looked out. It was quite dark, but I heard a sad little cry somewhere; and there in the corner of the area I found my poor darling, cold and hungry, and took her in my arms.

"I never ought to have believed it of you, pet," I said. "It was wicked of me. Can you forgive me?"

Pitapat answered, "Mew!" and rubbed her nose against my hand.—New York Ledger.

LOST IN THE WHEAT.

It was a day in July. The thermometer ran high in the nineties, and the air was so oppressive that even the birds and insects seemed to have entirely disappeared.

It had been an unusually busy morning for Mrs. Holt. She had been up since three o'clock; for to-morrow the harvesting would begin, and there were great preparations going on, as in this prairie home it was the gala time of all the year, when the nearest neighbors came to help gather the beautiful grain that waved in the sunlight and covered a thousand acres or more of the surrounding country. Nothing but a sea of yellow in every direction!

Little six-year-old Clifford thought there never had been such a day since he could remember. Mamma was so busy she did not want him in the kitchen, and it was so hot out of doors that he could not play at all.

At last he ran to his mother, just as she was making her last tin of biscuit, and said:—

"Mamma, please put me to bed. I am so sleepy and tired. Rover is asleep; and Kitty and I will go, too."

"Run away, Clifford. I am too busy. If you are so sleepy, go upstairs and lie down in your cot; but you had better play until after dinner, and then take a nap with me."

Clifford did not like the idea of going upstairs alone, so he ran outdoors to play, as his mother had told him. But the shade was only in such a little place by the house, and he would just go over there by the wheat. It looked cooler there, as the grain waved in the breeze. So he trotted over the road to the edge of the grain; and, sure enough, it really was cooler. So he sat down in the shadow of the tops, that stood four feet high. As he sat there, his attention was attracted by some little red-birds that were flying back and forth into the wheat. Suddenly he remembered what his papa had told him the night before about these birds, who had built their nests all through the grain. And Clifford had felt so sorry for the baby birds that would be so cruelly killed by the big machine. All at once he thought: "I will go a little way in and find some nests, and I will put them in my hat and carry them out in the orchard. How glad the poor mamma birds will be when I save the little birdies' lives!"

Now, Clifford's mamma had often told him never to go away from the house alone; but he had forgotten all else now, in his wish to save the lives of the young birds that were in such peril. So into the forest of yellow glory he made his way. On and on he went, hunting for the nests. Finally, the poor little man was so tired of making his way and of searching in vain for the birds that, after an hour's tramp, he decided "to go home to his mamma." So he turned around and started back; but which way was back? He was so small that, in coming through, he had not broken a single stalk, but had slipped between them, and so had not left a trace behind.

He turned back, expecting, of course, to come right out in sight of mamma's kitchen door; and he wondered if dinner would be ready, and if mamma would be glad to see him now. So he made his way a little farther; and then he thought he would sit down and rest just a little while, and perhaps he would hear the dinner-horn blow. Then he would run on home.

When Mrs. Holt finished the biscuit, it was time to prepare the dinner. Once or twice the thought of Clifford's flushed face came to her; and she thought he must have gone upstairs after all, because it had been such a long time since she had seen anything of him. When noon came, a shrill blast of the long tin horn brought Mr. Holt and his two men home to their dinner. To Mr. Holt's inquiry, "Where is Clifford?" Mrs. Holt replied, "Asleep upstairs." His dinner was carefully put away for him, and the men returned to their work.

Late in the afternoon Mrs. Holt awoke with a start from the long nap she had taken on the dining-room sofa, where she had thrown herself for a little rest before going upstairs. Her first thought was of Clifford; and upstairs she flew, into the little room where his cot stood. He had not been there at all, nor in her room. Thoroughly alarmed, she went up into the garret, where he sometimes played; but all was silent and empty. The next instant the horn sent its call echoing over the prairie in blast after blast, recalling Mr. Holt in great haste. All was confusion now. What had become of Clifford?

The first thought was of the small creek that ran half a mile beyond the house, and its banks were searched in vain for a trace. They went along the road for miles in each direction; but nothing was to be seen except the golden-headed grain on either side, nodding their good-night to the setting sun. At length, as the great full moon was rising, they returned home, the father in hopeless despair, not knowing what was to be done next to find his child, whether alive or dead. Mrs. Holt was living over the morning in a perfect agony of remorse for the hasty words, and the thought that, perhaps, now there would be no Clifford ever to trouble again.

Some of the nearest neighbors had come by this time to join in the search. Just then a thought came to Mr. Holt of Rover; and, calling him, he said: "Where is Clifford? Go find Clifford!" This he repeated several times, until the dog began smelling on the ground.

It was some time before the track across the road was found; but, when it was, the dog went straight into the wheat and disappeared. Mr. Holt followed, the moon making it almost as light as day.

After going a little way, he stopped and called to Rover, thinking what nonsense to be wasting the time in this way. No doubt, Rover thought he was after birds; and, besides, he was breaking the wheat all down. And he had told Clifford never to go into the grain for that very reason. But Rover would not come back, but ran on as if he understood just what he was about. So he followed as rapidly as he could. All at once Rover came to a stand-still, wagging his tail gleefully over a blue sailor hat, in which was a nest of little birds with their mother. Mr. Holt was sure now that Rover knew best, and urged him on. And in a few minutes they came to a little curly-headed boy lying fast asleep, and his face all swollen with crying.

The next instant he was awake and telling papa he was so hungry, and he had found one nest of birds, and, when he tried to find his way home, he could not.

As his father held him in his arms and started for the long tramp back, two big tears fell on the curly head, as he thought of what would have happened if it had not been for Rover.

All summer long, way out in the prairie, was a large square of wheat that the machine never reaped; and in the midst was the happiest family of little red-birds, whose home was in a blue sailor hat.—Frances M. Concklin, in Canadian Baptist.

OATS' BEDS.

Cats are the most obstinately capricious in their fancies about their beds of any domestic creature, says a writer in the Spectator. They will follow a particular rug or shawl from room to room, if it be removed, in order to sleep on it, or insist on the use of one chair until they get their way, and then, for some reason, take a fancy to another. The cleanliest of all animals, anything newly washed or very fresh and bright strikes them as just the thing for a bed. A nicely aired newspaper lying on the floor or in a chair, or linen fresh from the wash, is almost irresistible. Out-door cats seek a warm as well as a tidy bed. The writer was once much surprised, when passing through a large ship-building yard, to see a cat fast asleep, lying, it seemed, on a muddy path. But the spot which the cat had selected for its couch was one at which a hot steam-pipe passed under the road; and the mud was there baked into a warm, dry cake, which made not only a clean, but an artificially heated sleeping-place. But the oddest taste in beds developed by a cat was that entertained by a very highly bred gray Angora, which was justly petted and admired by the family in which it lived. For some months it would only sleep in or upon a hat, if such could be found, ladies' hats being preferred. If it could discover one with the inside uppermost, it would lie inside of it. If not, such was its love for this form of couch, it would curl itself round the brim, and, with its long furry tail and pliant body, made a fine winter trimming to a summer hat. By some accident a drawer in which all the "summer" hats had been disposed for the winter was left open for some days, after which it was discovered that all the hats had been tried in turn, the cat having finally selected one adorned with white laburnum flowers, which never recovered from the "ironing" to which it had been subjected.—Watchman.

DIPHThERIA

Too many homes bear this fear-inspiring placard, denoting the prevalence of that most insidious and dreaded of all diseases—Diphtheria.

It is to-day a recognized fact among the best practitioners that nine out of ten cases formerly considered hopeless may be brought to a happy termination by the use of that great original raw food product, Bovinine.

This great blood-generating, life-maintaining, strength-developing, and flesh-producing product of lean, raw meat, contains the greatest amount of life-preserving qualities in the least possible bulk of any preparation known.

In cases of Diphtheria, Bovinine has special advantages. In this disease, as in others, the rapidity with which it is assimilated gives to it a preference over all other foods, passing, as it does, into the system immediately, without causing the digestive organs to perform any labor. And considering the fact that the lesions in the throat prevent the swallowing of solid food, it becomes an absolute necessity. In the worst cases, where even liquids cannot be taken by the mouth, Bovinine by being used as an injection. Above all, Bovinine is in itself a germicide, and in all such diseases as Diphtheria, caused by microbes, it not only performs its greatest mission of maintaining life, but antidotes the existing bacilli.

Bovinine has done wonders in thousands of cases of Diphtheria. When your doctor uses it you may cease to worry, and be assured of a speedy recovery. To neglect its use may mean years of remorse in the feeling that some loved one might still be with you if everything possible had been done. Bovinine is sold by all Druggists,

CHICAGO LETTER.

In all the holiday festivals held in Chicago none seemed quite so suggestive as that given by the Salvation Army. They had been at work for weeks collecting money, by nickels more often than by dollars. The solid work of preparing the dinner commenced some days earlier. The night before many of them sat up all night, watching the cooking. Beginning at 10.30 in the morning, they served, in relays, more than three thousand persons, without money and without price, to a good turkey dinner. Whoever witnessed the scene will never forget it,—the bare, big room; the crowd of forlorn, discouraged, "out-of-joint" people, eating or waiting their turn, contrasted with the smiling, cheery faces of those who served. There was no heavy mechanism in that service. The work went with a cheer, and it went with a song.

When a "Salvation lassie" put a heaped-up plate of food, hot and tempting, before a man, saying kindly, "Eat and be filled, and God bless you!" over many a dull eye and sodden face there flashed a human look, and many a rough and grimy hand furtively wiped a tear away.

One thing we are all learning, and that is that what the Salvationists call being "saved" is what all the world calls being saved; and it is the finest showing of purely practical Christianity that the world has seen for many a long day. It means to forsake the old sins,—not some day or gradually, but at once; to be clean and honest and loving; to go to work for yourself, and to lend a helping hand to others. There was health and hope and mental alertness in the faces of the "saved." "You must be very tired after you have worked so long," said one who looked on. The answer was chanted back, with a smile,—

"They shall run, and not be weary;
For they rest, for they rest on the Lord."

In one of the fair homes in Chicago—one that is not lent, but dedicated, to hospitality—Gen. Booth gave a familiar and friendly talk during his recent visit. All that he has done is explained by his own personality. Strong and wise, and fair-minded and sincere to the core, he has a pitiful nature, combined with the shrewdness of a man of business. All that is emotional, noisy, and peculiar has been very much in evidence all over the world. The beat of the drum and the tambourine, and the shrill cries, have sounded much like a party of mountebanks on the streets, or as if a sad little monkey was making merriment for his fellow-beings. In explanation of their methods he said:—

"When I had a clear call, and my darling wife had a clear call, we went from the clean country parishes to be evangelists and preach the gospel in the slums of London. For the first year or two I worked almost in vain: the people would not come and hear me. Then I tried preaching in the street, and they wouldn't listen to me. But I noticed, if a band of street musicians came along, they would gather around them, and follow them up and down. One day I said: 'If it's noise you want, noise you shall have! And perhaps you'll get your first notion of salvation through a song.'

"Well, from the very first, it was a success. They came and stood to listen to the tambourines; and, while they stood, I made them hear the salvation of our Lord and Saviour.

"As for the military part of it, that grew of itself. People like organization, and they like to belong to each other, and they like to wear a uniform. It is good because it identifies a man with his company, and it commits him to his work. As for the girls, you may wonder at those bonnets and jackets; but all round the world it is a protection. In the darkest slums, in every hell on earth, the 'Salvation lassies' are known by their dress; and they are known to be about the Lord's business."

If Gen. Booth has used devices of a showman, he has used them wisely, to catch the roving eye, and to startle and awaken the intelligence of the ignorant and miserable. The crude method is adapted to the crude material. It is not for the cultivated classes to criticise those who have taken the difficult "first steps" with the fallen. Out of the submerged tenth he finds a good percentage who can be "saved,"—saved in all senses; those who, by the impulse of religion and the steady-ing and controlling force of new friends and new allies, will work out their own salvation if they have a chance. Work is the first and last test of sincerity and worthiness in the Salvation Army. The general inspires you with faith in himself precisely because he has borne the same test. He worked long before he talked. He has learned the wisdom of a social science that is practical because he has studied people, not books about them. His example should be edifying to the talking philanthropist, who is now going out of fashion. So many men and women have felt a call to be a guiding star, to go before in the clean, cool heaven, and shine for those who trudge and toil. Those who do the work are apt to look up distrustfully these days, and cry, "Come down, O star, and hitch yourself to one of these loaded wagons; and let us see you sweat a little as well as shine!" Gen. Booth's schemes of help and colonization are put to his universal test: they work. Why doesn't the world put its shoulder to the wheel, and help him to do more of it? We have all heard of the "week of privation," by which the Salvationists raise money among themselves. Here is the experience, the organization, the working force, to put this philanthropy into practice.

"Why," we ask Gen. Booth, "shouldn't the whole Christian world have its 'week of privation,' live on bare necessities, eschew luxury, and give that surplus for this end?"

But he shakes his head,—this man who has had experience. "The churches don't like us very well."

"But the people?"

The Methodist bishop who stood by said: "It might be. It may be. General Booth, it is possible."

Hail that day!

After the death of Prof. Swing—the man who was expelled from the Presbyterian Church for heresy some twenty years ago, and the man of, perhaps, the widest personal popularity of any man in Chicago—his church was utterly bowed down. They felt that for them the sun had set, and there was no more day. They met, and solemnly passed a resolution to disband. Then they talked over old times, and the bonds of fellowship began to assert themselves. And they talked of the ideas for which their leader had stood; and they saw that these were living, and not dead. Presently they reconsidered the resolution, determined to keep together, and to look for—a man! In Evanston, the old suburb of Chicago, was Dr. Hillis,—a scholar, young, free, liberal. He had fought for the freedom of the theological schools, and the freedom of the preacher, in the recent Presbyterian Church trials. This man was called to fill the place of Prof. Swing. The bond of union of the Central Church is undenominational, of the sort that holds in Unitarian churches of the old school. Would the synod consent? The members were, part of them, Dr. Hillis's opponents in the recent controversies. But the synod did consent, and gave the young preacher their blessing, and sent him out consecrated and ordained to preach in an undenominational church! If this sort of thing goes on, other people besides Othello will find their "occupation gone."

Rev. W. W. Fenn has made a most promising beginning of a mission church in the "Hyde Park" region of Chicago. He has had a cordial welcome. But Mr. Fenn is carrying a double burden. If he could give to it all his time, this new field for a Unitarian church would blossom and bear fruit a hundred-fold. M. K. B.

CURIO CASE.

We can only give a rough idea of the shape of this Cabinet. Its decoration and detail are beyond any attempt of the engraver.

The entire Cabinet is finished in bronze lacquer and hand painted. The panels are by well-known artists, and are examples of the best Vernis-Martin work. The arched roof is similarly treated.

Every opening, panel, and joint is framed in brass. Brass bands, collars, and mouldings of the most elaborate character have been employed. The corner-posts are adorned with miniature busts of the Muses.

The Cabinet within is carpeted with silk tapestry of a rare floral pattern. Beneath the floor is an enclosed cabinet for private treasures. The back of the Cabinet is a French plate mirror with heavy plate glass shelves. The glass in the sides and front is double-curved.

It is one of the best Curio Cabinets we have ever offered.

TWO VICTORIES.

A hero came from battle, where the slain
Lay piled in bloody heaps upon the plain;
And all the people sang the hero's praise,
And crowned him with the victor's honored bays.

A simple child fought hard against a sin,
And won a mighty victory within:
No one rehearsed his praise or sung his fame,
But heaven's recording angel wrote his name.

—Selected.

MRS. LOIS STONE EDES.

The death of this venerable lady recalls associations which take back the memories of some of us for half a century. She has been an invalid for many years; but, such has been her willingness to forget her own weakness, and such the constant hospitality with which she welcomes every guest, that her pleasant home has been, I might say, a place of meeting for many who will look back to their conversations with her and remember the sweetness and resignation with which she bore trouble in every form. The death of her daughter, so well remembered by all who knew her as a daily inspiration in life, wherever she touched life, was, of course, a most serious blow in Mrs. Edes's life, and caused a loss which was always fresh to her. But she bore even this suffering with Christian resignation, looking forward faithfully to a meeting beyond this earth with the daughter so dear, with the children who were taken from her in early life, and with her husband.

It is nearly fifty years since he closed his short but useful ministry. Some of us remember with interest still the honesty of purpose and faithfulness of life with which this young man had engaged in the ministry of the gospel. He entered Harvard College as an undergraduate, but was prevented from taking his degree there. So strong, however, was his interest in the ministry that, after a short business experience, he resumed at the Divinity School his professional studies; and in the class of 1831 of that school he graduated. He was at once settled in Eastport, but the severity of the climate there compelled him to leave an attached parish; and he was afterward the minister of the new Unitarian church at Augusta, and died while he was in charge of that at Kennebunk. In any part of the State of Maine, to this hour, one meets those who were under lifelong obligations to this young man for the influence of the purity of his character and his earnest words. A small volume of his published sermons justified entirely the regard in which he was held by his associates. Among these were Mr. Bernard Whitman and Mr. Andrew Peabody. Mr. Whitman contributed to the Christian Examiner a memorial of him when he died, and to the end of Dr. Peabody's life he always spoke of him with gratitude and interest.

Of such lives, though we say that only the memorial is left, the influence can never be lost; and in the distinguished family which bears this honored name the group of these three will always hold a distinguished place in the memories of those who have known them.

These are Facts

Which Housekeepers Should Seriously Consider

IF you want the best food, you will be interested in the following facts, which show why "Royal" is the best baking powder, why it makes the best and most wholesome food, and why its use has become almost universal—its sale greater in this country than the sale of all other cream-of-tartar baking powders combined.

The Royal Baking Powder NEVER fails.

It is absolutely pure and wholesome.

It is combined from the most approved and healthful ingredients.

It makes the finest flavored, most tender, delicious, and wholesome food.

It has greater leavening strength than any other baking powder, and is therefore the cheapest.

It never loses its strength, but will keep fresh and full of leavening power until used.

It acts slowly in the dough, so that none of its strength is lost before the baking is completed.

It makes food that will keep sweet, moist, and fresh longer, or that may be eaten hot and fresh with impunity.

The reasons why the Royal Baking Powder is superior to all others in these respects are easily stated. One is because it is made from chemically pure materials; another is because it is made with greater care and accuracy than any other. It is always uniform in composition and leavening power. It has been the standard baking powder for twenty-five years. The founder has continuously conducted its business and is still at the head of its management. Thus all the knowledge and skill attained by over a quarter of a century's experience is available in its present preparation. The consumer is not experimented upon by changes of formula that are constantly being made in other powders in an effort to get a mixture that will not "cake" or lose its strength, or that follow changes of proprietorship or manufacturers. The Royal Baking Powder is always certain and equal in its work; a teaspoonful does the same perfect work to-day that it did yesterday, or last week or month, or last year.

While the last teaspoonful in a can of Royal is as good as the first, other powders lose their strength after being made a short time, and particularly after the can is opened.

No great efforts are made by other manufacturers to procure pure materials.

They use the ordinary cream of tartar of the market, which contains tartrate of lime, and is frequently mixed with alum, phosphates, or terra alba. The frequent tests by the Massachusetts and New York State Boards of Health show the great extent of this adulteration.

But experiments that cost many hundred thousand dollars were made by the Royal Baking Powder Company to secure for its use chemically pure ingredients, and to devise methods and formulas that would make a perfect baking powder.

In the manufacture of this powder there is used more than half of all the cream of tartar consumed in the United States for all purposes.

This is refined in the mammoth works of the Company (erected at a cost of over half a million dollars) by special, patented processes, by which means there are secured to the Royal Baking Powder exclusively ingredients absolutely free from tartrate of lime or other adulterant or inert matter.

While there is no secret as to the ingredients used—the methods of their preparation, their relative proportions, and the manipulations which are indispensable to this end are unknown to other manufacturers.

The exactness with which the active principle of each ingredient prior to mixing is ascertained by expert chemists; the actual prohibition enforced against the receipt into the works of an impure ingredient; the care with which the materials are dried, coated, and prepared before their combination, and the precision in packing the powder so that it shall be delivered to the consumer in the perfect condition in which it leaves the factory, are some of the details which go to make the perfect "Royal."

Are not the same means employed by other manufacturers? They are not. There have been a great many imitations of the Royal, but no equals. Pure materials are not employed, care is not taken in their preparation and combination, while in the great majority of baking powders alum is added to give them strength, while cheapening their cost.

No alum, phosphates, unwholesome or doubtful substances are used in the Royal, and it costs more to manufacture than any other brand.

The great popularity and general use of the Royal Baking Powder attest its superiority.

Success is generally deserved.

Scores of brands of baking powders have been placed upon the market since Royal was introduced. Most of these have died; none have achieved a general success, while the Royal has increased in popularity until its sale is general in every city, town, and hamlet in the country. Nothing but the superior quality of the Royal Baking Powder could have effected this.

Corroborative of the foregoing are the official tests. These have been made without prejudice, by entirely unbiased officers, have been elaborate, exhaustive, and should be conclusive. Prof. Tucker, of Albany, whose thorough and scientific work in examining articles of food for the State of New York is well known, says it is "a baking powder unequalled for purity, strength, and wholesomeness;" while the United States Government investigation, recently made under the authority of Congress, shows the Royal to be a cream-of-tartar baking powder superior to all others in purity, wholesomeness, and leavening strength.

The day has come for a rigid discrimination in the purchase of baking powders by the housekeeper.

Health and economy demand the use of that brand ascertained absolutely pure and wholesome and of greatest strength.

Those who have tested all thoroughly, use "Royal" only. If you are not using it, the facts here given should induce you to give it a trial.

No other Article of Human Food has ever received such emphatic commendation for purity, strength, and wholesomeness, from the most eminent authorities, as the Royal Baking Powder.

No other article used in the domestic kitchen of the household has so many enthusiastic friends among the housekeepers of America.

Editorial.

THE American Unitarian Association has received contributions since the beginning of the financial year from fewer churches than the year before, but in nearly every case the contributions have been increased, the total gain being 33 per cent. The arrangement by which the Association accepts, for the present, the half-time services of Mr. Batchelor as secretary, while it is the best that can be made under the circumstances, prevents active service in the field. The plans which have been discussed for the creation of a financial secretaryship cannot be immediately carried out on account of constitutional objections. The final decision may be postponed until the annual meeting in May. Meanwhile the work of the Association must go on. In 1894 fourteen churches contributed in January, eighteen in February, sixty-one in March, and one hundred and sixty-three in April, the last month of the financial year. Now, if all contributing churches could begin the work at once, it would be of great advantage to the Association, and to the many interests dependent upon it for care and support.

"The foundations of the old theology," said Prof. Swing, "are gone." But the foundations of religion are not disturbed or endangered by the fact. They are securely laid in human nature itself, and cannot be displaced any more than the foundations of Ararat. Theological systems are man-made. They represent the history of human thought about God and the universe. They change with the changing year and the evolution of thought and life. But the religious sentiment will continue to find new, abundant, and constant expression for itself, not only in the intellect, but in the emotional and ethical life of man.

If there are religious tramps who go from church to church, there are also the well-rooted steady-goers who may be found in the same church and in the same pew from Sunday to Sunday. The minister expects to find them there just as any other part of the church furniture. He thinks of them when he writes his sermon, and when he delivers it. Their attendance at church does not depend upon barometer, thermometer, or any other weather instrument. The question whether they shall go to church does not come up to them at all. They go to church as regularly on Sunday as they go to their business on Monday. Nothing but positive physical inability can keep them at home. They have not sampled all the churches in the city, they go not merely to "hear" this man or that: they are an integral part of the church itself, as much as the foundation on which it stands or the pillars that hold it up.

THERE are two kinds of optimism. There is one that is lazy, apathetic, negligent. It does not recognize its responsibility and duties. It assumes that there is a good time coming. But it does nothing to bring it in. It is as indifferent as the fatalism of the Mohammedan who folds his arms when the town is burning. But there is another optimism which is helpful because it is inspiring to effort as well as to faith. It believes in the final victory of goodness and righteousness; but it also believes that men are instruments for the fulfillment of these,—that man is a coworker with God. It believes that its work will accomplish something, and that there is a power of goodness, wisdom, and love in the universe that is shaping things toward the divinest ends. Such a hope strengthens the nerveless arm.

WE had no intention of arraigning the entire New York presbytery as opposed to Dr. Parkhurst in his work in New York, or as unwilling to give him the effect of their moral support; and a correspondent in another column places the responsibility for the postponement of the vote of confidence and commendation upon the shoulders of one man. Dr. Parkhurst has had too many assurances of the approval of his brethren in the ministry, irrespective of denomination, to be much disturbed by the action of this man, who took advantage of the rules of the presbytery to postpone action upon the resolution, which would undoubtedly have passed if it could have been put. Evidently, this Presbyterian clergyman wishes to emulate the reputation of a member of Congress who has earned for himself the name of the great American objector. But it is a singular position for a minister to take concerning Dr. Parkhurst and his work, and we are not surprised that our correspondent wishes to exonerate the presbytery for the responsibility of having such a man within its membership.

SOME of the railroads have declined to continue a practice long customary of giving to ministers orders for reduced rates, and some have announced their intention of terminating these arrangements by the first of April. Some of the religious papers have commented unfavorably upon this action; but we see no reason why railroad managers, any more than any other class of business men, should be expected to make discriminations in favor of ministers. The telegraph companies charge the full rate; and, as a general thing, the butcher, the baker, and the candlestick-maker ask the full price. Such favors to ministers are a part of the old donation system, in which ministers were paid about half of what they ought to receive and the rest was made up by donation parties. When they are properly paid by their parishes, they do not need to accept compassionate doles from the community. But, in the matter of receiving favors from railroads, ministers have received much less from these corporations than have newspaper men, legislators, and politicians. Ministers have regularly paid half-fare, while the others have ridden on free passes. The dole to the minister has been in the nature of charity: the free pass to the legislator and the newspaper man has often been in the nature of a bribe. When advertising is paid for by transportation, it is fair and legitimate business; but, when editorial columns are retained in exchange for such privileges, it means a venal journalism.

IT is gratifying to know that the United States government is planning to extend its educational work among the Indians. There is every reason to believe that such extension is in the interest of the Indian as well as of the government. The broad and deep lines in which the government conceives this work and is already doing it may be seen by the report of Dr. W. N. Hailmann, the Superintendent of Indian Schools. Dr. Hailmann represents advanced methods in education. At last it seems as if there were good ground for believing that the administration of Indian schools and agencies will be taken out of politics. Dr. Hailmann cordially reports in favor of the civil service law in relation to Indian schools. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs is equally earnest in support of this provision; and the address of the Secretary of the Interior before the Board of Indian Commissioners, quoted elsewhere in our editorial columns, shows that the highest authority in the service is thoroughly in earnest in this matter.

THE question may be asked, What is the relation of the government to moral and religious education in Indian schools? The best answer is to quote a paragraph from Dr. Hailmann's report:—

The moral and religious training in Indian education, as in all other education, is of paramount importance. It gives direction and permanence to whatever else may be done in the educational work. Unfortunately, in established religions the religious spirit has been so overlaid with matters of creed and ritual that it has become extremely difficult to give religious instruction and training in public institutions without danger of offence to some denomination that may consider its interests neglected or its doctrines impugned. Nevertheless, it seems that all the various denominations and sects are steadily reaching an agreement that schools may—without injury to any one of these sects and denominations, and, indeed, with profit to them all—lead the children through instruction and training to the love of God and man, and that this may be done effectively without touching upon any of the doctrinal points that separate religious people into competing groups. It is evident that in these matters the Indian schools cannot lead, but must of necessity follow public opinion and professional practice established in the public-school systems of the land. It is, therefore, earnestly recommended that superintendents and teachers place themselves in sympathetic relations with the religious tendency of the locality in which they labor, that, through example, instruction, and simple religious practices in the schools, they cultivate in the children reverence and good will. Prayer, if prayer is in their hearts; the religious song; and the simple teachings of the Bible,—afford abundant material for this. Throughout, however,—in prayer, song, or Bible-reading,—everything should be avoided, in substance and form, that has in any way a proselyting tendency.

PARISH REVENUES.

The revenue of a free government depends on the self-taxation of the whole body of the people. Their willingness to impose such taxation, directly or through their representatives, must arise from patriotic confidence that the money gathered into the public treasury will be used for their benefit. Nobody grudges a dollar when it is likely to bring a return that is worth more than the dollar. The citizens of each municipality take pleasure and pride in generous outlays for public buildings, schools, streets, parks, sewers, police and fire departments, knowing that all these are made possible by their own contributions, and that every judicious expenditure adds to the value of all property and to the security, convenience, and comfort of life. If any inhabitant is suspected of hiding his taxables from the assessors, he exposes himself to a certain amount of infamy. At the basis of the assessment there is a principle of justice, at least in theory; for the law aims to lay those sacred public burdens on the shoulders of all who share the resultant advantages, and who are at the same time able to pay something without risk of becoming a public burden themselves.

A church is like a small free State. It rests on the voluntary principle, and it requires a regular and dependable revenue. It cannot, indeed, enforce collections; it cannot seize or distrain property. But this disability ought to be more than made good by its deeper and stronger hold on the hearts of its members. It is a poor kind of church that cannot justify its claim upon their higher sentiments,—their loving loyalty, reverence, and gratitude. As a matter of plain justice, the rule which applies to civil assessments should apply also to voluntary contributions for the support of religious institutions,—"from every one according to his several ability."

The Hebrew law of tithes has always laid hold of the Christian conscience and imagination, because it suggested the devotion of a fixed portion of every one's income. The Jewish custom was not peculiar. From Smith's Dictionary of the Bible one may learn that "numerous instances are to be found of the practice of heathen nations—Greeks, Romans, Carthaginians, Arabians—of applying tenths derived from property in general, from spoil, from confiscated goods, or from commercial profits, to sacred and quasi-sacred and also to fiscal purposes; namely, as consecrated to a deity, presented as a reward to a successful general, set apart as a tribute to a sovereign, or as a permanent source of revenue." The fact worth noting is that the tax for the altar was paid as promptly as the tax for the throne. But in those lands and times religion was a State institution, and the priests were public officers as truly as the kings. In America, at least, we have changed all that; and, if religious institutions are to exist at all, their financial support must be provided for by those who believe in them. This permanent divorce of Church and State is fortunate for both, and no love is lost by their separation. They dwell together amicably in the same territory.

The methods of providing for parish revenue are various; and there is doubtless a good, a better, and a best. We do not here discuss the relative merits of pew-ownership, pew rentals, and free seats with a treasury filled by subscriptions and offerings. Something depends on traditions and social tendencies. Any method which is well worked is doubtless better than any other which is unravelled out by careless handing. Three conditions may be considered as essential:—

1. There should be such vital interest in religion for its own blessed sake as will make the people willing and glad to provide for its public expression,—not as a charity nor as a luxury, but as a leading necessity of life. To make such provision must be an accepted part of religion itself, so that no obligations will be met more cheerfully, promptly, and regularly. The most successful appeals are not those in which money is most talked about, but those which inspire us with love for a cause. Henry Ward Beecher once said that, if he wished to raise a large sum from Plymouth Church for any worthy object, he should preach and pray to inspire his people with love for God and man; and then the money would come of itself. We believe the same holds true of the stated revenue of a church. Given clear minds and warm hearts; given a church whose services are worth supporting, and whose usefulness to the community is seen and known of all men,—and the people will realize that they cannot afford to let it languish for want of means. Open hearts will make open hands; and there will be a minimum of dunning or drumming, and a maximum of that common feeling which makes of many members one living body. "Good will" is the main item of church capital.

2. The rule already mentioned as underlying the ancient law of tithes should be accepted by the whole body of religious people; namely, that contributions should be measured by ability. We should do voluntarily and systematically for the Church just what the law requires us to do for the State. We may quote with approval from an unknown writer, who vouches for the following plan as a success: "Each member of the church presents the trustees with a statement of the cash value of his property, after deducting all debts. After obtaining subscriptions from all others not belonging to the church who yet are willing to assist in maintaining it, the trustees assess the balance of the expenses for the year upon the church members, according to the valuation reported by each. On this plan there can be no deficiency. In its working it is found that some, whose taxes would be very small, voluntarily pledge themselves to give larger sums."

3. The finances of the church should be organized as thoroughly as those of a manufacturing company, and its business should be conducted on business principles. The financial committee and the treasurer should be selected with reference to fitness. They should be of good report, wide-awake, tactful, and competent; they should make a complete list of possible contributors, with frequent revisions; they should keep in touch or in friendly relations with the whole constituency, without making their own functions obtrusive. The happiness of a household depends largely on the administration of affairs in the kitchen; but the rattle of utensils, the sputter of cookery, and the details of larder and market are kept at a certain remove from dining-room and parlor. And we have known some religious societies whose temporalities were managed with such quiet efficiency that the creak of machinery was hardly heard. But quietness does not mean secrecy or concealment; and, if the officials of Church or State act as if the receipts and expenditures must be covered up, there will be no end of open or smothered suspicion. People like to know what use is made of their own money by their own stewards.

4. Promptness and regularity in the payment of dues—inward and outward—will go far to promote the good name and usefulness of the religious society. Here is a matter in which "through slackness of hands the house falleth in." Hundreds of churches have collapsed for want of due and timely attention to their own affairs. Often it is the fault of slovenly officials, often it is a low standard of duty among the members; often it is a blind superstition, which assumes that, because the church is a divine institution, it will somehow be upheld without human hands. "I bless the Lord that I have been a member of a church for twenty-five years, and it hasn't cost me twenty-five cents," said a noisy prayer-meeting brother. In nearly every congregation are some who think of the church as a piece of sacred clock-work, which is endowed with perpetual motion, and are quite unaware that it is kept in motion by the beating of faithful hearts and the co-operation of many hands. The same irrational theory, probably, accounts for the foolish and wicked readiness of religious societies to run in debt and take the chances. There are hundreds of small and poor societies that do not hesitate to incur obligations without visible or probable means of payment, and some of them take it as a grievance that somebody does not come forward and pay their debts. It should be said that, in common honor and honesty, a church, like a private individual, should adopt a scale of expenditure based on a known and available income. To hold religious meetings from house to house, to meet in a small hired hall, or to build a cheap house of worship; to engage a minister for one-half or one-fourth of the time; and to depend on lay services and printed sermons, when no other arrangement can be afforded,—these measures are honorable, and may be edifying. But to begin with a pretentious building and a mortgage, and to go on with a pastor whose promised salary is continually to run behind, is to poison the spiritual fountains with an immorality of which worldlings would be ashamed.

We close with a passage from "Parish Problems": "If it were only felt that a well-filled treasury is as indispensable to the true prosperity of the church as purity of doctrine,—that money is as important as prayer; and, if what men consecrate to the cause were more nearly proportioned to what they expend for their own pleasure,—wherever else there might be a falling-off, there certainly would be none here. A church debt would be out of the question. Instead of scrimping here and there and everywhere, we should find broad views and generous expenditures."

OPEN DOORS.

Baptists and Unitarians both belong to the great Congregational body, and illustrate the principles of independency fully and consistently. One advantage which each of these organizations possesses is that they have no established creed or articles of faith to which subscription is required. It is an easy thing, therefore, to move from one of these denominations to the other. As a general thing, the transitions which take place are nearly all from the Baptist to the Unitarian fold. Much less frequently a Unitarian becomes a Baptist. Recently, however, an example is given of a movement in both directions; and that, too, by the same individual.

A Baptist minister became dissatisfied with the Baptist Church, and decided to become a Unitarian. He therefore changed his connection, and soon after was elected pastor of the Unitarian church in the same place. After a pastorate of two years he has now resigned his connection with the Unitarian and gone back to the Baptist fold.

Why this minister left the Baptists for the Unitarians, and why he afterward left the Unitarians for the Baptists, are personal questions which are less interesting than the larger fact that the doorways of communication were kept open in both denominations. When he left the Baptist Church, he was not excommunicated or disowned; and, when he became a Unitarian, he did not have to abjure former beliefs nor subscribe to formal standards. Now that he has withdrawn from Unitarianism and returned to the Baptist fold, he is not excommunicated by the Unitarians; nor has he been required to pass an examination before a council or to submit his opinions to any ecclesiastical synod or hierarchy. It was natural that some explanation of his return should be made, and this was done at a meeting of the Baptist Ministerial Association; but he was subject to no catechising concerning his doctrinal opinions. Judging from the reports of his addresses which we have received, it would seem that he left the Baptist denomination because it was not free enough, and because he was not in harmony with it on theological points, and that he returned to it because Unitarianism was too cold to satisfy him. No doubt church affiliations are often simply a matter of spiritual temperature, but there are also doctrinal and dogmatic barriers which frequently have to be overcome. The change of a minister from one fold to another is less important than the fact that the doors are open, and that they may swing on their hinges either way.

This very freedom of ingress and egress, however, shows how much responsibility is laid upon the individual who proposes to change his denominational relations, and how important it is that he shall be fully persuaded in his own mind. The minister referred to crossed the Unitarian threshold, but did not pass into its interior life. He began immediately to preach before his own convictions had been settled. He was in a state of mind to need guidance rather than to guide, and it would have been wiser for him to have spent a year or two at Meadville or at the Harvard Divinity School until he ascertained where he himself stood.

If he found the Unitarians too cold, and he himself was warm with the true life, might not that be a reason for staying among them? We have known an instance in which a minister, who came from the so-called evangelical ranks, and who felt the Unitarian climate a little frosty in comparison, felt all the more deeply that here should be his opportunity to serve as "a burning and a shining light."

There are many ministers who are coming into Unitarianism from other denominations. We rejoice to welcome them, not more for what they may get than for what they may bring. Some of them have passed to the very centre of Unitarianism as a religious philosophy and a religious experience before leaving their own fold; and their churches to which they have ministered have had the advantage, which in some cases has been very great, of this ripening and growing process. Such ministers, who bring the glowing heat of their convictions and the joy of their freedom, are a great gain to Unitarianism, and give it fresh power and impulse; but, when a minister leaves another denomination and, without stopping to make sure of his own mental bearings, comes into Unitarianism simply for the sake of getting the advantage of its freedom, and without knowing what he is going to do with it, he is not in a position to lead and inspire. He should be ranked with novitiates and catechumens, as not ready for full fellowship. Full fellowship in the Unitarian body is not a matter of initiation or of ritual degrees. The only way one can obtain it is by being in full sympathy with the life, spirit, purpose, aims, and ideals of Unitarianism. This is nothing that can be conferred. It must be a personal experience; but, until one has entered it, whether inside the Unitarian organization or outside of it, he would better refrain from becoming a teacher of a faith which he has not fully possessed, because it has not fully possessed him.

PROGRESS IN INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Though the hands of the dial sometimes seem to indicate that the wheels of Indian affairs are moving slowly, yet they are never quite still; and the meeting held in Washington last week shows that they may keep better time in future. The annual conference between the secretaries of the various missionary societies of the country and the Board of Indian Commissioners brought together many friends of the Indian, who discussed various matters relating to their welfare for the space of eight hours, the speakers ranging all the way from the modest laywoman up to the Secretary of the Interior, who made an interesting and broad-minded address.

At the time of the Mohonk Conference it was stated that the coming in of President Harrison caused a complete revolution in the agency system. Very few agents—only two or three—were left undisturbed. On the accession of President Cleveland there was a reversal of the whirligig, and again but two or three agents retained their places. If an honest confession be truly good for the soul, then the Secretary of the Interior did his some good. He said:—

"During the first six months of service—I must admit the charge—we made changes too fast: we went too rapidly. But we had all sorts of charges pouring into the department and into the Indian Bureau against agents,—charges that seemed to be credible. And we yielded to them, and very probably made removals that should not have been made; for we have found that we cannot have good agents without having charges brought against them."

"It is the purpose of the administration to take the very best men we can find, without any special investigation as to what have been their past affiliations so far as political parties are concerned, as we expect to tell them, when they get there, if they make any proffer of political convictions, we will try to get other men to take their places."

"We have also recommended an increase of pay for Indian agents. I do not believe that there is any work in connection with the service that is so important—I speak advisedly—as to place on a reservation a man as agent who is capable, faithful, and who will stay there. . . . That is the secret of proficient work upon the reservation."

Those are the sentiments that suit the friends of the Indian. If they can be as bravely carried out as they were frankly outspoken, the reservation will be wisely ruled till it gradually disappears with the incoming civilization.

Other points considered were the value of reservation day-schools, and the importance of bringing children as fast as possible into the schools of the States and Territories where they may chance to live. Minnesota is about to try a promising experiment looking to this. A boarding-house is to be erected, where, under proper supervision, Indian youth may find a home. They are then to attend the public schools of the place, paying the same tuition that any non-resident would have to pay. This method might be adopted in various States, to the mutual benefit of the schools and of the pupils, both red and white.

The reports from missionary bodies were, on the whole, favorable. The orthodox Congregationalists showed that their schools had perhaps suffered, but the missionary zeal and success had manifestly increased since the thousands of dollars of government money had been relinquished.

All missionary bodies were exhorted to turn their energies toward civilizing and Christianizing the Indians, since the government is willing to look after secular education.

One of the greatest helps toward the civilization of these still barbaric races, and the creation of an attractive home life, is the employment everywhere of field matrons. A resolution was adopted urging Congress to appropriate more money for this purpose.

Speeches by Senator Dawes and Col. Kidd, commissioners to the Indian Territory, reiterated the story of the disgraceful condition of things there, where, in a territory destined by treaty for the sole use of Indians, there are five white persons to every Indian; where sixty thousand white children are without schools, and lawlessness and immorality make life hideous. The only remedy for this state of things seems to be for the United States, in behalf of the whole country as well as of the inhabitants of this demoralized section, to make it a Territory subject to United States laws. The belief of those whose judgment is to be trusted is that the old treaties, which have been abrogated by non-observance on both sides for so many years, are no longer valid. If this be true, there is nothing in the way of a speedy adjustment of affairs in the Indian Territory, were the government in earnest. There is sure to be a strong opposition by those whose pecuniary interests are involved, and who are likely to veil this fact under a pseudo-regard for the sacredness of treaties. This battle for law, order, decency, and right in the Indian Territory will be one of the last battles needed. With a thorough system of education, with competent and non-partisan agents, and with administrative officers in sympathy with the long-persecuted or neglected race, the Indian problem may well be considered nearing the longed for solution.

Musings.

In a recent issue of a Boston daily paper a portrait in a public hall—which, we may remark, was not a rogues' gallery—was identified as that of S. J. Barrows, who was described as "the editor of the Congregationalist." Some time ago a cut of the same individual in a Boston paper was published, by mistake, as the president of the Amesbury Board of Trade, though the mistake was corrected in time to relieve that gentleman of any serious consequences, such as receiving invitations to preach on Sunday or getting a heavy bill for laying his sidewalk. The mistake now made by the reporter, in conferring upon the writer the editorship of the Congregationalist, was not a malicious one; but it might create needless alarm in the Congregational House, the American Board, and among the readers of that paper. It is true that we have sometimes had to do work for the Congregationalist which it did not do itself. We have had to instruct our orthodox brethren on various points of theology and policy; we have had to plead in behalf of the fathers and grandfathers of the heathen; we have had to deliver charges to foreign missionaries, and occasionally to varnish the American Board,—all of which might have been better done by our contemporary. But we never thought of charging anything for these services; and, if the Congregationalist should send us a five-thousand-dollar check for salary, it might embarrass us in accepting it more than it would embarrass our contemporary in paying it. But nowadays that paper is doing its own work so thoroughly and so well that there is but little opportunity for us any longer to aid in that direction. It has faced to the front, and is marching forward with a joyful, elastic step; and, though its editor is about to conduct a party to the old Jerusalem in a few weeks, he is conducting his readers more surely toward the new Jerusalem, which is a yet more important destination. It requires some personal courage to be the editor of the Congregationalist. The office of the paper is in the Congregational Building; and we happen to know, from personal investigation, that the library in that building is stocked with sermons, in addition to much other valuable material, which are so sulphurous that the slightest friction might involve the whole establishment in a vast theological conflagration. But the Unitarian Building is only a block away; and Unitarianism has some credit, perhaps too much, for being a fire-extinguisher.

THE papers report that three men have been arrested in Hamburg for speaking disrespectfully of the new musical composition of the German emperor. These men ought to have known that a musical composition by an emperor must be a royal production, and that to pass any criticism upon it is a case of musical high treason. The emperor, it must be recognized, has certain advantages as a musical author and publisher which Beethoven, Schubert, Wagner, and other uncrowned composers did not have. The emperor has an army of a million or two men behind him. He has an organized police system all through the empire. With such forces at hand, any musical composition he achieves is bound to be a success. It does not matter what the character of the composition may be. It might give Bach a fit of sickness, make Mozart smile and Beethoven mad; but, if it is an imperial composition, it must secure the veneration and admiration of several millions of subjects, whether they know anything about music or not. We have not heard the emperor's composition. It may be very good, or it may be one of those productions which are best rendered at a deaf and dumb asylum. We have heard it said that it was a good piece of music; and, judging from the fate of these Hamburg critics, it is dangerous to say anything else. But, whether good or bad, we cannot help recognizing the undoubted advantages which an emperor has who goes into music business. With a few Krupp guns and a regiment of Uhlans, the emperor could take a whole opera-house by storm. Let a few musical critics be court-martialed and hanged, and it is quite possible that the emperor might do a greater service for musical art than he is aware of. Gessler, if there ever were such a man, hung up his hat for public admiration: the Emperor William hangs up his song. He must be careful lest some one shoot an arrow through it. However, we hope the emperor will go on composing, so long as his music is not too martial. We should be sorry to have the imperial troubadour hang up his harp on a willow-tree, and go off to the wars again.

Brevities.

The Tuskegee Negro Conference meets at Tuskegee, Ala., under the auspices of the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute, Wednesday, February 20. All of the States in the "Black Belt" of the South will be represented.

We publish this week the second of two papers delivered before the Philadelphia Women's Alliance on "Methods of Social Reform." Mrs. Klingelsmith, like the lady who preceded her, calls attention to moral phases of this conflict which are often overlooked in economic discussions.

The centennial celebration of the building of the First Parish meeting-house at Westford, Mass., which was held last November, is commemorated in a pamphlet containing the able historical address of Rev. John C. Kimball, and abstracts of the other addresses and of the letters received on the occasion. A good picture of the church faces the title-page.

The many friends of Prof. J. Estlin Carpenter in this country will be thankful to hear that on his journey from Liverpool to Oxford he and his wife escaped with a few bruises from a terrible railroad accident, in which thirteen people were killed and nearly a hundred and fifty wounded. The escape was a miraculous one, but the shock to the nerves was very great.

Rev. Dr. George Dana Boardman, in an article in the Independent on "The Parliament of Religions," says: "But it is said that some of these 'pagans' did not fairly represent pagan faiths. What is our own habit? When we put forward our representatives of Christianity, do we not select the choice spirits, or do we choose from the 'slums'? Why not be as fair to others as to ourselves?"

The personality and influence of Dr. Grindall Reynolds are inevitably associated with the Unitarian Building in this city, and it is fitting that his portrait should honor its walls. The committee who have had the matter in charge announce that the portrait is now finished, and will be presented at the Unitarian Building, 25 Beacon Street, on Tuesday, January 29. The exercises will be held at Channing Hall at 3 P.M. The public are invited.

The letter which we publish in our "Religious Intelligence," under the head of "Toledo, Ohio," from the Methodist church to the Unitarian, is full of the spirit of Christian courtesy and kindness, and in strange contrast to the spirit which closed the Saratoga Methodist church to the Unitarian body. We believe the spirit of love is sure to triumph in the long run, and such friendly relations as this letter exhibits will do much to help it on.

Prof. Briggs of Union Theological Seminary, New York, recently lectured in St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church at Newark, N.J. Dr. Briggs received a warm welcome, and the Newark Advertiser says: "The large audience which gathered in that church to hear Dr. Briggs last night is a demonstration of a spirit of liberality and tolerance that should prove instructive to the denomination which has practically rejected the foremost scholar in the Presbyterian Church in the United States."

The Christian Advocate has discovered that "running a church is a good deal like running a coal fire. You must keep the coals together, shake out the ashes occasionally, and feed it at every opportunity. The preacher who depends wholly on keeping the coals together will not have a fire long, neither will the preacher who is always shaking out the ashes; while the preacher who is always adding new fuel without using the shaker will soon have his church so full of clinkers that he will have to dump the grate and start over again."

A Roman decree has just been issued, declaring that Catholics cannot become members of the Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias, or Sons of Temperance. The Republic says: "The publication of the decree was something of a surprise. Hereabouts there are not many Catholics affiliated with the three organizations mentioned, but the situation is said to be otherwise in other sections of the country. The decree is very explicit, however; and no Catholic who joins these societies or retains his affiliation with them will be considered entitled to the rights and privileges of the Church."

The American Hebrew paid this tribute to Dr. Holmes: "Profoundly religious as Holmes was, it was not so much any theoretical doctrinal difficulties that stirred his feeling against certain exaggerated, gloomy phases of religious life in New England as it was his buoyant joyousness which kept him ever youthful in spirit throughout his life, even to the last. He was of all men, perhaps, the most thoroughly tolerant. However much he valued his own opinions and convictions,—and he was too little ad-died to cant to hold them cheap,—he had ever an eye ready to see the good in views other than his own."

Archbishop Ryan, in a recent address, said: "I do not believe that any enlightened members of any Protestant denomination maintain that the members of other denominations or the members of the Catholic Church shall be excluded from salvation simply because they belong to such organizations. I am quite certain that the Catholic Church does not exclude Jews, Gentiles, and Protestants from salvation. She leaves such judgment to Almighty God, who alone knows each individual soul, and can alone judge of its merits or demerits. This is but one of the many misunderstandings of Catholic doctrine. What we want, above all things, is a more thorough knowledge of one another and of our real principles; and this reproach of our indifferences as a cause of agnosticism must lose much of its force."

The old Puritans trusted in God and kept their powder dry. Their military and religious fervor were easily combined. Rev. John C. Kimball, in his interesting sermon at the Westford First Parish Centennial, said: "There was no fire in the building except the few live coals brought in footstoves from the altar of a neighbor's kitchen, and the very ample kind set forth in its doctrines; and, as this doctrinal kind was not supposed to be inflammable to gunpowder, and as lightning—its only other danger—was not what the Lord would be likely to send down on his own abode, the place was used not only as a magazine of truth, but as a safe storehouse also for the town's cartridges and flints." In the Dorchester meeting-house, more than a century earlier, this experiment nearly ended in blowing up the meeting-house. But, dangerous as this custom was, it was, perhaps, not as dangerous as the storage of spirituous liquors in the church cellar which was in vogue in some other places.

LONG PASTORATES.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

Your report of Mr. Chadwick's thirtieth anniversary sermon, published in your issue of December 27, quotes Mr. Chadwick as claiming that only five members of the Unitarian clergy had been settled in one parish longer than he had served in Brooklyn; and the five referred to are then mentioned by name. Evidently, Mr. Chadwick has unintentionally overlooked the pastorate of Rev. George M. Bartol of Lancaster, Mass., which began Aug. 4, 1847, and which, therefore, exceeds the term of service of two of those mentioned by Mr. Chadwick.

Indeed, the First Church of Lancaster, Mass., shows a very remarkable record of long pastorates. From May, 1705, down to the present day, it has had only five pastors, namely; Rev. John Prentice, 1705-1748; Rev. Timothy Harrington, 1748-1795; Rev. Nathaniel Thayer, 1793-1840 (two years as associate pastor with Mr. Harrington); Rev. Edmund H. Sears, 1840-1847; and Rev. Mr. Bartol since 1847. Can any other church make a similar showing for the past one hundred and ninety years?

DR. PARKHURST AND THE NEW YORK PRESBYTERY.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

In one of your "Editorial Notes" in the issue of January 10 is a reflection which seems to me very unjust. You refer to the action of the presbytery of New York in postponing for one month action on the proposed commendation of Dr. Parkhurst for his noble work. You say there, "The true inwardness of the matter is well expressed by the Outlook"; but you leave readers utterly in the dark about the real outwardness of it. The plain fact was that the proposed action was blocked for that meeting by the objection of one man. So far as appears, if every other member present had been an ardent admirer and warm personal friend of Dr. Parkhurst, the action taken must have been just what it actually was. The Outlook, which thought it proper to assign the motive for the action, did not venture to justify its imputation by pointing to any different course the majority could have taken. The Independent, which is one of the representatives of the conservative element in the Presbyterian Church, and a pronounced opponent of Prof. Briggs, scored this Mr. Mullally who interposed the objection in the severest terms. The imputation of motive in the face of such an utterance ought to be supported by some shade of proof.

But, on the other hand, the improbability of such a motive shared by other members of the presbytery as explaining the action taken is shown by another consideration. Though the conservatives of that body may be narrow and bigoted, it has not yet been shown that they are fools. However bitter the feeling of these men might be against Dr. Parkhurst, they would hardly venture, unless they were fools, to commit themselves to a course which they must see would chiefly discredit themselves and their cause. However bitter might be the feeling of a company of men against a railroad manager, they would hardly care to express their resentment by standing on the track to protest against the running of his flying express train. A crank might do it, but a company of people in their senses are not likely to. It seems to me, therefore, utterly unlikely that Mr. Mullally's action expressed the wish of anybody but himself; and I am sure you will agree that it is not conducive to the interests of religion of any sort, liberal or orthodox, to attribute unworthy motives to a company of men when a simpler and more creditable explanation is at hand.

ARTHUR SMITH.

AN EXPERIMENT.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

It was one that reminded the thoughtful Unitarian of the wise artilleryman who stood by his own gun and blazed away.

In the Unitarian church of Vineland, N.J., twelve Sunday evening discourses were recently delivered by representatives of as many isms. Each discourse was an answer to the question, "What does the ism stand for?" The speakers told what the Baptist Church, Presbyterianism, Universalism, Swedenborgianism, Congregationalism, Metaphysical Healing, Methodism, Quakerism, Seventh Day Baptist Church, Spiritualism, Episcopalianism, and Unitarianism stand for. Ten of the lectures were delivered by clergymen. A lady presented the claims of Metaphysical Healing, and an editor the claims of Quakerism. With one exception, each speaker was a member of the denomination which he represented. The writer was the exception, when speaking on Methodism, which he did at the request of the pastor, after the Methodist minister declined to do it. The writer also spoke on Unitarianism, and heard all the others except one.

Did that course of lectures advance the cause for which the Unitarian Church stands?

It seems to me, and to the closest observers and most thoughtful persons whom I have consulted, that it did not. For, while the congregations were for the time larger than usual, and most of the discourses were interesting and instructive, the following facts were obvious:—

Many of the unusual attendants were present but once, and then to listen to a description of their own ism.

When most of the discourses were measured by what is commonly taught in the pulpits of the denomination represented, it was very manifest that the dogmatism of the denomination was being greatly minified and the liberalism as greatly magnified.

Some of the orthodox doctrines which are most offensively superstitious to the liberal mind were either not mentioned or merely hinted at, or alluded to in a very unimpressive manner. This peculiarity was so marked that it repeatedly elicited the question, "Why does he keep so much back?"

The general effect, so far as I can learn, was the confirmation of each orthodox person in his satisfaction with his own ism, and in his opinion that Unitarianism is unnecessary, if not positively harmful. As this effect was produced, in part, by deceptive statements, the cause of truth, freedom, sincerity, rational religion,—that is, the cause of Unitarianism,—was not advanced.

This course of lectures was, at least, a slight addition to the growing testimony which affirms that Unitarianism can best advance its cause by clearly, persistently, and uncompromisingly delivering its own message by every possible means and at every opportunity.

MEA ANIMA.

BY RUFUS CYRENE MACDONALD.

Rouse thee, my soul! too long hast thou been dreaming!
Too long in Circe's garden thou hast strayed!
Rise in thine own true stature, undismayed!
Rise, and behold a new day brightly beaming!
Leave thy false husks, that are so goodly-seeming!
Cast off the garb in which thou art arrayed!
Spurn thou the mire, in which thou long hast laid,
And rise to greet the light upon thee gleaming!
Be not content to live alone for pleasure,
Which glows and fades with every changing hour!
Work on and up for more enduring treasure,
Some more befitting and ennobling dower,
By which thou canst in ever-widening measure
Assert the fulness of thy deathless power!

METHODS OF SOCIAL REFORM.

II.

BY MRS. M. C. KLINGELSMITH.

There are two ways of working in the reforms of the day,—the way of yesterday and the way of to-morrow; for in reform, as in the Hebrew language, there is no present. A reform that stands still is as useful as a horse with that habit, and is as liable to an early death. The way of yesterday was a good way,—nay, a most excellent way for yesterday. The way of to-morrow is far better for to-morrow, but to-morrow has not come for the most of the children of men. What can we do, then? Why, live for our reforms as we live for our children, in their future, meanwhile giving them daily bread and making their clothes a little larger every season,—not groaning because they grow so fast and take more care and cloth every year, but rejoicing in their growth, and thanking God that some day they will be children no longer, but self-supporting and independent of our fostering care. But it is of all things the most important that we have an ideal for the future, and train our reforms to grow toward it.

What reform have we most at heart? According to each soul's interest will be the answer. Social purity, surely, is vitally important. Drinking of a polluted pool, we cannot attain to health; and without health nothing is possible. But shall we in any way antagonize any soul seeking the good of others by the way we seek for this pearl of great price? Surely, there is a way in which pure women may love their sisters' souls, and vindicate their sisters' right to safety, without for one moment casting a deeper shadow on the brother who walks beside her! In this question, one of the most tangible points is the absolute injustice toward woman of the present inequality between the sexes. She suffers outwardly, visibly. The degradation and the scorn, the shame and the suffering, despair and death, are her portion; while the sharer of her sin sits in the sunshine of the smiles of men, and faces heaven cheerfully in the belief that God is as lenient as man. In our revolt against this horror of injustice, we cry out against the immoral morality of our age, and demand that at last justice be done to woman as to man. "Let us right this hideous wrong!" is the cry that goes up: "let justice at last be done to woman!"

But I would change that cry, that demand. It is true, terribly true; but there is another side less obvious, but even more bitterly true. And my changed cry would be, "Let us have an equal standard of morality, not merely for the saving of woman, but for the saving of man!" Let the mere materialists argue the point from their side, if they choose. The world does give its food and its drink, its medals and its gilded crowns, to the evil man, while thrusting out the woman to utter infamy. If this were all, the wrong were all on one side. But to the great majority to whom mere living is not life, who know that life has higher aims and deeper meaning, it must finally come to be held as truth that in this custom of ours we are dealing out a deeper measure of injustice to men than to women. When we enter a household and see the daughter well trained, well-mannered, thoughtful for others, finding her pleasure not wholly in her own satisfaction, but in that of the whole household, and then we see the son of the house untrained, ill-mannered, thoughtless, careless of others, indulged because he is a boy and must have his fling, do we not turn away, saying the daughter will be a happy, fortunate woman, whatever misfortunes may befall her,—her happiness is secure in herself? But of the son we say the world may be at his feet, and his family sacrifice themselves on the altar of his selfishness; but he is doomed: never can he grow to his full-statured manhood, never know what happiness is, unless some fortunate misfortune teach him the realities of life. Has not the great world-family been teaching its sons and daughters just in this way? It has been severe on its daughters, repressive, demanding too much of self-sacrifice in some ways and too little in others, narrowing down and pinching in, but all the while training, sweetening, uplifting, till the woman of to-day is what we find her,—refined, sensitive, cultivated, almost free from the baser brutal tendencies that have lingered so long in humanity.

But on its sons the hand of correction has been laid all too lightly. They have not been sufficiently helped to save their own souls alive. Rather has the slight penalty, the mere flavor of misdoing given to their sinning in this way, made it a more attractive thing for them to tread "the primrose path." That they have found bitter things and fatal dangers there has been owing to the mercy of God, and not to the justice of man. Humanity has not been just: it has been far too merciful. But God's justice is more merciful than man's mercy, and to it we owe the preservation of our brothers. It is time we found out our duty in the matter, and should do what in us lies to save mankind from the cruel mercies which go so far to destroy it. Not in selfishness, not in any spirit of even righteous wrath, but in the spirit of love, and the desire to uplift those whom we have helped by our weak indulgence to hinder and retard, shall we enter upon our crusade for social purity.

Looking at it in this way, is it not evident whose soul it is that is in need of salvation? We speak of the lost woman, when perhaps the woman of whom we speak may be led by the very injustice of man, and the merciful suffering which is the consequence of her sin, to find her way back to the realm of pure spirits; while the man whom we neither speak or think of as lost, sunk in the sensual satisfactions of the physical life, sinning, and not as yet consciously suffering the consequences of sin, is losing the last semblance of similitude to the immortal. Cruelly, crudely, ignorantly, we are saving the soul of the woman; but, in our condoning of the error of the youth, the sin of the man, the cynical soullessness of unrepentant age, we do so great a violence to the soul of man, and so shut it out to sin, so shut it in to vice and selfishness, that it is no wonder that the epithet pure has become almost entirely a feminine one, and the young girl who confesses that she expects to find a soul as pure as her own only sees facing her a world of cynic smiles. We know what we suffer, and we know what we lose by all this; but what they suffer, what they lose, few seem to think. Is the temporary and the transient, then, so much more than the immortal and the eternal? We do need justice, indeed, but justice for both. Our system of morals is criminal, but we do not need ask for better things for the sake of women merely. As women, it is an even more gracious task to say not because we, as women, bear a most unjust share of the burdens of sin, do we ask your help, but because you are our brothers and our fathers and our husbands, and, being so, are far dearer than ourselves, do we ask you to help save your souls alive.

For the temperance work there is much the same to be said, except that we are nearly a hundred years of agitation ahead on that question. The days when the drunken curate and dram-drinking parson were on every hand, nor won an instant's disgrace therefore, when a great Scottish patron only stipulated that the ministers whom he chose should be good-natured in their drink, are in the dim past. Set our social customs straight: make it as disgraceful for your son to be drunk as your daughter, give him the protection you give her. I can understand how mothers with daughters can endure, even uphold, the present social customs: injustice is a possible thing to bear when you are sufficiently used to it, and all the past history of the world shows how hard it is to arouse the oppressed to feel their oppression. The daughter seems safe, according to the common ideas, and is protected from much temptation. But her sons! How can a mother who really loves her son as well as her daughter see the one saved and protected, the other thrust out and tempted, ruined before her eyes, simply because it is popularly supposed to be a strengthening process necessary to manliness? A woman who can think of no better way of hardening and strengthening the manly fibres of her son than these so long in favor seems to me to sadly lack the inspiration love should give. Doubtless, the toughening processes of the red Indian were extremely successful. Would any mother of to-day envy the cruel, pitiless nature evolved by that process for her sons? Yet it was a more merciful system than ours, and the degradation of soul it entailed was far less. Unless the mothers of sons see that these things are looked at differently, who shall say the fate that waits them is not deserved?

The third great question, the political and social equality of the sexes, is one that is so wide-reaching in its extent, it is bound up with every matter that we can touch with our hands or think with our brains. Folded in this question, lie all the meanings of the nineteenth century. Here we see, again, how unjust our customs have been to men. We talk of women's rights, we rebel against our limitations; and we do rightly. But, if men were not so easily kept within the limits of their traditional line of thought, they would be agitating even more vigorously than we are for the even more valuable rights of which they are deprived,—rights for which we suffragists are agitating, but as yet almost unconsciously, and in the name of women's rights. For it is most certain to those who have looked deeply and with eyes anointed to see through the veil of custom and prejudice that the present moral, social, and political conditions, including the position of women and their relation to men, is even more unjust to men than to women. It is the obvious injustice that is ours; and that is why the first rush of our enthusiasm is to the righting of women's wrongs,—a cause to rouse our deepest and our warmest sympathies, and call for work of heart and mind and soul, yet, looked at merely as work for women, far narrower than the full, free, and true scope of the work, which is indeed a work for the uplifting and uniting the whole of humanity. Women are indeed unjustly denied the power to regulate the conditions in which they live, and in which their children must grow up; but men are unjustly burdened with a responsibility which they often confess they are unable to carry without public disgrace and private shame. Good women have been denied certain powers and duties; and the result has been that their power, denied its legitimate outlet, has, breaking out in the form of influence, devastated the lives of myriads of men,—some unknown and obscure; some, world-rulers, kings of men or of the minds of men. Power will show itself, and, denied its rightful sphere, will seize upon some realm where it will work for the undoing instead of the uplifting of men. Who suffers in this case the most? The woman loses much, undoubtedly: one cannot be harmed without the other being harmed also, and legitimate rights cannot be replaced by gain of illegitimate power. But the man who loses the power to govern himself, who loses the blessing he might have had in the council and help of a pure and strong woman, loses far more. He is indeed lost who surrenders his soul to another. Women lose in dignity, in helpfulness, in mental, moral, physical development. Men lose in purity, spirituality: mentally, morally, and physically, they degenerate. We are denied the right to grow: they are devoted to decay. Which is worse? Arrested development may lead to decay; but it need not, if growth can but be stimulated again. But, when the state of active decadence has arrived, then must we hasten the active measures to restore health, if it may be restored, to the diseased part. Our position is hard; but we have seen our danger, and the inert mass feels the working of new impulses.

Do those who have not yet begun dream how good it feels to grow? But it is for those who do not as yet dream that there is danger that our most earnest work is needed. Men are restless in the face of the conditions of to-day. They call the things that threaten by many names,—anarchy, socialism, individualism, tyranny of the man, despotism of the mass. There is danger in the air, but no man knows the name of the destructive power. They model their governments on the old, old plans, and, in the face of the ruin or decay of every one, wonder why they, too, feel the irresistible downward trend of their own system. They must first unlearn most of the old lessons,—harder far than to learn,—and, when that is done, turn their faces, not to that old sunken sun the glow of whose going down is but a dying brilliancy, but toward this new dawn to which we point, whose fairy colors, indeed, may fade, but which fade not into night, but to the full beauty of the clear, blue heavens,—the life-giving and soul-inspiring light of the glorious sun.

ISLAM.

BY REV. W. R. W. GARDNER, ADEN, ARABIA.

The religion known to us as Mohammedanism is called in the Koran Islâm. "And I have chosen Islâm to be your religion" (Sales's Koran, Chandos Series, p. 74). Islâm is an Arabic word, meaning surrender or submission; and the true believer is he who submits or surrenders himself to God. But this submission must be to God's will, not in any general way, but as it is given in the Koran, and to Mohammed as his prophet. And, though in many places Islâm is said to be the old religion of Adam, of Noah, or of Abraham, yet Mohammed himself is to be regarded as the first "Moslem," or "Submitter." "Say, verily I am commanded to be the first who professteth Islâm" (p. 90). "This have I been commanded. I am the first Moslem" (p. 104). The Koran is not composed by Mohammed, but was composed by God himself, and inscribed by him on the preserved table (p. 185); and a copy of it was brought down by Gabriel, who revealed it to Mohammed bit by bit, as occasion required (p. 451 and pp. 11, 12). It does not claim to supersede the former revelations by abrogating them, but by confirming them (p. 12). It teaches that there is one God, who is Creator and Ruler, omnipotent, omnipresent, and omniscient. He is merciful and compassionate, but his mercy and compassion are reserved for those who submit to him. "And the faithful men and the faithful women are friends to one another: they command that which is just, and they forbid that which is evil; they are constant at prayer, and pay their appointed alms; and they obey God and his apostle. Unto these will God be merciful, for he is mighty and wise" (p. 142). He is not our Father, but our Master. "He is your Master; and he is the best Master, and the best protector" (p. 257). And the Mohammedans here in South Arabia deny most emphatically that he is our Father, even in a metaphorical sense. We are only his slaves, they say.

Man's duty to him is not said to be love, but submission, service. Prayer must be said five times a day, and consists in the repetition of certain sentences with certain postures, kneelings, and gestures. The suppliant must pray facing what he believes to be the direction of Mecca. Alms-giving is a kind of tax or tithe, and is obligatory on all. "O believers, bestow alms of the good things which ye have gained," etc. (pp. 29, 30). And alms-giving is efficacious in gaining pardon. "If ye make your alms to appear, it is well; but, if ye conceal them, and give unto the poor, this will be better for you, and will atone for your sins" (p. 30). Alms should be given as a duty to God, and not in the hope of gaining anything here on earth, but in the hope of a reward hereafter. "And ye shall not give unless out of desire of seeing the face of God" (p. 30). And the recompense of alms-giving is certain. "And what good thing ye shall give, it will be repaid you" (p. 30).

Fasting is also obligatory. "The month of Ramadan shall ye fast," etc. (p. 19). The fast must be kept for a whole month,—the month of Ramadan,—from the time in the early morning that one can distinguish between a black and a white thread until sunset time. During this time no food must be eaten, no water drunk; nor can smoking even be indulged in. But, as soon as the sun sets, feasting may begin; and the indulgence of the sexual passions during the month of Ramadan, which the teachings of the Koran seems not merely to allow, but to encourage, is in strange contrast with the nominal reason of the fast, to "be constantly present in the places of worship."

Another duty of the Mohammedan is pilgrimage. Every true believer ought to perform the pilgrimage to Mecca at least once in his lifetime. "Perform the pilgrimage and the visitation of God" (p. 21). "Verily, the first house appointed unto men to worship in was that which is in Becca (Mecca); . . . and it is a duty toward God, incumbent on those who are able to go thither, to visit this house" (pp. 42, 43). These four,—prayer, fasting, alms-giving, and pilgrimage,—with belief declared in the word, "There is no God but God, and Mohammed is the prophet of God," is what is required of a Mohammedan as his faith and practice.

Many other precepts are inculcated in the Koran, such as honesty, kindness, justice, etc. Wine, lots, divining-arrows, images, are spoken of as an abomination,—the work of Satan, and to be avoided (p. 84). As a reward for serving God here below, the believer can look forward to heaven, where he shall have an eternity of happiness and bliss, enjoying such pleasures as he has enjoyed here, and others which have been forbidden here. "And happy shall be the dwelling of the pious; namely, gardens of eternal abode into which they shall enter. Rivers shall flow beneath the same. Therein shall they enjoy whatever they wish" (p. 197). "The description of paradise which is promised unto the pious: therein are rivers of incorruptible water, and rivers of milk the taste whereof changeth not, and rivers of wine pleasant unto those who drink, and rivers of clarified honey; and therein shall they have plenty of all kinds of fruit, and pardon from their Lord" (p. 375). That these things are not allegory is very plain from the following passage: "There shall they enjoy wives subject to no impurity" (p. 3. See also pp. 395, 396, p. 60). Such is to be the reward of the pure. "And this shall be the reward of him who shall be pure" (p. 237).

Yet no one, however much he may try to follow the precepts of the Koran and its teaching, can be sure of reaching heaven. "But he only shall visit the temple of God who believeth in God and the last day, and is constant at prayer, and payeth the legal alms, and feareth God alone. These perhaps may become of the number of those who are rightly directed" (p. 136). Nor, on the other hand, can any find just cause for despair. "O my sons, go and make inquiry after Joseph and his brother, and despair not of the mercy of God; for none despaireth of God's mercy except the unbelieving people" (p. 178).

The Position of Woman.—The Koran teaches that by nature, not merely by circumstances, woman is inferior to man. Yet women are to be respected because of their position in regard to the continuance of the race. Married women are completely in subjection to their husbands, who have the right to punish them at discretion with confinement or beating. "Men shall have the pre-eminence above women because of those advantages wherein God hath caused the one of them to excel the other, and for that which they expend of their substance in maintaining their wives. The honest women are obedient, careful in the absence of their husbands; for that God preserveth them by committing them to the care and protection of the men. But those whose perverseness ye shall be apprehensive of, rebuke; and remove them into separate apartments, and chastise them" (p. 58). The husband has also the right to divorce his wife at pleasure, by repeating at three separate times, or even thrice at one time, the words, "I divorce you." And the repetition of these words constitutes divorce. There can be no reunion unless the divorced woman has been in the interval married to another man, and has lived with him at least one night, and has been, in turn, divorced by him. "But, if the husband divorce her a third time, she shall not be lawful for him again until she marry another husband. But, if he also divorce her, it shall be no crime in them if they return to each other, if they think they can observe the ordinances of God" (p. 24). A woman cannot divorce her husband. She can only claim that he divorce her, and must make good her claim by proving ill usage, want of proper maintenance, neglect of conjugal duty, or some other such action; and, even then, she loses her dowry, which she does not, if divorced by her husband. This shows the unequal positions of men and women.

Polygamy also is allowed by the Koran. A man may have four wives, and, besides these, concubines from his slave-girls. "And, if ye fear that ye cannot act with equity toward orphans of the female sex, take in marriage of such other women as please you two or three or four, and not more. But, if ye fear that ye cannot act equitably toward so many, marry one only or the slaves which ye shall have acquired" (p. 53). "Now are the true believers happy, who humble themselves in their prayer and eschew all vain discourse, and who are doers of alms-deeds, and who keep themselves from carnal knowledge of any women except their wives or the captives which their right hands possess; for as to them they shall be blameless" (p. 257). This shows that concubinage is allowed. While polygamy is recognized by Mohammed as being a likely cause of trouble in the house ("Ye can by no means carry yourselves equally between women in all respects, although ye study to do it," p. 68), yet Mohammed's own conduct with regard to marriage gives the idea that polygamy is the higher and better state; and it is therefore provided for in heaven. Mohammed claimed to have a special dispensation direct from heaven, allowing him more wives than common believers. "O prophet, we have allowed thee thy wives unto whom thou hast given their dower, and also the slaves which thy right hand possesseth. . . . This is a peculiar privilege granted unto thee, above the rest of the true believers. We know what we have ordained them concerning their wives, and the slaves whom their right hands possess" (pp. 318, 319). And, when Mohammed died, he had nine wives and two concubines living.

All believers are brothers, and should be treated kindly, whether personally known to each other or not. "Shew kindness unto parents and relations and orphans and the poor, and your neighbor who is of kin to you, and also your neighbor who is a stranger, and to your familiar companion, and the traveller, and the captives whom your right hands shall possess" (p. 58). But unbelievers, such as Jews or Christians, are not to be made friends of. "O true believers, take not the Jews or Christians for your friends" (p. 80). The murder of believers is forbidden. "But whoso killeth a believer designedly, his reward shall be hell" (p. 64). But unbelievers are enemies, especially pervers. These last are to be killed wherever they are found. "And, if they turn back from the faith, take them and kill them, wherever ye find them" (p. 64).

At first Mohammed taught that force was not to be used in trying to influence men to become Moslems. "But, if thy Lord had pleased, verily all who are in the earth would have believed in general. Wilt thou, therefore, forcibly compel men to become true believers?" (p. 157). But later Mohammed taught that war was to be carried on against the infidels. "War is enjoined you against the infidels" (p. 22). And the true religion is to be thus established. "Therefore fight against them until there be no opposition in favor of idolatry, and the religion be wholly God's" (p. 129).

That slavery is allowed by the Koran is indisputable from the many references to it which may be found. But, more than that, the permission granted by the Koran to cohabit with female slaves gives a great impetus to the desire for its perpetuation, and makes slavery a recognized and established custom and social usage.

Such is a brief sketch of some of the main points in the teaching of the Koran. But one must always remember that by all Mohammedans the traditions of Mohammed are also an authority in matters of faith and practice. So that much of the Koran must be interpreted in the light of Mohammed's own life; and, while we may divide between the earlier and the latter periods of his life, Mohammedans do not. The latter part of his life, which was impure, sensual, and cruel, is just as saintly in their eyes as the earlier part. And very many Mohammedans follow the example of Mohammed rather than his precepts. What Mohammedanism is in practice in South Arabia I shall show in a following paper.

THE CRUCIFIXION.

BY REV. HENRY A. MILES.

One of the most scholarly and trusted of the biographers of Jesus (Milman, in his "History of Christianity"), alluding to the crucifixion, says that the Roman soldiers gathered around it "the most savage and wanton insults."

It must be remembered that this is what lawyers call an obiter dictum,—an observation dropped by the way, without pretence to a full review. If it be only an echo of traditional feelings, it is none the less to be regretted that it is not more discriminating. The facts deserve some scrutiny.

This kind of punishment passed, during centuries, through many changes. In the long run there was a gradual mitigation of severity.

At first the naked body was impaled on a young tree, when the branches had been trimmed off, and its top point had been sharpened. This point was thrust up through the person, entering the lowest part of the body. It was the execution which required the smallest preparation, and was perfectly effectual. It was also the most horrible. The arms thrown out in all directions could bring no relief, and awakened compassion for the excessive agony.

There are repeated allusions in the Scriptures to this earliest mode,—such as "hung on a tree," "the accursed tree." Classical phrases refer to the same fact,—"the infelix arbor."

The next step was to stretch out and bind the arms on a cross timber, leaving the internal body un mutilated. Hence came the name of this punishment, the cross. Doubtless it gave momentary relief, though it may have delayed death,—sometimes hastened by breaking the limbs.

Later a benumbing drink was offered to the victim. Some kind hand reached this to Jesus. Subsequently, a shelf was provided as a seat or a rest for the feet. Finally, the presence of friends was allowed. They were not repulsed at the crucifixion of Jesus.

His death took place in some stage of this merciful advancement,—not surely in the first,—but no one can exactly say how. The popular impression that he was nailed to the cross is wholly unauthorized. That barbarous and bloody method may have been common in earlier times, when there was no thought but to have life taken with despatch. There is not a word said about nails by either of the evangelists in their account of the execution. The only place where that word is found is in the interview with the incredulous Thomas, subsequent to the crucifixion. That theatrical passage appears only in one Gospel, and it is supposed to be a marginal anecdote accidentally inserted into the canon. Biblical scholars tell us that we are by no means sure that we read the original Bible when we read that story.

Ghastly pictures of the bleeding hands and feet were afterward very common, and still are. They were devised to affect the imagination and sensibilities. After the myth of the finding of the cross, in the fourth century, the possession of one of the nails was coveted. A wonderful power was imputed to them. A long list might be made of the cathedrals, churches, monasteries, chapels, and of superstitious old persons, all of whom purchased at great price one of the nails,—in all, perhaps enough to build a house.

Crucifixion has been named as peculiarly a Roman barbarity, but it is well known that it had been inflicted in many Oriental countries long before it was adopted by Rome. We need not go back to primitive savage times to see what a great advance it was upon former methods of execution. Criminals were precipitated from high rocky cliffs; and their broken, mangled bodies were left to be devoured by dogs and wolves. Sometimes they were cast into dens of wild beasts; sometimes they were helplessly fastened in lone, desert places, where their flesh was gnawed by hyenas and their eyes were picked out by ravens; sometimes they were immured in dark and damp cages, amid serpents and vermin, until they starved. Burning to death over a slow fire was the punishment often decreed for heretics. The sufferer on Calvary had a better doom under the order, decency, and well-established rules characteristic of Roman power.

It seems fair to remember also the state of mind generally produced by long-continued scenes of violence and murder then common in Judea. Such times have an indurating effect. Life which is less secure has less value. It is relinquished with a bravery which in other circumstances seems impossible. This is the merciful compensation. Every public man knew that he was in hourly peril. He was to some degree prepared for it. The noble victim was entirely conscious of his precarious position.

We see how frequently he referred to it. It was neither with the indifference of a Stoic nor with the sensitiveness that went beyond self-command.

We need not exaggerate the necessities of his condition by imputing to him the pusillanimous feelings of our day. He had the best thing for him and for us. It was the victory of long habits of self-discipline. All this takes him out of the theological haze of a vague, unintelligible demigod; and we see one beloved of the Father, tempted in all points like ourselves, coming to our side, and filling our hearts with his heavenly wisdom and divine courage.

As to the degree of his sufferings, we have some hints of a trustworthy kind. He could not have received much bodily injury. The reporters say that he started the day after he left the tomb—Saint Luke says it was the same day—for a walk of seven or eight miles to Emmaus. What indignities he had received were more of ridicule than of physical maltreatment. In that age, and long afterward, those condemned to death were regarded as outlaws, and were generally exposed to insult and outrage.

Probably, there was here but little of this, compared with other cases. Some restraining influence overawed the scene. There was no mob violence. Compare it with our lynching. Even bystanders silently smote their breasts with grief. Only four Roman soldiers took part in the transaction. Learned Jews do not doubt that it was strictly legal. A Roman centurion exclaimed, "Truly, this was a Son of God!" He could discover real greatness, while the unappreciative and cowardly disciples took to flight. In the famous Florentine gallery there is a painting of the mother of Jesus standing at the cross. It is by Michel Angelo, and it is called "The Passion." While the other women veil their heads amid their sobs and screams, she looks intently upon her son with unblanched face, and with the calmness of perfect trust. The picture seems to tell us that she had no doubt it was all right. She had believed what he had said to her. It would come out just as he had foretold. The event was worth all its cost. The whole world would in time be blessed by it. It was woman's faith and love that inspired that attitude and look. And, if art has here rightly interpreted her, and all this was true to that mother's feelings, it was more noble than anything else ascribed to her.

ALL SORTS AND CONDITIONS OF MINISTERS.

Thirty-seven ministers of nine different denominations together all day long in a little hall, talking, eating, voting, and planning, and not a single quarrel, theological or personal! Instead of Ayer, Mass., Jan. 15, 1895, ought not the place and date of such an event to be written Utopia, Anno Millenario 1, 1st month, 15th day?

Rev. W. J. Batt, the energetic chaplain of the reformatory at Concord, was the leader of this enterprise. He is naturally of a hopeful disposition; and many years of experience have confirmed him in the belief that there are no human beings—not even ministers—beyond the possibility of reformation. So he set to work. Preliminary meetings were held at Concord Junction in Ayer, which resulted in the gathering above described.

The purpose of the meeting was to testify to mutual friendliness, to recognize such aims as are held in common, and to raise the question whether there is anything more to be done in the way of co-operation to promote the great object to which all ministers should be devoted.

The meeting was called to order by Rev. S. P. Everett of the Baptist church in Ayer. Rev. W. J. Cloues of the Baptist church in Littleton was made chairman, and Rev. B. A. Goodridge of the Unitarian church in Harvard, secretary.

There were present representatives of Trinitarian, Congregational, Methodist, Baptist, Episcopalian, Unitarian, Universalist, Swedish Congregational, Advent, and Union churches. Father Sheedy of the Catholic church in Ayer expressed his hearty sympathy with the meeting, but could not be present.

Papers were read during the morning by Rev. W. J. Batt, on "The Signs of the Times," and by Rev. C. S. Brooks, on "The Danger of Secularism." Free discussion of these papers, and of the general aim of the meeting, filled the time until 12.20 P.M., when the meeting adjourned for lunch.

In the afternoon Rev. L. B. Voorhees of the Union Congregational church of Groton read a brief but pertinent essay on "Unity in Diversity." He did not believe it possible or desirable to obliterate denominational differences, but thought we might at least rub out the lines of ignorance of each other and of each other's work.

A Committee on Resolutions which had been appointed during the forenoon then offered its report. The report was accepted, and some lively discussion concerning its adoption followed. In substance, this report, which was read by Rev. A. J. Rich of Milford, N.H., was a recommendation that a permanent organization, to be called the Union Ministerial Association, be formed; that its object be to encourage the union and co-operation of ministers and churches in charity, fellowship, and good works; that semi-annual meetings be held; that a committee, consisting of one from each denomination represented at the meeting, or from such denominations as shall be found ready to co-operate, shall be chosen to prepare a plan of organization, and present it at the next meeting.

The discussion of this report made it evident that it would be impossible to decide upon the spot the question of permanent organization; but so strong was the feeling in favor of at least one more meeting of this sort that it was voted with practical unanimity to instruct the Committee on Resolutions to call another meeting within six months, the precise date and the place to be left to their discretion.

The discussion in the afternoon was especially interesting, as showing the difficulties with which some of our orthodox brethren contend in attempting to follow out their fraternal impulses. It is doubtless true, in many cases, that there could be free interchange of pulpits between orthodox and liberal ministers if it were not for prejudice in the pews.

With the serene and saintly faces of Dr. Putnam and Dr. Young shining upon us, with their inspiring words ringing in our ears, it was impossible for the rest of the Unitarian contingent not to listen with demure satisfaction as one after the other of our orthodox brethren confessed to having taken part in Unitarian ordinations and installations without visible injury to himself. Bless the dear souls! They might join with us and we might join with them twice as often, and nothing but good could come to either of us by the experience.

Perhaps a carping critic might object that there were no very definite results from the meeting; and it is true that no special work was laid out, and no formal organization was effected. But there was a very definite result in the increase of cordiality and fraternal feeling, of respect for each other's work, of desire for more intimate relations in the future.

Spiritual Life.

For whatever happens to me each day is my daily bread, provided I do not refuse to take it from Thy hand, and so feed upon it.—Fénelon.

The true strength of every human soul is to be dependent on as many nobler as it can discern, and to be depended upon by as many inferior as it can reach.—John Ruskin.

I beg you, my dear friend, whatever be your suffering, to learn first of all that not to take your sorrow off is what God means, but to put strength into you, that you may carry it. Be sure your sorrow is not giving you its best unless it makes you a more thoughtful person than you have ever been before.—Phillips Brooks.

That right and justice actually rule the world may be open to dispute; but that they ought to, that they are supreme over all else, that our part as men is to help make them rule, that human life has this as a part of its ultimate law and aim,—of this one may be as sure as that the earth is under his feet; and the sense of it seems to lend infinite dignity to this passing life of ours.—James Vila Blake.

The struggle against material difficulties develops the qualities of patience and perseverance and courage; and, undoubtedly, the fruits of the ages—mercy, unselfishness, and charity—could not possibly be exercised and trained except in a world where wrong and oppression, misery and pain and crime, called them into action. Thus even evil may be necessary to work out good. An imperfect world of sin and suffering may be the best and perhaps the only school for developing the highest phase of a personified spiritual existence.—A. R. Wallace.

HYMN OF DEDICATION.

[Written for the dedication of the South Unitarian Church, Worcester, Mass.]

BY DR. A. F. CHAMBERLAIN, OF CLARK UNIVERSITY.

This humble house our hands have raised
We dedicate, O Lord, to thee;
In service simple, pure, and free
Here shall thy holy name be praised.

And those remembered of all time,
Who toiled and died to make men free,
The good and great of history,
Prophet and sage of every clime.

No creed shall cast its shadows o'er
The lowly threshold all may pass;
No narrow dogma, rude and crass,
With harsh confession bar the door.

But, wide as range of human thought,
Strong-set in love our faith shall be;
For all at last must come to thee,
Our Father, as Thy Jesus taught.

Within this temple deign to stay,
Our humble offerings, Lord, accept,
And keep, who hast our fathers kept,
Thy children of a later day.

THE SOUTH UNITARIAN CHURCH, WORCESTER, MASS.

THE SOUTH UNITARIAN CHURCH, WORCESTER, MASS.

The South Unitarian Society of Worcester dedicated on the evening of January 16 the beautiful church which crowns their efforts in the last six years.

The church stands a mile south of the nearer of the two Unitarian churches which already existed, and in the midst of a fast growing population, from which a strong congregation has been built up. Two years ago Rev. George W. Kent became its minister, and his unwearied devotion to the work of the church has been a large element in their success.

The original plan was to build the church of wood; but, by the generous help of Mr. James A. Norcross, it has been carried out in brown stone, and the fine tower has been added. It stands nobly situated on the Main Street of the city, the site being elevated, advantage of which has been taken to secure a range of well-lighted rooms, which for the present accommodate the Sunday-school beneath the main floor. The plans include, however, a large chapel in the rear of the church, which will be built later.

On the main floor, reached by a broad and easy staircase in the tower, is the auditorium, with a seating capacity of about three hundred. The pulpit and organ occupy one corner of the room, the pews—semi-circular in form—facing this corner. In addition to a number of smaller windows, the auditorium is lighted by two fine windows by G. W. Wise of Boston,—one to the memory of the young daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James A. Norcross; the other, in honor of Rev. Edward Everett Hale, who began in Worcester his work as a minister. On the same floor as the auditorium, and opening into it, is a large room seating over a hundred, and serving as a parlor for the ladies and a place of greeting and fellowship before and after the Sunday services.

The entire building is lighted by electricity, and is amply supplied with toilet-rooms, cloak-rooms, kitchen, and all the offices of the modern church home. The cost, including the land, has been about $40,000.

At the service of dedication the church was filled to its utmost by the members of the society, their neighbors, and their loyal friends of the two older churches. Rev. F. S. C. Wicks, Rev. Nathaniel Seaver, Jr., of Millbury, and Rev. B. F. Eaton, pastor of the All Souls' (Universalist) Church, joined in the opening exercises. Rev. Austin S. Garver of the First Unitarian Church told with tenderness and with pride the story of the growth of the society,—of the humble beginning in an unused school-room; of the later discouragements and successes; of the faithful, united work which has been given to it. And then minister and people joined in the service of dedication, and in the noble hymn which had been written by a member of the congregation. Rev. Calvin Stebbins of the Seattle, and the other continuing eastward. Once this junction point passed, and the train plunges into the virgin forest which borders the northern Pacific slope of the Cascade Mountains. The bright noon seems to turn to twilight. Monster trees, shooting up from the ground as straight as arrows, lift their heads way above the general level of pine and fir trees as we know them in Maine and Canada. The ground is a tangle of underbrush and decaying timber, and it appears to the untrained eye as though it would take giant strength and years of labor to clear a space in such growth and establish anything like human civilization.

There comes in sight, by and by, a small shedlike station, a rude platform, a country store, with a house here and there to be seen through the woods, and a half-made, winding road running down to the river, upon which there stands a very good-looking frame building, which might be a school-house or a church. This settlement in the woods is McMillin.

Not a pleasing or hopeful prospect did it seem to me that Saturday afternoon, as I stepped out into the damp, chilly atmosphere, and walked across the wet earth to the country store. On the next morning I was to preach to the little Unitarian society, and the announcement of my coming had been spread far and wide in the neighborhood. A small notice of the fact was printed and stuck outside the store, which, by the way, serves as the post-office, the express office, the McMillin Club-house, and for various other purposes.

I walked across to the main building of the town (?). It was an unsightly and dismal structure, as it stood there unpainted, without windows, without doors, unplastered, and the water dripping from the roof. This, I understood from my host, was to be the Unitarian church. Slowly, laboriously, this much had been acquired. It meant generosity on the part of some such as we more favored ones know little about. It meant odd hours of work by the carpenter belonging to the society. It represented hopes, the future,—a common village home.

The next morning the sun came out hot and clear, and dried up some of the moisture which seems an everlasting heritage from all the years that have been. Further down the road was a little school-house, which had escaped my eye on the first inspection. Here the church service was held, and long before the hour appointed people began coming from the settlements in the woods and the new farms started on the river bottoms. I have preached to many congregations, scattered from San Diego in the extreme South-west to Bar Harbor in the extreme North-east, but never to one where it was so easy to talk or where I had such appreciative listeners. After the sermon questions innumerable were asked. Possibly there was not one in that audience originally a Unitarian. Each had religious needs that were met by our presentation of the gospel, and each found a home and peace in the liberal faith.

How, it may be asked, was this little congregation kept together? Mainly through the untiring efforts of one Mr. A. D. Hale, who from the beginning to this day has been the helper, the inspirer, the father of the little church. When the Tacoma or Seattle minister could not come to the backwoods settlement, Mr. Hale would gather together the congregation, read to them a printed sermon, teach in the Sunday-school, collect money, work on the church building, write to friends outside. Every moment of time he could spare from the duties of postmaster, storekeeper, express agent, were devoted to the church. So steadily, bit by bit, the building gathered to itself completeness. In spite of the slowness of money, the work progressed; and the furnishings were put in,—a pulpit platform, then a few chairs, then an organ, until at last, all being ready, after years of slow, painful, and discouraging work the temple is finished and dedicated. Thus has Unitarianism demonstrated in this case its power as a missionary gospel. Thus has it shown what patient perseverance on the part of poor people can accomplish. May the new church be indeed a light on the pathway which shall light every man and woman of the settlement on the road of life toward the better home!

Even the smallest place has some significance. You would notice this blank, if it were not filled. Be sure that you fill some place yourself.

THE McMILLIN CHURCH.

BY REV. THOMAS VAN NESS.

A few weeks ago a modest notice appeared in the "Religious Intelligence" column of the Register, stating that the church in McMillin, Wash., had been dedicated. This colorless little article conveyed no impression to the general reader as to the meaning of that dedication, and the heroic history which was back of it. Some time in the autumn of 1891 I took the overland train on the Northern Pacific bound East from Tacoma to St. Paul. After crossing the neck of Puget Sound, the train entered the Puyallup Indian Reservation, soon to emerge into the low valley of the Puyallup, where the town of that name, in the midst of the hop district of Washington, now stands. Possibly a mile further on the railroad divides, one branch going north to

The Sunday School.

The usual Channing Hall "talks" at the Unitarian Building, 25 Beacon Street, will be held next Saturday, January 26. Subject, Lesson XVIII., "Jesus and the Precious Ointment." Primary at 2 P.M., conducted by Miss A. C. Dockham; Intermediate and Advanced at three o'clock, led by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford. All cordially invited.

When Rev. John A. Bevington was induced to take charge of the Barnstable church and Sunday-school, it was very evident that prosperity would attend the work. We learn that the Sunday-school is in a flourishing condition. The teachers and scholars all seem interested in the work. The attendance is good. The superintendent is Mr. Bevington. The number of teachers and pupils have almost been doubled under his administration. The one-topic graded leaflet lessons issued by the Unitarian Sunday School Society are used, and the scholars seem more interested than in former text-books. For the first time in its history the Sunday-school sent a contribution to the Unitarian Sunday School Society last year. The pupils meet every week at the church, and practise tunes. They also give contributions, and work to help the "Children's Mission" and other philanthropic objects.

The new Song and Service Book for some time in preparation by the Unitarian Sunday School Society is now nearing completion. All the material is in the hands of the printer. The date of publication can proximately be fixed about the end of March. There will be ten general services and ten special services for Christmas, Easter, etc., twenty in all. The number of hymns and tunes will be about two hundred, old and new. The music is of a four-fold character,—valuable old tunes, carols liked by our Sunday-schools, attractive new tunes from other denominations not known to our Sunday-schools, original music composed expressly for this book, and also the standard congregational tunes and Psalms which ought to be well known both in Sunday-school and church. A vast amount of care has been taken to produce a satisfactory result; and, despite the many obstacles which attend such a work, it is believed that the New Song and Service Book for church, school, and home will satisfy the majority of our Sunday-schools. It is expected that this book will be sold for 25 cents a copy or $3 a dozen.

Religious Intelligence.

THE next meeting of the Ministers' League will be held on Monday, February 11, instead of January 28. Due notice will be given of the same.

THE Ministerial Union will meet in Channing Hall Monday, January 28, 10.30 A.M. Address by Rev. F. H. James, upon "Taoism." The public is invited.

NEW ENGLAND ASSOCIATE ALLIANCE.—At the meeting of the New England Associate Alliance in Jamaica Plain, February 27, Mr. Dole will speak on "The Sunday-school Question," and Mr. Balch will follow Mr. Cummings on "Strikes."

BOSTON.—King's Chapel: January 27, Rev. Lewis G. Wilson will preach. Services at 10.30 A.M. and 3.30 P.M.

Rev. Charles G. Ames will conduct the Wednesday noon service on January 30.

ROXBURY: Thirteen women of the First Religious Society of Roxbury send $100 to the American Unitarian Association, seven of them giving $10 each, and six of them giving $5 each. A hint to other parishes.

West Roxbury, Mass.: On Sunday, January 6, the society of the First Parish was much surprised and pained to hear its pastor, Rev. Frank Wright Pratt, read his letter of resignation. Mr. Pratt came to the church nearly four years ago; and his good work is so evident that his departure will be a loss, not only to the society, but to the whole community.

Bulfinch Place Church (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): Afternoon, at 3.15; evening, at 8, when Rev. Arthur May Knapp will speak upon "Lessons from Japan," with stereopticon views. The Winkley Guild meets at seven o'clock. On Monday evening, January 28, at the good citizenship meeting, Mr. Edwin Ginn, member of the Municipal League, will speak upon "The Tenement-house Problem."

Parker Memorial, corner Berkeley and Appleton Streets (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): Sunday evening, January 27, at 7.30. Rev. Minot J. Savage. Subject, "Religion and the Church." Attractive music by Miss Lillian Carllsmith, contralto; Mr. Leon Van Vleit, 'cellist. All seats free, and a welcome to all.

Last year an effort was made, under the direction of Dr. E. E. Hale, to relieve the suffering among destitute sewing-women. A work-room was opened in Parker Memorial Building, and much good was done by the movement. This year the enterprise is under the charge of the Martha and Mary Club, and good personal work is being done among the same class of women. There is an accumulation of garments which it is desirable to sell, that the work may go on. The club holds a sale of clothing every Thursday, from 10 A.M. to 4 P.M., at the Parker Memorial Building, entrance on Appleton Street. Here women's and children's clothing, men's and boys' flannel shirts, pillow-cases, etc., neatly made and of good material, can be purchased very cheaply. This is a good opportunity for charitably disposed persons to buy clothing to send to sufferers at the West or to give to needy ones at home, and at the same time aid a worthy charity in Boston.

BROOKFIELD, MASS.—Rev. H. H. Woude, of Toronto, Canada, lectured in the Unitarian church on "Hamlet" before an appreciative audience. A new organ, costing $2,000, is being built by Emmons Howard of Westfield, Mass., for the church. It is to be finished "on or before the first day of April." Evening meetings for the second season are being held. They extend from November till May.

DORCHESTER, MASS.—At the Unitarian church on Richmond Street, Dorchester, last Sunday Rev. Frederick B. Mott began a course of sermons entitled "The Faith for To-day." The object of this course is to endeavor to set forth the elements of a religious faith broad enough and reasonable enough to meet the intelligence of well-read men and women to-day, and at the same time inspiring and vital enough to serve for the daily help and encouragement of all in the many duties of life. The first subject in the course was "Man as he now knows himself"; and the discourse was an attempt to state the results of modern scientific investigations as showing the human race to be the crown of age-long periods of gradual creation out of lower forms, and not the work of a miraculous moment. This conception, of course, makes man the highest work of God; but it compels him to see himself as bound by reciprocal ties to all the world beneath him. And the depth whence he has come hints of the height to which he is destined to ascend. This sense of his relationship to the rest of the universe broadens a man's mind and sympathies. He feels that his genealogy behind him includes the myriad living forms of nature's host, while his inheritance is yet to be the perfection of his Father, God. The modern man can now understand better than has ever been possible in the past Christ's great idea of sonship to God. Mr. Mott said that men and women to-day who could not build up any satisfactory religious faith upon revelations or assumptions could begin here with the large and comprehensive fact of their recognized relationship to the rest of the universe and their membership with the mighty family of God. That is a clear, undogmatic basis for a reasonable faith. Mr. Mott will continue the course by speaking upon "The Great Teaching of the Bible." Dorchester Beacon, December 12.

EASTPORT, ME.—The meeting-house of the Unitarian society at Eastport was dedicated Thursday, Jan. 13, 1820, Rev. Andrew Bigelow, the first pastor, who had made the midwinter passage from Boston by schooner a few days previous, conducting the services and preaching the sermon. On Sunday, the 13th of the present month, Rev. H. D. Catlin, the pastor, preached a special sermon in commemoration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the event; and the following Wednesday a parish festival was held in the church vestry of the present members of the society. Mr. and Mrs. W. P. Bucknam, young children at the time, were present at the services three-quarters of a century ago; and Mrs. Sophia Shead, a descendant of John and Priscilla Alden of Puritan fame, still well and active in her ninetieth year, was a member of the choir at the dedication.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.—The Unitarian Club, at its meeting on January 17, had the very great pleasure of listening to an address on "The Religious Faith and Heroism of the Armenians," by Mrs. Isabel C. Barrows, who was followed by a young Armenian, a graduate of the "Euphrates College," who related some of his own experience of Turkish rule, and thanked Mrs.

Barrows for her address. Rev. F. A. Bisbee agreed with the previous speakers that we could do little to assist the Armenians except by manifesting our sympathy with them, and suggested that, if consular agents were chosen for their fitness instead of for political reasons, we would probably receive fuller and more accurate information of events occurring in the countries to which they were accredited, and they would probably exert a greater influence in the communities to which they were sent. Prof. Ludlam added to the interest of the meeting by some fine recitations.

PROVIDENCE, R.I.—The following subscriptions have been made toward the Building Fund of the Fourth Unitarian Society, South Providence, R.I., payable when the sum of $7,500 has been pledged: V. O. Taylor, Providence, R.I., $100; James M. Scott, Providence, R.I., $100; Charles W. Bowen, Providence, R.I., $100; Nathan H. Truman, Providence, R.I., $100; Francis Colwell, Providence, R.I., $100; Joel Metcalf, Providence, R.I., $50; total, $550. Pledges may be sent to Dr. V. O. Taylor, Box 1,459, Providence, R.I.

ROSLINDALE, MASS.—The Unitarian society held a special meeting, and adopted resolutions regretfully accepting the resignation of their pastor, Rev. C. F. Nichols, and expressing appreciation of his earnest purpose during the pastorate. The resignation is to take effect March 1.

ST. LOUIS, MO.—Mr. Chadwick returns from St. Louis full of enthusiasm over the great and beautiful city which he has now visited for the first time. The weather proved extremely cold, but the warmth of his welcome made him quite indifferent to that. He lectured to the Eliot Club on Saturday, January 12, and the next day preached for Mr. Snyder in the morning and for Mr. Hosmer in the evening; and on the following Tuesday he addressed the Unitarian Club. He found Mr. Snyder's one of the most beautiful of our Unitarian churches, and the society abounding in good works. Mr. Snyder has a second pulpit in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, from which every Sunday morning he preaches a sermon two columns long, from half a dozen different texts, in closest touch with the great national or local questions of the time. The shadow of John Learned's death is still dark and heavy on his people, but nothing could be happier for them than Mr. Hosmer's coming to take up and carry on the work of that dear friend with whom he was associated in the closest bonds of common hopes and fears. It was very beautiful to have Learned share in the service on Sunday evening with his noble hymn,—
"To-day we would renew the quest."

TOLEDO, OHIO.—The Methodists have for some time conducted their worship in the Unitarian church. They have now entered a building of their own, but have sent the following letter to the trustees of the Church of Our Father:—

"Gentlemen,—It is with great pleasure that I communicate to you the action taken last evening by the official board of Epworth Methodist Episcopal Church at their first meeting in their new building. It was unanimously resolved that a hearty vote of thanks be tendered you and your membership for the accommodations and privileges which you so kindly furnished us in your church, and for your uniform kindness and courtesy toward our church organization while we occupied your building. You have certainly been fraternal toward us; and we appreciate this spirit of brotherhood which you have exhibited, and we trust it may bring forth a more generous spirit of fraternity among the different churches in this portion of the city for all the future years. With best wishes for your continued prosperity, I am yours fraternally.
"I. N. HUNTSBERGER.
"By order of the Official Board."

WEST NEWTON, MASS.—Rev. J. C. Jaynes, having nearly completed a ten years' pastorate in the West Newton church, has been voted a six months' vacation, which he will spend with Mrs. Jaynes in a trip abroad. In further token of affection for and appreciation of the pastor and his wife, the members of the congregation join in presenting them with a sum of money, to be used toward defraying the expenses of the trip. During the last ten years this church has been materially enlarged, and yet not a single pew can now be obtained.

WORCESTER LEAGUE OF UNITARIAN WOMEN.—The January meeting of the league was held on Wednesday, January 16, at the Second Parish Church, Worcester. After the secretary's report an interesting paper on "Children's Theology," written by Miss Lydia Ball for the Clinton conference last fall, was read by Miss Lizzie H. Ball. Mrs. J. B. Stone added to the interest of this paper by reading her notes of G. Stanley Hall's lecture on "Religious Education of Children from a Psychological Standpoint." The subject of the day was "Boys"; and the first paper, written by Miss Dora Knight of Hopedale, on "Is Hero-worship the Boy's Best Help in learning Patriotism?" was read by Miss Anna M. Bancroft. Intermission for luncheon was taken, and over ninety women sat down to the tables. They represented thirteen towns in Worcester County, besides Boston and Framingham. At the afternoon session the following papers were given: "How shall we teach Boys Justice, Courage, and True Chivalry,—the Highest Standard of True Manliness?" written by Mrs. C. H. Roper of Hopedale, and read by Mrs. F. E. Smith; and "How shall we fortify them against the Temptations of College and Business Life?" by Miss Julia F. Darling of Mendon. Many a boy-lover was present; and the personal experience and belief of the mother who had "brought up boys" brightened the discussion, and helped others anxious to put before their own children the highest incentives to manly and upright living.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.—A special meeting of the board of directors of the American Unitarian Association, called by the president to consider Southern work, was held at their rooms, 25 Beacon Street, Tuesday, January 15. There were present Mrs. Hooper and Mrs. Wells, and Messrs. Ames, Batchelor, Brown, Crothers, Dole, Fox, Gaffield, Hale, Hosmer, Howe, Lincoln, Lyman, and Savage. The record of the last meeting was read and approved. Rev. George L. Chaney, superintendent of missions in the South, was present, and presented his reasons for the various appropriations recommended by the Committee on the Southern States for the year beginning Jan. 1, 1895. The following appropriations were made: to Rev. Henry A. Westall, at the rate of $900 a year, for services at Asheville, Greenville, and Knoxville; to the Church of Our Father, Atlanta, Ga., $500; to Rev. Edwin M. Wheelock, Austin, Tex., at the rate of $500 a year; to the First Unitarian Church, Chattanooga, Tenn., $900; to the First Unitarian Church, New Orleans, La., $500; to the First Unitarian Society, San Antonio, Tex., $400; to the Unitarian society of Memphis, Tenn., $700. It was also voted "that the salary of Rev. George L. Chaney, superintendent of missions for the Southern States, be continued at the rate of $2,500, for the year beginning Jan. 1, 1895, with travelling expenses, receipts for preaching to be deducted." As an appropriation for Richmond had been already made to the first of March, an appropriation for the remainder of the year was postponed to the March meeting. On suggestion of the secretary, it was voted "that the Finance Committee be instructed to report on the investment of legacies at the February meeting, and to make some definite recommendation as to the future financial policy of the American Unitarian Association." Adjourned.

A Cough should not be neglected. "Brown's Bronchial Troches" are a simple remedy, and give immediate and sure relief.

Mr. D. E. Ranney, of the firm of Joel Goldthwait & Co., sailed for Europe Wednesday of last week in search of specialties for the coming season.

An Interesting Point.—In the design of any piece of furniture there is nothing that seems so trivial and is really so important as the third proportion,—its height. This is well illustrated by the new Parlor Cabinets, which are fast becoming all the rage. They are only about one foot lower in height than the ordinary Cabinet of the past, but they seem like an entirely different piece of furniture. An engraving of one of these new Low Cabinets is shown in another column in the announcement of Paine's Furniture Company.

A Unique and Generous Offer.—A very novel offer is being made by that well-known firm, Joseph Breck & Sons, of Boston. They advertise that they will give the same amount of money as will be awarded by any Horticultural or Agricultural Society in the United States as first prizes for products raised from seeds or bulbs purchased of them.

In the past more than an even proportion of the prizes given by such societies in New England for floral and garden exhibits have been awarded to products grown from Breck's seeds. It would seem, therefore, as though Breck had taken considerable upon his shoulders, and will undoubtedly be called upon to pay out no inconsiderable sum of money. But such generosity will undoubtedly revert to his benefit; for it will mean that Breck's seeds, always popular, will be sought after more than ever. And, then, seeds that are bred to produce prize winners are none too good for the amateur gardener.

O thou dear Solitude, give me thy balm, Wherewith to soothe these aches that wring my heart,
 And lull the storms that through its shadows dart
 With whispered gospels of the yearned for calm.
 Teach it anew the long-forgotten psalm,
 Through the last plaintive echo which the smart
 Of slander and neglect had left apart
 To give coy promise of a future palm.
 Then shall my soul awaken into harmony,
 And answer to the call of Nature's voice,
 Ever in thy embracing sympathy
 Most eloquent. So shall my spirit poise
 On soaring wing, and through thy sovereignty
 Be taught again to bless and to rejoice.

LABORERS TOGETHER WITH GOD.

BY REV. WILLIAM H. FISH, JR.

"Laborers together with God."—1 Cor. iii. 9.

According to the ancient Hebrew idea, the necessity of toil was a penalty imposed upon mankind for Adam's disobedience; and a somewhat similar view has prevailed in most nations of modern as well as of ancient times. Labor, that is, has been regarded as a curse; and in some countries a stigma is still attached to it. To be compelled to earn one's bread by the sweat of one's brow is considered degrading. Men are ashamed to have it known that they or their fathers before them ever did anything useful for a living; and, even where no such feeling is entertained, the weariness and painfulness associated with the idea of necessary toil have given birth to a very general desire to avoid or escape from it, if possible.

It does not require any great knowledge of history to see that this desire has been the source of some of the worst evils by which mankind has been afflicted. To it may be traced, for example, what John Stuart Mill called "the subjection of woman." In primitive society man, regarding hunting and warfare as the only honorable pursuits, used his superior strength to make woman do his work. It was the wife's business to hew the wood, draw the water, and till the ground, while her lord and master took his ease under the shade of a convenient tree or in the shelter of his wigwam; and traces of this state of things are still to be found, even in civilized lands. To this day you may see the German peasant striding home from the fields at night, smoking his pipe and swinging his empty hands, while the woman, who has toiled all day beside him, pushes the wheelbarrow on which are piled the implements of their common labor.

This desire, again, is the main source of what Wesley so aptly named "the sum of all villainies." A strong man, finding his wishes increase beyond the capacity of his wife to supply them, enslaved his weaker neighbor, or induced his tribe to join with him in a raid upon some neighboring tribe, in order that he might bring home a prisoner to minister to his comfort. This appears to have been the origin of human slavery. It is the origin, too, of most of those tribal conflicts which still make Central Africa little better than a den of wild beasts.

Once more, in the desire to escape from toil is to be found the source of a very large part of the crimes against property and person which constitute one of the chief scourges of human life. It is, of course, not money for its own sake that the thief, embezzler, and bribe-takers want, but what money will bring,—first of all, the power to purchase the services of others and the accompanying exemption from all disagreeable exertion for themselves.

Such are a few of the evils which hatred of honest toil has inflicted on our race. And what would be the probable result if this feeling were to be still more fully and generally indulged,—if the common love of idleness and ease could be completely gratified? Suppose the Hebrew ideal of paradise were to be actually realized. Suppose the earth were now a Garden of Eden, with trees always ready to drop ripe fruit into our mouths, with a climate of delicious and perennial softness, and all other outward conditions suited to a life entirely without effort,—a life of blissful ignorance and unconsciousness even of the difference between good and evil. Would that be a desirable state? Would it be better than our present lot? Surely, no one who has an atom of true manly or womanly feeling, no one who has ever known the joy of a pure and noble aspiration, a conquered temptation, or a difficulty overcome, can seriously think so. It would be a state of perpetual infancy. A man might as well long to return to his cradle as sigh for such a condition. That we are not in it, or a worse one, now we largely owe to labor. Labor not only provides our subsistence, it not only gives us our art, our science, and our separate homes, which alone make possible the joys and sanctities of family life: it is also one of the chief sources of our best happiness, and the main agency in all our progress. Who is properly fitted to experience the highest joy that comes from rest and ease? He only who has fairly earned his hours of leisure by faithful toil. Who is really qualified to enjoy the blessing of honorable self-respect and the satisfaction of a peaceful and contented mind? He only who knows the consciousness of having worked for a worthy end. I do not forget that there is such a thing as excessive labor,—that many thousands in every land are ground down by the greed of individual employers, or by unjust customs and institutions, into a condition little better than that of slaves. When a man is compelled to work fifteen or sixteen hours a day in order to keep the wolf from the door; when a woman is able to earn the pittance necessary for her support only by giving nearly every waking minute to the monotonous "stitch, stitch, stitch," which makes her a machine instead of a living being,—there is clearly something wrong, something sadly in need of readjustment, in our social organization.

But compare the condition of even these overburdened sons and daughters of toil with that of the fashionable idlers and butterflys whose energies are chiefly employed in devising the most attractive and exciting methods of "killing time," and it will be found, on the whole, safer and more wholesome. The revelations of gilded depravity occasionally made show that "Satan still finds work for idle hands to do." Of course, it is not true that virtue is confined to the homes of the poor and struggling. Some of the noblest examples of consecration and self-sacrifice have been found in palaces. But it is true that virtue and toil go properly hand in hand. It is true that without toil there can be no virtue.

You remember the picture—idealized, no doubt, but containing important elements of truth—which Robert Burns gives, in the "Cotter's Saturday Night," of the laborer's return at the close of the day to his humble home,—the wife's smile of welcome, the happy family reunion, the wise parental advice, the frugal and wholesome meal, and after it the reverent evening prayer.

"From scenes like these old Scotia's grandeur springs,
 That makes her loved at home, revered abroad.

O Scotia, my dear, my native soil,
 For whom my warmest wish to Heaven is sent,
 Long may thy hardy sons of rustic toil
 Be blessed with health and peace, and sweet content!
 And, oh, may Heaven their simple lives prevent
 From luxury's contagion, weak and vile!
 Then, howe'er crowns and coronets be rent,
 A virtuous populace may rise the while,
 And stand a wall of fire around their much loved isle."

We should do well to adopt the sentiment of this prayer as our own. Beyond all doubt, America's greatness, even more than Scotland's, is built on the virtue and content diffused through a multitude of humble homes. One of the chief dangers looming up before us is this same contagion of luxury which the poet dreaded for his native land. Colossal fortunes bring colossal temptations in their train. It would be idle to deny, it is impossible to ignore, the fact that the influence of great wealth is too commonly corrupting. Immense private fortunes were the accompaniment and sign—in part, also, the cause—of the decay of ancient Rome; and we see them to-day sowing the seeds of mischief and discord far abroad. Sometimes, indeed, a possessor of large wealth is evidently anxious to use his means in the service and for the good of his fellow-men; and we are quick to give to all such—to the George Peabodies and the Peter Coopers who have held their riches as a sacred trust—the honor which is their due. But the average man is not wise enough or good enough to be safely intrusted with the enormous irresponsible power which the unlimited control of these vast accumulations of property confers.

Consider for a moment how great this power is, and how selfishly it may be exercised. Ten or twelve persons, it is said, own, or did own a few years ago, one-half the land in Scotland. In that fact alone there may seem to be little significance. But suppose those ten or twelve persons were to agree to turn their entire possessions into a wilderness, who could prevent them from depopulating the country and inflicting unspeakable misery upon the many thousands of people now living upon their estates? This has, indeed, actually been done to a limited extent. One great proprietor, having purchased a tract extending from sea to sea, converted it into a vast deer park, cruelly evicting, so it was reported at the time, large numbers of poor tenants who had occupied their little homes all their lives, as their ancestors for many generations had done before them, and who expected that their children and children's children would be allowed to occupy them after they were gone. No doubt this man, and many another like him, would say: "Is not the property mine? Have I not bought it and paid for it, and may I not do what I like with my own?" The answer is: "No, it is not yours to do what you like with in that sense. You did not make your wealth alone: it was made for you, in great part, by others, who labored with you and in your behalf. You hold it to-day by the consent and with the aid of your fellow-men, and you must answer to them that the use you make of it is not detrimental to the common welfare."

This is the answer which more and more people every year are prepared to give, and the temper in which they give it will depend very much on the conduct and spirit of the men who call it forth. A laboring-man, watching the building of a great house in New York, was heard to mutter, as he saw some beautiful bronze work put up, "That'll have to go to the melting-pot one day." If our millionaires are known to draw large incomes from tenement-houses which they allow to remain far less decent and comfortable than the stables which they build for their horses; if they push selfish schemes with unscrupulous tyranny, and practically refuse to admit that the public have any rights that they are bound to respect; if they flaunt their luxury with vulgar ostentation before the eyes of their suffering and struggling neighbors,—there will be more mutterings of the same sort; and before many years have passed a storm will break out beside which the Chicago anarchist riot will seem utterly insignificant.

Other conditions favorable to such an outbreak are multiplying with unexampled rapidity at this moment; for it is not the genuine workingmen—the men who are engaged in earning their bread and supporting their families—who are the chief immediate source of danger: it is the idle, homeless, hungry men who have nothing to lose, and, possibly, much to gain from almost any change in the social order. Idleness leads to mischief quite as certainly among the poor as among the rich, and often to a more openly destructive and disastrous kind of mischief. That the unemployed have grown into a vast army is a fact which is now forced upon our attention in such a way that we cannot ignore it if we would. Of course, some who belong to this army do not wish employment, and will not work under any circumstances, unless absolutely compelled. There was a time, within the memory of many still living, when the tramp was practically unknown in this country. We read of him in books and papers describing foreign life, and thought him a strange, sad product of monarchical institutions; but we never for a moment imagined that we should soon become only too well acquainted with him here. And we are not yet fully awake to the importance of dealing with him as seriously as his case properly demands, for his sake as well as ours. It would seem, however, as if this blindness could not last much longer. A study of the American tramp lately published by one who has been a temporary member of the fraternity did something to reveal the nature and extent of the evil in an exceptionally direct and convincing way, and the march of the various so-called armies upon Washington afforded an important object-lesson to the whole country.

No doubt, there were men in those armies who had honestly sought employment and had failed to find it. According to Rev. Dr. Duryea, the detachment which he saw at Omaha was largely made up of such men. "Most of them," he says, "were skilled mechanics, some of them professional men, and the rest intelligent and well disposed laborers." But this must be exceptional.

But it is only too certain that there are in this country thousands of able-bodied men who have not the slightest intention or desire to earn their own living. It is said that, out of twenty of the unemployed who were offered work at fair wages in a neighboring place a few months ago, only two accepted the offer. The rest apparently belonged to the large class who enjoy a roaming life, and are entirely satisfied to depend on begging or stealing for their support. That such men easily become a danger to society, that they are readily gathered into bands which may be very formidable to the authorities of any town, has been evident for some time.

This is the testimony which Dr. Stanton Coit, who has had great experience in work among the poor of London and New York, has lately given: "During the first six weeks of unavoidable idleness the man rises at five in the morning, searches all the advertisements in the newspapers for situations, and calls at one factory after another through the day. The second six weeks, finding that the search for work is vain, he has given it up, but is restless and troubled. The third six weeks, if hunger has not already driven him to crime and beggary, he at least has begun to wonder how he ever cared for work at all."

From this statement, which is doubtless true in general, however numerous the exceptions may be, we get a suggestion as to the prospect before us which is by no means reassuring. We are clearly destined in the near future to see a vast increase in the army of chronic idlers, already so large and threatening; and, the longer the present situation continues, the greater that increase will be. Surely, it is time to do something to check the growth of the evil. What can be done? That is the pressing question that confronts us to-day.

Without going into any of the deeper problems of social reorganization which this question may suggest to some, I wish to say a very few words in regard to two entirely practical and practicable measures, which, if widely adopted, could hardly fail to be attended by important good results. The first measure is especially applicable to the tramp community. It consists in the enforcement, as far as humanity will permit, of the law based on many generations of experience, and declared by Saint Paul in the words, "For, even when we were with you, this we commanded you, that, if any would not work, neither should he eat." It is undoubtedly the ease with which men who do not wish to work obtain all that is necessary for their support without working which is largely responsible for our present condition. I have lately seen in a newspaper published in a country town a request from the selectmen of the town to the citizens to refuse to give even food to strangers applying at the door. It seems to me that the authorities of all our towns should adopt measures which would justify them in making and insisting on a similar request; that is, they should be ready to furnish at the public expense a very simple but sufficiently substantial meal to every applicant, on the one condition that he should do a certain amount of work for the town in return.

It will probably be objected that this method has been often tried, and has proved ineffectual; but the trouble is that it has been tried on too small a scale. Within the limited area affected by such partial experiments as have been made I believe it has been extremely effectual, when properly and persistently carried out. The towns adopting it have been, as a rule, very carefully avoided by the tramp fraternity. As far as they are concerned, the dangerous nuisance is practically at an end. All that is required to abate it altogether, or at least destroy its worst features, is to get enough towns to treat it in the same way to deprive idle vagabonds of a convenient place of refuge, and take away the chief attraction of their wandering life.

But this, of course, would reach only a part of the difficulty. It is far better to save the true manhood and self-respect which a man must lose before he becomes a tramp than to attempt to cure him after he has fallen into that deplorable state. The only way to do this is to provide work for those who want it, but are unable to find it for themselves. Here, too, at a time like the present, it is only the public authorities who can satisfactorily meet the need. I believe employment should be furnished on public works to all who cannot obtain it in any other way. I know what an outcry is raised against this suggestion on the ground of its so-called socialistic character. I have read the history of the French public workshops of 1848, and I am aware that they were a failure. But our conditions are not the same, and it would not be difficult to avoid the mistakes then made.

Give two minutes' thought to the question, and see how plain it is. It may be taken for granted that no one proposes to allow these people who are anxious to earn their living, but who are unable to find anything to do,—these brothers and sisters of ours, whom some of us could call by name to-day in this town, and who, perhaps, have young children depending on them for support,—it may be taken for granted that no one proposes to allow them to starve. Well, then, here is the simple alternative. Either they must be supported in idleness, or they must be given an opportunity to do something in return for what they receive. In the one case you incur the very serious risk of pauperizing them, and so inflicting upon them a grave moral injury, besides making them a permanent public burden. In the other case you give them a chance to preserve their independence and self-respect; and at the same time you receive, in the good roads, the new sewerage system, the playgrounds and parks, or other improvements, which are created by their labors, what may easily prove to you or your children far more than an equivalent for the money you expend. Which seems to you the wiser method? Which is likely, in the long run, to be the least burdensome to the community? Which, considering the moral and spiritual interests involved, is the most worthy to be called the Christian method? Can any one hesitate as to the answer?

This is not the time or the place to attempt to meet the practical objections that may be raised. But it is not likely that the difficulties in the way would be any greater here than they were found to be in England during the cotton famine of 1861-65, when extensive public works were undertaken to relieve the wide-spread distress. The plan is said to have worked admirably in that case. It was well understood to be a temporary expedient to meet a temporary need. When the cotton trade revived, the men went back to the mills of their own accord, even before the public works were suspended.

But, whatever special methods may be adopted in special emergencies, the great lesson, for rich and poor alike, which the pulpit and the Church should strongly emphasize, is the dignity of all forms of useful labor, and the duty which rests upon every human being to engage in that form which is best suited to his strength and capacity. No man or woman in good health has a right to lead an idle life. It does not so much matter what kind of work we do. With God there is neither high nor low. His activity is manifest in the ground beneath our feet as fully as in the stars above. The great thing is the spirit which we bring to our work. To be laborers with God, we must aim at something of the divine thoroughness. Every willingly slighted work is an evil work, and serves an evil end. To be laborers with God, finally, we must have larger than merely selfish aims. We no longer believe in a God who cares only for his own glory, but in one who is always working for the welfare of even his smallest creatures; and we are to be "imitators of him, as dear children." Helpfulness is the truest holiness. In the practical realization of this idea lies our true health, our only salvation.

GAINING WINGS.

A twig where clung two soft cocoons
I broke from a wayside spray,
And carried home to a quiet desk
Where long forgot it lay.

One morn I chanced to lift the lid,
And, lo! as light as air,
A moth flew up on downy wings
And settled above my chair.

A dainty, beautiful thing it was,
Orange and silvery gray;
And I marvelled how from the leafy bough
Such fairy stole away.

Had the other flown? I turned to see,
And found it striving still
To free itself from the swathing floss
And rove the air at will.

"Poor little prisoned waif," I said,
"You shall not struggle more";
And tenderly I cut the threads,
And watched to see it soar.

Alas! a feeble chrysalis,
It dropped from its silken bed;
My help had been the direst harm,—
The pretty moth was dead!

I should have left it there to gain
The strength that struggle brings:
'Tis stress and strain, with moth or man,
That free the folded wings.

WILLIAM H. SMITH.

It was a good man, though not a conspicuous one, that till recently bore this name. His title to recognition, as clear as that of our Reynolds himself, was simply in the noble deeds he did and the life of simple beauty that he lived. Others might lead men: it was his vocation to confer blessing, and this he did with a bountifulness and a grace which are certainly rare.

It is of his character that I set myself to write. Yet in a sentence or two it may be well to place him. Peterboro, N.H., wants him recorded as her son. He may have been the boyhood playmate, as he was the lifelong friend, of Dr. John Morison. He married the sister of Dr. Albert Smith, a woman who in generous impulse and noble self-denial was worthy to stand by his side. Retiring from a successful business, he for several years was inclined to a peripatetic life, spending a portion of the year in St. Louis; later in Alton, Ill., where his son settled in business; his winters, in Boston; his summers, at Hampton. Once he visited the Holy Land, led thither by the pilgrim heart.

But his character,—and how to tell of the beauty I have seen! To most his characteristic grace was probably benevolence; and through this, if contemplated in relation with the vital piety out of which it came, we may see him. I have never known one in whom benevolence was more prevailing, but it was never spasmodic: it was of principle, not impulse. It came of something deeper than itself,—the religion of love to God and man. He was a Unitarian to whom the name of Jesus was unspeakably dear; and hearing the admonition, "Freely thou hast received, freely give," in loving fealty he obeyed. Something of the spirit of his giving may be seen in one or two particulars:—

1. I would not be too free with another's habits; but, really, to understand this man's giving, we need to place it beside his living. He did not first provide luxury for himself, and then bestow the convenient surplus: in very marked degree the reverse of this. A Commonwealth Avenue mansion had been possible to him. Nor was he wanting in the taste that should appreciate it. Yet a caller found him in a modest chamber, with comfortable but inexpensive furnishings,—a few books on the table, a few pictures on the walls; himself—yes, and herself—clad, not in purple and fine linen, but in the dress that quiet taste and simple comfort asked; and, seen abroad, not otherwise. His expense account I do not know; but many a minister who, with a salary of $1,500, finds the self-denials of this world too hard, supports an outward standard beyond that of this man, whose gifts may have mounted high into the thousands any year. And—something his modest lips could never have confessed, but which his friends well knew—he practised this severe economy as respects himself that the margin for his benevolences might be the larger.

2. Another feature of his giving was his self-effacement in it. He could have reared to himself a monument,—a church, a school, an asylum; yet, for all his many gifts to such, I know not that his name is inscribed anywhere save in the hearts that loved him. A prominent metropolitan clergyman not very long ago preached one vacation Sunday in a New England country town. The next week it appeared in a Boston newspaper that Rev. —, preaching at —, "gave his services." Here was a man who might give thousands, and no newspaper hear of it. He was ever alert for the better opportunities to give. Men toiling for wealth or fame are scarce more earnest than was he in his benevolences. Yet not only did he not tell his left hand what his right hand was doing: he almost practised deceptions upon his left hand to throw it off the scent. Giving mainly for religious uses, or where pressing need invited, a detective could scarce have kept track of him. He seemed to have the art of dropping his money into the needed place, and then—not being there. I once heard Dr. Reynolds tell of his bringing contributions to the Association: "The manner of his coming might suggest a thief who must be sure the way is clear before him, only there is something about him that makes me wish I might leave my pocket-book in his way, that he might fill it up for me. He comes to the desk and offers his 'mite,' which he regrets is not more, and then—vanishes." Yet at that time the noble secretary could not name him. He was to him a kind of materialized impersonality that brought him money. The good deed he simply must do: the guerdon which most men ask he not only sought not, but shrank from. As truly as another disciple, he might have said, "Lo, I have left all, and followed thee"; and it had been impossible for him to have asked, "What shall I have therefore?"

These aspects of his character show the spirit of his work. And the scope of it, as estimated in burdens lightened and causes aided, he and the recording angel could alone have known. And he, I am sure, forgot. The hard-pressed widow found money in her purse; the young man seeking an education was sped on; the library, the school, or the asylum, got a needed furtherance; and all for His sake, and with no noise. Through more channels than one his money flowed into the treasury of the Association. He could also play association himself with aid to some society struggling into existence or staggering under some debt, or to some minister toiling at an outpost. Our better religious literature,—how did he scatter it abroad! The story is that once William G. Eliot remarked in his pulpit that he knew where $30,000 could be used to good advantage, and that within a few days our friend quietly placed it in his hand. I know only the story, and that it is credible because told of him. The amount of money thus disbursed I have no means of estimating, but several fortunes, it is safe to say. Could his various contributions to our denominational work be shown in figures, they would surely place him in the very first rank of our denominational benefactors. As he became older, the benevolent sentiment grew upon him; and to mention need in his presence was to invoke relief which was almost too sure to come. A philanthropic lady was once seeking aid in some benevolent enterprise. "Have you spoken with William Smith?" I asked. "No," she replied; "but I have had the matter incidentally mentioned in his presence, which is enough for him." The last time but one that I called upon him I was on my way to a distant part of the city on a little errand of helpfulness. From an incidental remark he divined my errand, and would be told the features of the case. Placing a roll of bills in my hand, he said, "Tell the lady it was sent her." Perhaps she thought it came from Heaven, as indeed it did. During the last year or two of his life he entertained very generous thoughts of our Divinity School. But in the financial disturbances of the times his own affairs became deranged, and he must needs leave behind the memory of a generous desire he could not fulfil.

It is inexpressibly pleasant thus to recall him in association with his good deeds, so very, very many! How hardly shall a rich man enter into the kingdom of heaven! yet here was one who entered there, lived there, with his very riches made investment there. The Commonwealth Avenue mansion he did not have; but, by foregoing it, he built himself a palace in the City of God. Commonwealth Avenue mansions we need not disparage, nor such as build them; but, in comparison with the soul that for Christ's sake can forego them, how paltry and ephemeral they look!

While I thus dwell upon his rare benevolence, it must not be supposed that this is the only grace for which his friends remember him. He was the rarest combination of smile and piety,—of smile that made the piety always cheerful, of piety that made the smile seem holy. With heart as gentle as a woman's, in the proof of virtue I think we would have matched him against Cato, doubting not that the Roman would be the first to falter.

Though the least conventional of men, I have never known one of gentler manners. Perhaps one could not say of him, as Emerson said of one of his brothers, that he never "moved save in the curve of beauty." But that utter kindness of heart flowed into all his conduct; and he bore, not merely "without abuse," but always to honor,—

"The grand old name of gentleman."

While clearly implying that this man was a saint, it seems hardly worth while to specify that he did not write novels or expound philosophies or sway senates. There are combinations of which we sometimes

It will not need a very clever woman to realize the possibilities of this Low Cabinet. Remember that it stands only 50 inches from the floor, and is a totally different piece of furniture from the ordinary Parlor Cabinets.

These Low Cabinets have just come into fashion. They are very effective. The entire back is made of bevelled plate glass, and the effect of such a large reflective service can scarcely be appreciated till it is seen.

The shelves are admirably planned, each one being located with a view to its position in the general scheme or effect. There is the new curved guard on the outer end of each shelf.

The side galleries are of brass,—a classic pattern of festooned pillars. To avail of a very light construction, extra care is taken with the joiner work of these Cabinets, which is all of solid mahogany, mortised and tenoned.

dream of rare beauty with rare beauty; but, when we come to a particular case, we would not trust the experiment. A picture of Landseer's will long hold the eye, and the skies of Turner are wonderful; but a sweep of the brush of Turner across the canvas of Landseer would leave not a trail of glory, but of disfigurement. It is much so in human life. Given a type of beauty, we are offended rather than pleased at the suggestion of combining it with any other. In the result this dear charm were lost, and possibly there were an incongruity in its place. The simple beauty of this beautiful soul is enough for me; and, could I place upon his forehead Plato's crown, I would not.

Some of us are poorer than we were, yet it is beautiful to think how exceeding rich we've been. Is life worth living? What measure of pain and buffet shall countervail against the blessed privilege of knowing such a man? I thank my God that I knew him, and that I loved him. Because I knew him, life has other meaning to me: I can look up with other trust, and forward with other hope. In the light of his example the future brightens. In such a man how can I fail to see, not only the possibilities, but the prophecies, of what humanity may be?

SAY IT WHILE THEY LIVE.

Bishop Potter recently told the following story:—

"Several years ago some of us were assembled in Calvary Church, New York, to bear our testimony to the life and influence of the late Dr. Edward Washburn. I may venture now to violate the confidence of a domestic incident which transpired then, and which, I think, you will own to have its significance and appropriateness here. One after another, Phillips Brooks, and others like him, rose in their places in that crowded study to tell what they owed to the genius, to the high spirit, to the unswerving loyalty to duty, to the splendid courage, to the rare scholarship, to the philosophic insight, to the prophetic utterance of Edward Washburn. The testimony was done. At the door, all the time, there stood a slender woman, who had stood, during his life, nearest to him of whom we spoke. I never shall forget her face,—the passion of it and the pathos of it,—nor the power, tender but reproachful, with which she spoke, when at length we were still: 'Oh, if you loved Edward so, why didn't you tell him of it while he lived?'"—Churchman.

THE MILK QUESTION.

Farmers naturally resent the recent rules of the Board of Health, but it would be well for them to remember that the board is rather behind than ahead of educated public sentiment. The first rule was an order for inspectors' certificates, to be signed by a local reputable veterinarian; and no demand was made for the tuberculin test. This position was found to be untenable; and reluctantly the tuberculin test applied by an expert was required, as inspection even by the best educated eyes notably failed to detect tuberculosis in diseased cattle.

It is quite safe to say that the present movement has "come to stay." For years we have been improving, or trying to improve our surroundings,—sewerage, trapping, and ventilating traps,—putting all our ingenuity at work to remove the known sources of disease; while all the time the advanced science of the day knew that we were throwing wide our doors and inviting the most deadly contagion into our houses, and offering it to our friends and children in our milk supply. This knowledge, once the possession of the few, is now rapidly becoming the possession of the many; and either milk must go, or it must come to us in unquestionable shape.

It is no longer its integrity, the amount of cream that rises, the amount of suspected dilutents in it, or even the artificial aid of color, thickening, or preservative. It is simply the question of germs; and already the use of milk is lessening. Thousands of families boil it. Thousands avoid it when possible, and with good reason; for milk has been proved to have conveyed to the human race tuberculosis, typhoid fever, scarlet fever, diphtheria, dysentery (amebic), cholera infantum, cholera, and ulcerative stomatitis. It also labors under far more than a suspicion of having extensively carried influenza, especially in its gastric and enteric forms. It would not be impossible, under a universal public disgust, for the whole business to be ruined. The conservatism of the kitchen still holds on to it in cooking, but it seems probable that very soon we shall have recipes for all necessary dishes without it. Science can do that much, if called upon.

Cream, so difficult to sterilize, will find less and less use. The farmer will not need to rob the few quarts he handles; and butter,—well, the Eastern nations clarify it by heat into a sort of oil, which they admire, and which the biologist will probably consider safe. But lands flowing with milk and honey will no longer excite longing anticipations or cause wars for the acquisition of such enticing territory; for the honey of to-day, if we believe the food-pessimist, is but a flavored glucose in artificial combs, and the milk that should normally flow beside it may well, in the coming days, be also a chemist product. So it seems possible that the only thing that can arrest the rapid descent of the cow and her products is this very inspection,—an inspection so thorough as to command the hardest of all things to command, perfect confidence.—Medical News.

BOOKS FOR THE SOUTH AND WEST.

BY LILIAN FREEMAN CLARKE.

The Cheerful Letter Exchange desires this winter to make an especial point of sending libraries to some of our churches in the South and West. Church libraries would be, perhaps, a better name than Sunday-school libraries, although we wish to include books for children and for young people.

The importance of a good library, especially in a town where there is no public library, can hardly be overestimated. It helps the life and growth of the church, and is of great value beyond the congregation, taking the place and doing the work of a free public library; influencing and forming the mind of the young people in the town; providing healthful, innocent recreation; becoming a centre for clubs and study classes; and preparing the way for the public library of the future.

One very interesting and hopeful feature of the work of the Cheerful Letter Exchange is the desire that exists among the young in so many places for good, wholesome, standard literature—history and biography especially—in places where such works cannot be obtained.

If we can provide half a dozen of our churches in the West and South with the nucleus of a good library, we shall probably do more good than the same expenditure either of labor or money could accomplish in almost any other way.

We give below a list of books, as suggestions; but other names will no doubt occur to all who read it. It is not intended to limit ourselves to these, but all that are mentioned we know to be useful.

Any one willing to aid in this enterprise, either by sending books or giving a little money to fill up vacancies, is informed that the books will be received and packed at the vestry of Arlington Street Church, and may be sent there at any time, addressed Miss Bertha Langmaid. Contributions of money may be sent also to Miss Langmaid, addressed 2 Gordon Terrace, Brookline, Mass. Lilian F. Clarke, Chairman; Bertha Langmaid, Secretary,—Cheerful Letter Exchange Committee.

Literature.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF HERBERT SPENCER.*

We welcome this little book of Prof. Hudson's as the satisfactory response to a real need of the reading public. It has been the misfortune of Mr. Spencer to suffer, perhaps more than any other writer of our time, from misconception, owing, mainly, to the formidable task of acquainting one's self with his writings, which few of his severest critics appear to have undertaken. Henceforth there will be no excuse for such misrepresentations. Prof. Hudson, who is not only an intelligent disciple of Mr. Spencer, but who has also had the rare opportunity of long association and acquaintance with him, gives us an interpretation of the main features of his philosophical system, which must be recognized as lucid, correct, and authoritative.

The biographical sketch with which the volume opens is somewhat fuller than anything which we have heretofore had, and is not only of personal interest to all admirers of Mr. Spencer, but of psychological value to every student of philosophy. In this respect, as well as in the details of his early life, it is superior to the sketch by Prof. E. L. Youmans,—published in connection with Cazelle's "Evolution Philosophy," and recently reprinted in Fiske's admirable life of Youmans,—and also to Daniel Greenleaf Thompson's interesting biographical lecture in the Brooklyn Ethical Association Series. We must probably be content with these three brief biographies, all valuable and supplementary to each other, until the publication of Mr. Spencer's autobiography, now completed, but not to be given to the public during his lifetime.

The chapter on "Spencer's Earlier Work" shows that, however diverse were the topics treated by his facile pen, there was a thread of unity running through the whole prophetic of the doctrine of evolution, which was to become the corner-stone of the synthetic philosophy. Mr. Emerson, whose forte was not criticism, was too hasty in characterizing him as a mere "stock-writer" upon all sorts of subjects, as he also was in his extravagant eulogy of Walt Whitman. Nor were Higginson, Pollock, Taine, and others more correct in regarding Spencer as the exposition of a phase of Darwinism, his own views of evolution as a universal method in nature having been reached in entire independence of Darwin, and published prior to the publication of "The Origin of Species." An interesting chapter on "The Development of the Synthetic Philosophy," of equal psychological value with the Biographical Sketch is followed by one on "The Spencerian Sociology." Those who, from sheer ignorance of the facts, have credited Mr. Benjamin Kidd's naive claim that no one before himself had seriously attempted to apply the doctrine of evolution to the interpretation of sociological phenomena,* will find in this chapter an effective antidote. Mr. Hudson clearly shows that Mr. Spencer's individualism is no a priori theory bolstered up by the terminology of evolution, but a consistent outcome of the doctrine as applied to social development.

The concluding chapters on the ethical and religious aspects of Mr. Spencer's philosophy will be read with profound interest by all candid and open-minded thinkers. Mr. Spencer's original acceptance of the intuitive theory of morals, his conversion by the study of evolutionary principles to a modified "rational utilitarianism," and the marked contrast of his ethical system with that of the empirical utilitarianism of Bentham and his school are clearly and admirably set forth. Not less excellent is the author's frank, truthful, and unforced exposition of the religious outcome of the Spencerian doctrine. The conclusions will hardly be acceptable in their entirety by Christian theists, but that they afford opportunity for a sincere and profound manifestation of the religious sentiment cannot be denied by any one familiar with the thought of such disciples as Prof. Hudson and Prof. Fiske.

Quoting approvingly Wordsworth's familiar "Tintern Abbey" lines as exemplifying the rational religious outcome of scientific thought, our author concludes with this hopeful outlook for that method of interpretation necessitated by the acceptance of the synthetic philosophy:—

Of one thing, at least, we may rest assured. As each larger thought of the universe has at length been grown up into, and from the vantage-point then reached men have looked back and seen their older conceptions in all their limitations and crudity, so will this largest thought yet brought upon the horizon of our possibility be also emotionally appropriated. . . . Then, indeed, will the religious emotions, harmonizing with a wider, truer, and deeper knowledge of the Cosmos, and a fuller and profounder sense of the Reality of which the universe is but a fleeting manifestation, as much transcend the religious emotions of our own day as do these the religious emotions of the fetich-worshipping savage. Nor can the future progress of science do otherwise than strengthen and enlarge them. As knowledge grows from "more to more," so will "more of reverence in us dwell"; and the choral harmonies of knowledge and feeling in the time to come will be richer and vaster than the broken music of the past. For with every fresh exploration through a universe which is literally pulsating with life,—a universe “boundless inward in the atom, boundless outward through the whole,”—one fact will ever rise into greater distinctness and fill a larger place in the minds of men,—the fact that, among all the “mysteries which become more mysterious the more they are thought about, there will remain the absolute certainty” that we are “ever in the presence of an Infinite and Eternal Energy, from whence all things proceed.”

It is to be regretted that the excellent typographical presentation of the work of Prof. Hudson was not supplemented by a suitable index and a satisfactory portrait of Mr. Spencer. We hope these deficiencies will be supplied in future editions.

JOHN BROWN AND HIS MEN. WITH SOME ACCOUNT OF THE ROADS THEY TRAVELLED TO REACH HARPER'S FERRY. By Richard J. Hinton, author of "English Radical Leaders," etc. New York: Funk, Wagnalls & Co.—The need of another life of John Brown, after Mr. Sanborn's elaborate biography, is not at first sight apparent. If Funk & Wagnalls wanted such a book for their "American Reformers Series," and could get Mr. Hinton to write it, it is a pity that they did not make it obligatory on him to boil it down to the consistency of their "Whittier" and others of the shorter volumes. There was a place for such a book, Von Holst's brief sketch not filling it; and, could Mr. Hinton have practised a rigid self-restraint, and at the same time kept a steady hand upon his exuberant style, he would have made a much more valuable book than that now presented to us. But this has great merits. It is an outburst of spontaneous enthusiasm for John Brown. The writer has not had to lash himself into any rhetorical admiration. He knew the man, and honestly admired his qualities; and those parts of his book which reflect his personal knowledge are the most valuable. Next to these we should place the various passages dealing with Gov. Robinson's later treatment of John Brown's memory,—terribly severe, but not less just on that account,—and those dealing with Eli Thayer's "Guide to Posterity for the Better Appreciation of himself." But Mr. Hinton sometimes inclines to their depreciation of all heroes except their own, with the difference that their heroes are themselves, respectively, and his is John Brown. His estimate of the old hero is highly exalted; but it has not the vice which was so great a deduction from Mr. Sanborn's "Life and Letters of John Brown," his ascription of a supernatural character and office to his hero,—a strange proceeding for one who had sat at Parker's feet, and learned from him the lesson of the natural humanity of Jesus. Notwithstanding the fulness of Mr. Sanborn's book, Mr. Hinton's contains much new and valuable matter. Of course, its indebtedness to Mr. Sanborn's book is immense; and occasionally it is for something which further search on his part could not have verified, such as John Brown's surveying of the Virginia mountains for Oberlin College. "And some there be that have no memorial"; and, therefore, it is good to have the supplementary sketches of Brown's men. The matter in the several appendices is a valuable addition to the five hundred and eighty-two preceding pages. The mechanical making of the book shows many signs of haste and carelessness. The publishers had no right to treat Mr. Hinton's book in such a slipshod fashion. The proof-reading has not been intrusted to a competent hand, and the errors are not few; and some of them are gross. Still more reprehensible is the way in which the portrait illustrations have been prepared. If they have any merit, it is that they reproduce the ruinous appearance of the original daguerreotypes and ambrotypes. But there was no call for this, and the appearance of the book is needlessly coarsened by it. We have spoken of the exuberance of Mr. Hinton's style. It mars his book; but it is not inconsistent with an average quality at once clear and forcible, with many an epigrammatic phrase and lively characterization. One lays down the book with fresh conviction that John Brown's belief that his work would "pay" has been amply justified by the event. Not many strokes of heroism in the world's history have paid so well.

THE SONG-LIFE OF A SCULPTOR. By William Ordway Partridge, author of "The Technique of Sculpture," etc. Boston: Roberts Brothers.—Browning, in "One Word More," has given us the perfect expression of the artist's disinclination to rest contented with his habitual vocation. Dante must paint his picture, Raphael must write his poem,—“so, for once, to be the man, and not the artist.” So Mr. Partridge—he would shrink from the comparison, but why should we?—must make his venture in poetry, to convince himself and us that his manhood is something wider than his sculptor's art. In sober truth, it must, however, be confessed that song, and not sculpture, was his earliest love. But, though his earlier poems, as we remember them, in a thin volume of Italian make, are very greatly excelled by the best parts of the volume which he now puts forth, few, if any, who have seen the best work of his sculptor hand will have a moment's doubt that he did well in making sculpture the main haunt of his ambition. If all his strength had gone to poetry, this judgment may have been dishonored by the event. A lofty intellectual and moral idealism is the prevailing characteristic note. The best work is almost invariably in the sonnets. The following are very beautiful, and some of them are very strong: "Keats," "Mid-ocean," "Courage," "The Cup of Life," "For a Statue of Shakspeare." In "Courage" a word so archaeological as "atrium" gives the tide of feeling an unhappy pause. Some of the most interesting and impressive poems are a direct expression of the sculptor's delight and enthusiasm in his art, and of his gratitude for the help and comfort that have come to him in his labors from his dearest friend. Taken together, the poems indicate a process of development; and it requires the author's tenderness for the first-born of his muse to explain the retention of a few in a company where they are so much overshadowed.

DER BESUCH IN CARCER. Von Ernst Eckstein. Edited by T. A. Stephens. New York: Maynard, Merrill & Co.—With what enthusiasm this "Humoreske" will be received by schools we can easily imagine. The Germans take pride in this sketch as being one of the funniest and most amusing bits that they have, and the reader will certainly agree with them. Notes and vocabulary in great measure do away with the idiomatic difficulties; and, to the credit of the editor, be it said that he does not explain the jokes.

A USEFUL GIRL.

Sleeves to the dimpled elbow,
Fun in the sweet blue eyes,
To and fro upon errands
The little maiden hies.
Now she is washing the dishes,
Now she is feeding the chicks,
Now she is playing with pussy
Or teaching Rover tricks.

Wrapped in a big white apron,
Pinned in a checkered shawl,
Hanging clothes in the garden,
Oh, were she only tall!
Hushing the fretful baby,
Coaxing his hair to curl,
Stepping around so briskly,
Because she is mother's girl.

Hunting for eggs in the haymow,
Petting old Brindle's calf,
Riding Don to the pasture
With many a ringing laugh.
Coming whenever you call her,
Running whenever sent,
Mother's girl is a blessing,
And mother is well content.

"CUTIE."

BY MRS. A. GIDDINGS PARK.

An acquaintance of ours, who was intending to break up housekeeping for a time, asked us one day if we would not accept from him the gift of a little black-and-tan dog. At first we said "No"; for we thought of our pet cats, Abbie and Topsy, who were afraid of dogs, and were also very jealous of a rival in our affections. But he urged that this dog was remarkably intelligent and affectionate; and he wanted to find a home for it where he knew it would be well cared for and appreciated, asking permission to bring it to us, that we might see it. So it was brought,—a half-grown little black-and-tan, with a beautiful form and face. Her eyes were large and bright, with a very intelligent and soft expression; while she was as sprightly and frolicsome as a kitten. We at once decided to accept the gift; and, though the cats were quite demonstrative in their feelings of indignation and disgust at first, they were on passably amicable terms with her after a few days' acquaintance, Abbie even becoming quite attached to the little stranger. Topsy gave her a "wide berth," or pretended not to see her at all.

Cutie had been taught very little beside her name by her former owner; but she learned very readily the things we attempted to teach her, and, having once understood what was wanted, seemed to take great pleasure in doing it. While talking to her, she would look intently into our faces, and cock her head this way, then that, as if trying to understand; while her ears (which were never mutilated by the barbarous practice of clipping), sometimes extending straight up at full length, at other times partly raised, with the lower half falling over the erect portion, added much to the animation and intelligence of her face. She was exceedingly affectionate and demonstrative from the first,—traits which have seemed to increase as she grows older.

Whenever her master and mistress have returned home from either a short or long absence, she manifests her joy by jumping and running about the room, barking occasionally. Then, standing up on her hind feet, she runs up with her forelegs playing in the air like drum-sticks. As soon as we are seated, she springs into the lap of one, then the other, embracing us alternately by putting her forelegs around the neck and laying her head against the cheek. She will embrace no other person except when told to do it. This she seems to do intuitively, having never been taught to express her love in this manner. She has been taught to sit erect and hold her paws to her breast, to shake paw, sneeze, say her prayers, rest her head in one's lap, walk about the room on her hind feet, play "dead doggie," catch and bring the ball, sing, and squeak her rubber doll in her mouth, which she does when told to "make the baby cry." Her singing consists of a prolonged tone, sometimes on a low key, at other times very high and shrill. If one says, "Sing higher," and gives her the pitch, it is amusing to see how she tries to imitate the sound, and also surprising how well she succeeds. She is very fond of music; and, as soon as she hears a hand-organ or band in the street, she rushes about to find her squeaking rubber doll, which, when found, she continues to make squeak to the best of her ability, as if she thought that was helping the music along. She knows a fire alarm at the first stroke, and will rush to the window and watch to see the engines go by (an engine-house being near us). Having seen it pass, she goes and lies down quietly again.

One day a little black-and-tan dog came to the house with an errand boy. As soon as Cutie saw him, we noticed that she began to run about the room as if searching for something. She finally ran into the next room, and returned in a moment with her little rubber ball in her mouth. Running up to the stranger dog with it, she dropped it directly under his nose, and then looked up into his face as much as to say, "You may play with my ball." A little boy or girl could not have been more generous toward a visitor.

She enjoys catching mice. As the mice were somewhat troublesome, we set a small trap, made like a little wire cage, with a hollow wire wheel attached. This trap, of course, catches the mouse alive and unharmed. As soon as Cutie learned by the first mouse caught the use of this trap, she became greatly interested, and now goes several times a day to see if there is a mouse in it. She does this frequently of her own accord, and always promptly when told, never disturbing it in the least. If she hears the trap spring, she jumps up and runs instantly to it; and, if there is a mouse caught, she calls us to come by repeated low whines.

She is very fond of riding in a carriage. Last summer, while riding out with her master and mistress, she accidentally fell out between the wheels, and was run over, breaking two of her ribs, and laming her back for some time. After this she was just as eager to ride as ever, if the carriage had two seats in it; but, if she found on getting to the door that the carriage was a single-seated one, she would skulk away and hide, no inducement being sufficient to tempt her to enter it. She was afraid to trust a single-seated carriage again. She is very fond of being in the country in summer. Last summer she took a great interest in a brood of young chickens just hatched, and liked to follow the mother hen with her downy brood about the yard all day. She was very careful not to frighten or harm the little chicks, though her curiosity prompted her sometimes to just touch them with the end of her nose or with her paw. When the hen brooded the chickens, she would lie down as near her as she dared, and wait for the little ones to come out from under their mother's wings again. The hen and chickens finally became so accustomed to her presence that they lost all fear of her; and we frequently saw her sitting erect or lying on the lawn close to where the hen was scratching, with the chickens running all about her.

She likes to go about the table at meal-times and beg for titbits of each one. This she does by standing erect on her hind feet, waiting patiently to be noticed. If no attention is paid her, she utters a little whine, scarcely audible, and looks wistfully for a response. None being given, she whines a little louder, and awaits the result. After repeated attempts of this kind she sneezes, or reaches out her paw and touches a hand or an arm, to attract attention. She is very fond of butter on bread or cracker. If bread is given her with no butter on it, she takes it in her mouth, and lays it down close beside her, then looks alternately at the bread and the person who gave it her, and whines. If one says, "Does Cutie want some butter on her bread?" she sneezes, and jumps about with great animation to express her preference, and, when the butter is applied, eats the bread readily.

She dislikes flies very much, and in hot weather spends considerable time catching them. She never eats them, but bites them, and then, dropping them out of her mouth, watches to see if they are dead. If they stir at all, she bites them again until they are lifeless. She also sets a little trap for flies in the following way. When given a piece of cake or any food that flies are apt to eat, she carries it in her mouth to some part of the room where the flies can get at it readily, and then lays it down on the carpet. Then she keeps very still, and watches for the flies to alight upon it. As soon as one appears, she catches him, and then looks for another. We have seen her sit and watch a tempting morsel in this manner for nearly half an hour before eating it. After catching several flies and killing them, she eats up her bait. This was never taught her, but taken up of her own accord.

Cutie dislikes taking a bath; and, if she hears anything said about it, or sees preparations being made for one, she gets out of the way as soon as possible. One day I said to the servant in her hearing, "I must give Cutie a bath," and went to the bath-room to get the water ready. Coming back for Cutie, she was nowhere to be found. We called from room to room, but all was still. At other times she readily comes when called. Knowing that none of the outside doors had been opened in the brief time I had been in the bath-room, I searched room after room, and called, but to no purpose. Finally, I looked into a small bedroom upstairs, the door of which had been left slightly ajar, and was just concluding that she was not there, when a slight and suspicious-looking elevation in the centre of the bed attracted my attention. There was no perceptible motion in this little round elevation, neither was there any apparent disturbance of the pillow-shams or bed-blankets. I called "Cutie!" but there was no response. On going to the bed and laying my hand on the uneven place, I felt beneath this little creature curled up and lying as flat as possible, so as not to be seen. How she could have crawled in there and not have disarranged the pillows or blankets is a mystery. I took her carefully out from between the sheets, while she whined most beseechingly, as if to say, "Oh, don't give me a bath!"

She is exceedingly sensitive, and will appear almost heart-broken if you call her "naughty" (the only punishment she has ever known); while she shows great animation and evident pleasure at being called a "good doggie." Whenever blamed, she can never rest satisfied until it is all made right again, and then often goes to get her little ball or squeaking rubber doll, and bring to have us play with her.

She is always delighted to go out with either her master or mistress, but will never go with a stranger unless told that she may. Then she bounds off with apparent satisfaction. When told that she cannot go, she lies down quietly and will not follow, though the door might be left open. Even when told she may go, and has her blanket on (which she wears out of doors in cold weather), she goes to the farther part of the room and stands or sits erect, waiting in patient expectation for the word "Come." Then she leaps like a deer, and runs about her escort in circles, barking with a peculiar "dog talk" which she uses on such occasions. One day her mistress was making preparations to go out shopping. Cutie noticed it, and ran up to her, playing her fore feet in the air as usual, begging to go, too. Her mistress said: "Cutie can't go this time: she must stay at home, and take care of her master. Master is asleep." The little creature instantly ran quietly up to the sofa where her master lay sleeping, stood up on her hind feet, and balanced herself with one paw resting on the sofa, while she held up the other paw, slightly bent, without touching it to anything. Bending over, she sniffed her master's face without touching it. Then she slowly and carefully put her fore feet down upon the carpet, crawled under the sofa, and lay down quietly, where she was found by her mistress on her return a half-hour later, still guarding her sleeping master.

A crusty old bachelor, who disliked pets, once visited at the house of her master. He said one day, contemptuously, pointing at Cutie: "If I were going to keep a dog, I would have a large one that was good for something, if I were you. She isn't of any use!" From that time Cutie ignored that man. He sometimes tried to call her to him, to test her; but she paid no attention, though extremely fond of being petted. And, if he attempted to put his hand upon her, she showed her teeth and growled,—a thing we never before or since knew her to do to persons admitted to the house. But we sympathized with her, and were glad to see her show a proper resentment.

Enough has been said in the various true stories of dogs to prove that they possess more intelligence than is generally supposed, and that kind and gentle treatment tends largely toward the development of that intelligence. We believe there may be considerable truth in the assertion made by a certain Frenchman, who says, "The best part of a man is the dog there is in him." They are certainly most noble examples of fidelity.

DOLL ORPHANS.

The day after we'd been to the entertainment at the Orphan Asylum Cousin Lilly and Cousin Rose and I sat talking it all over, and Lilly said:—

"What would have become of those poor children without fathers and mothers if good people had not built that big house for them?"

"Oh, poor things! Think of it!" said Rose. "It was so sweet to see them, all alike, in their little blue checked dresses and white aprons, marching into the great hall, looking so happy."

"There are a good many doll orphans," said Lilly,—"dolls who have no one to take care of them."

"I know of one," said I. "She sits all alone in the corner of the arbor of the empty house on our corner. She is on the bench. Her hair is all off, and her face is scratched, and she has nothing on but a flannel skirt."

"Oh!" said Lilly. "And I know of one in our washerwoman's dooryard. It lies on its face. Once I said, 'Mrs. Suds, I think your little girl has left her doll outside.' And she said: 'Oh, no, Miss, dear! It's just an old one she threw away when a good lady gave her a new one.'"

"A deserted doll!" sighed Rose.

"I saw one right in the street the other day," said I. "One of its arms was pulled off."

"How terrible!" said Lilly. "And our mothers would not let us bring such dolls into the house, and we would not want them to live with our own dolls. But I really think we ought to make a home for them."

"Let us do it!" said I. "We all have spending money. Why not take some of it and provide for orphan dolls?"

"Where shall the home be?" asked Lilly.

"There is a little building at the end of our garden," said I; "and there are two rooms in it. Brother Tom has a workshop in one, and I'm sure we can have the other. There is a stove there in winter. The gardener builds a fire there every day for Tom, and it is good and warm."

"The very place!" said Rose.

So that evening I asked mamma if I could have the room for a dolls' orphanage, and she said, "Yes, of course." So I told Lilly and Rose, and that night we sent cards to all our friends. This is what we said:—

If you know of any doll orphans, kindly send them to our home. We have opened an asylum. By orphans we mean thrown-away dolls, of which nobody takes care.

LILLY, ROSE, KITTY.

Then we went about to look for our orphans; and the doll in the arbor of the empty house, the washerwoman's doll, and the doll that lay in the street were brought in. We showed them to Nurse Elizabeth; and she washed them all with ammonia, and put them in the sun to dry. So they were clean, but dreadful. Six little girls brought in ten more little orphans. Sarah Pool brought three. She had a grown-up sister, who had put her dolls up garret, neglected, but clean. Sarah said her mother would not let her have any but new ones to play with. Mary Brown brought one that was up in a tree. Every one had a history. Cousin Lilly, who had heard her mother talk of the management of the orphanage, wrote down all that was known of them in a composition-book, with their names. We had to name them. We began with "A," and they were: Anna, Bertha, Clara, Delia, Ellen, Fannie, Gracie, Helen, Ida, and Jessie, Kate, Laura, and Maria and Nellie. So we had fourteen dolls. One I have not mentioned. Brother Tom took it away from a boy who was putting her in a bonfire. Brother Tom was interested: he came to our meeting. All the girls who brought orphan dolls came, and we took up a collection for blue gingham and white plaid muslin to dress them all alike in. Because so many had lost all their hair, we made caps for them; and Tom—was ever such a good brother?—painted all their faces white, with pink cheeks and blue eyes. Tom contributed twenty-five cents. He is rather rich. Papa gives him an allowance of fifty cents a week.

Never shall I forget the day when all our sewing was done, all our dolls dressed, all our little beds made,—each with white quilt, blankets, and pillows,—and our doll orphanage ready for its reception, and we sent cards to all our mothers and fathers. Our place was in good order, with matting on the floor and pictures from old picture-books on the wall; and every doll stood beside her bed. And Tom had written an address. It was this:—

Ladies and Gentlemen,—I feel honored to be called upon to speak at the opening of our new Dolls' Orphanage. You will see how healthy and happy all our orphan dolls look; and there is a saucer on the table in the next room to receive any contributions you may please to give, as we hope to enlarge our charity.

Then everybody clapped their hands, and almost everybody laughed; and papa explained that that was because they were so much pleased. But grandma cried a little and said that it was such a beautiful idea, and that we were little angels; and she gave us a dollar. Everybody gave us some money, so now we can at any time get other beds and more gingham; and we wish to say that we are ready to welcome any orphan dolls who have heads left. When their heads are gone, we think they must be dead; but we would sew any loose ones on, and they would be painted.—New York Ledger.

THE STORY OF A SQUIRREL.

About a year ago a baby gray squirrel was found crawling helplessly at the foot of one of the great pine-trees at Round Lake. He was the most fascinating bit of silvery-gray and white babyhood that could be imagined. He had a tip-tilted pink nose, and a slender plume of a tail that gave no promise of the great feathery proportions it afterward attained.

He fell into kindly keeping, and was brought up in one of the cottages, like Pip of "Great Expectations," "by hand." When he had attained the mature age of four weeks, as nearly as could be estimated, he began to eat nuts. Candy was given to him, occasionally ripe apples and other tidbits. He built a nest in the eaves of the cottage, and established himself in his home. He was sent out into the woods when he was about six weeks old, and learned the secret of climbing the heights of the great pine-trees and leaping from bough to bough. He found where the sweetest forest nuts grew, and learned all the pleasures of wild squirrel life. Nevertheless, he did not desert his human friends, but came back regularly to his nest as soon as the shadows of evening began to gather. After snow came the little fellow would come into the house several times during the day, apparently for no other purpose than to warm himself by the glowing hearth-fire in the living-room. He was full of frolic on these occasions, sat by the fire and danced on the lounge, making the most picturesque little circles in the air in the progress of his play.

A ball of rubber, a spool of gay silk, almost anything, became a plaything. He played with paper napkins, and rolled them into the most absurd crinkly balls for no purpose but play. Sometimes he would disappear in the midst of his fun, and return with an air of "on business bent," bringing a couple of nuts, which he would proceed to put down the back of the neck of any female friend who might be playing with him: he shunned the male shirt-collar. As he never looked for these nuts again, it was supposed that he regarded them as his contribution to the general support of the family, and did not consider his friends in the light of walking store-places for his own benefit. He was very fond of candy, and showed delight whenever a box of fresh bonbons was opened. He would take one, and then another, when they were offered him, and would eat them with an air of a connoisseur in sweets. After this he would smooth down the lace papers around the candy-box with his deft little paws, and tuck them around the remainder of the candy, watching to see the cover put on. He never attempted to take any away to "store," as he did nuts. He trusted, apparently, to his human friends to save the candy for him,—a confidence which was often abused.

About Christmas time the little squirrel left his friends. It was mating season, and they had long known that there was another little gray squirrel in the woods to whom he took nuts. They could see him leaping (or thought they could) about in the great branches of the highest hemlocks; but, apparently, he had forgotten his friends. When spring came, the workmen who were repairing the cottage found a little squirrel, who often came about and showed an appetite for cooked dainties in their luncheon pails. On one occasion a piece of custard pie was missing; and the man looked up and saw a gray squirrel sitting under a tree with a piece of pie in his paws, eating it gravely down from the point, in human fashion, not nibbling the crust in vulgar rat fashion style. Apprehension was felt that the little pet squirrel was the thief, but nothing more was heard of him during the summer mating season. In the fall, when the nutting season was at its height, the squirrels in the grove, owing to the partial failure of the nut crop, were unusually clamorous at the cottage doors. There came with them one little fellow who forcibly demanded entrance, instead of timidly standing off like the others. He sprang up at the door, and scratched like the old pet for admittance. When he was let in, he proceeded to bury nuts about the cottage in all his old places. One of the young ladies tried the effect of drumming on the lounge,—a movement which, the year before, would invariably set him into an ecstasy of play.

He answered the signal, and laid himself on his back, and played in the old kittenish fashion. A squirrel's movements are so much lighter and more rapid than those of a kitten that the comparison seems inadequate. It is a thing of the wild forest, a beauty of motion born amid the waving pine needles,—a grace that cannot be compared with that of any domestic thing. The little squirrel from this moment was known. In his mute, wild way he had told his story. He now comes regularly to the cottage, and asks to come in. He sleeps in the pine-trees; but in the cold, gray dawn he comes to the bedroom windows and flattens his nose against the pane, and pleads to be let in and have his breakfast with the family.—New York Tribune.

EDUCATION OF THE HINDU GIRL.

The greatest care and anxiety of the Hindu mother is to bring up her daughter to home life and make her a good housewife. When a girl is seven years of age, her mother teaches her to cook and to clean the pots. Hindus have two kinds of washing. One is the daily washing of every-day apparel, for the clothes are changed every morning after bathing. Every Hindu must bathe before he takes his meals. Religion requires that no food be cooked before the person who cooks it has bathed. A woman first gives a bath to her children, then she takes a bath herself, and thereafter goes to cook. The clothes are changed and washed every day.

The mother teaches the little girl to sew and to embroider, and to make her toilet, which is simple. She has no paint on her cheeks and no hooks and thorns in her hair. She adorns her hair with ornamental flowers made of gold. These are fixed on the knot of hair. A small round mark of red paint is made on her forehead. The absence of the mark from the forehead of a woman indicates that she is a widow, for widows have not the privilege of wearing it. By the time she is fifteen she learns all things pertaining to general housekeeping and cookery. In short, the mother makes her daughter a good housekeeper before she goes to live with her husband.

NOT A MATHEMATICIAN.

Mr. Birkbeck Hill (an Oxonian), in his recent book on Harvard College, admits that nothing could surpass the grossness of the ignorance of many of the English undergraduates who may have come up, or, rather, have been kicked up, from the most famous schools. Mr. Hill says that he used to hear one of the first mathematicians of Oxford piteously lament the fate which condemned him to try to pound a little arithmetic into the heads of young men whose understandings had been hopelessly disordered or were congenitally feeble. "Why, sir, do you not use your common sense?" he one day asked, impatiently, one of his pupils. "I did not know that common sense had anything to do with arithmetic," was the reply. Another undergraduate, fresh from Eton, was seen by his tutor adding up a column in which he had entered two shillings and sixpence six times over. He was thus laboriously arriving at the cost of half a dozen pairs of stockings which he had just bought. "Why do you not do it by multiplying?" asked the tutor. "I do not know what you mean," the youth modestly answered. When the process was shown to him, and all the mystery of the multiplication-table was unveiled, he was much taken with the extraordinary facilities which it afforded.

FAITHFUL TILL DEATH.

A Wisconsin farmer was recently "drowning out" gophers in his cornfield, when a mother gopher came struggling through the torrent with a little one, which she laid at his feet, and immediately descended to her nest and brought up a second. After breathing for a moment, she went down again, and soon came struggling up with a third, but died as she emerged from the water-filled hole.—Our Dumb Animals.

SLOWLY STARVING.

Surrounded by Plenty, but Dying for Food.

An Every-day Occurrence.—Our Friends Perishing Before Our Eyes.

A terrible experience for any one to go through, that of seeing some beloved friend actually wasting away before our eyes, unable to derive sufficient nourishment from their food to sustain life.

Medicine naturally becomes of little avail, and the various organs of the body, debilitated from a lack of nourishment, take on themselves the disease that was originally the cause of the "breakdown," and help hasten the end.

Such cases, though too prevalent, are happily becoming less frequent. The prominent physicians of to-day do things differently from those of twenty years ago. They first put the patient in a condition to stand the "siege," then enrich his blood, create for him new strength, and "build him up" generally. The patient is then in a condition to derive benefit from his medicine.

This is done by the use of Bovinine, the original raw food. It is an extract that contains the greatest amount of the life-sustaining and tissue-building properties of lean, raw meat, concentrated in the least possible bulk.

The advantage of this is obvious. A patient already greatly weakened by disease, needs to husband every particle of strength. A few drops of Bovinine will impart as much nourishment to the body as would be derived by a well person from an ordinary meal; and, in getting this nourishment, the stomach has been forced to do the least possible amount of work.

Bovinine, continued throughout an illness, greatly hastens recovery. Taken at the beginning of a wasting disease, it diverts the cause of the trouble by toning up the various organs, and getting them in a normal condition.

Bovinine is indorsed by 25,000 doctors. Its action is always beneficial, as a single trial will convince the most sceptical.

PROF. THOMAS METCALF.

In the death of this veteran teacher, who for twenty-eight years was closely connected with the State Normal School at Bloomington, Ill., the West has not only lost one of its best known, most respected, and universally loved educators, but the Unitarians of the West, and all those who work for liberal religion and practical Christianity, have lost a devoted coworker. He was a man who advanced our cause by exemplifying its nobility more than by argument or controversy. He was indeed one of the pillars of the church at Bloomington, serving it in every possible capacity, from preacher to usher. In the Sunday-school work, both at home and in the broader field of the Unitarian Western Sunday School Society, he was always a most diligent worker. Prof. Metcalf represented the finest issues of New England life,—a Massachusetts boy who early in life carried West that fine blending of culture and moral enthusiasm which gathered into itself strength and intensity in the larger opportunities of the West. He was a man of deep reverence without superstition, by temperament a conservative, but by conscience and culture a radical in the profoundest sense of the word,—a man who sought reality, expected new light, and welcomed larger vision. His position as head of the training department in this great normal college for fourteen years made him pre-eminently the teacher of teachers, and through the young men and women that have gone out from under his tuition to all parts of the country he still lives and works. The mortal remains were carried back, and they now rest in the bosom of Massachusetts earth. His spirit remains in the West; and those who knew him and loved him send grateful thanks to New England for this high gift, and humbly pray for more. Let New England send more of such men into our missionary fields, and we will need fewer of its dollars. J. L. J.

Charities and Reforms.

The latest result reported of the Day Nursery Exhibit at the Columbian Exposition at Chicago is the establishment of a Day Nursery in Georgetown, British Guiana. A gentleman from that place visited the Nursery in the Children's Building, and was so impressed with the practical wisdom of the institution that he took back with him the rules and regulations guiding the Day Nursery work in this country. There are also reported two new Day Nurseries in the West started from the Day Nursery Exhibit.—The Altruist Interchange.

A Stundist woman from a village in the province of Kieff has just left Rostoff, on the Don, in the company of a gang of prisoners bound for the Caucasus. She has been banished for a term of five years by administrative process on a charge of adherence to Protestant tenets after repeated requests from her village priests to renounce her heresy. She has left a husband and two quite young children in Russia. Whole families are often enough sent from their homes on charges of heresy,—the usual course, however, is for the head of the house to be banished,—but this is the first instance, to our knowledge, of a woman being transported for this offence.—Christian World.

On October 12 the Loan Bureau of St. Bartholomew's Episcopal Church completed eight months of its career, with results which are far from unsatisfactory to Dr. Greer and others who are particularly interested in the problem of lending money to the worthy at low rates. A total sum of $24,554.50 had been loaned up to that day, and the repayments amounted to nearly $8,000. Loans were made to 768 different families, embracing nearly all trades and professions, many nationalities, and a great variety of religious belief. The losses sustained by the fund thus far have been extremely few and small, and no mortgages have been foreclosed. The holders of outstanding loans are paying their monthly instalments regularly, and over sixty loans have been paid off and cancelled.

The "Tenement House" number of the Altruist Interchange ought to be widely read. It is true, as the editors confess, that the tenement-house perplexity is a question so vast and so complicated that these articles, suggestive as they are, do not include all that might and ought to be said. The question is first stated thus: "The subject may be viewed from two important points,—from that of the political economist and from that of the humanitarian as well. From the vantage-ground of the former, these human hives teeming with population seem a menace. They mean a wrong balance in the books of the body politic. They mean crime and want and resultant jails, asylums, hospitals, and workhouses, to be maintained at public cost. The sight of human beings upon whom God's sunshine rarely falls, who know nothing but narrow court-yards and dirty alleys, who are more absolutely the slaves of the "sweater" than black man ever was of Southern planter, brings to the humanitarian a feeling akin to despair. There is no use in shutting our eyes to the wretched conditions of tenement-house life: they exist,—the only question is one of remedy, and speedy remedy at that." The leading article is by M. Katharine Jones, and describes the conditions in New York.

A plan of organized work, novel in many particulars, has been devised by Miss Margaret Hard, of Englewood, N.J., which, if it can be carried into execution, will be the most practical exponent possible of the doctrine of altruism. An association has been formed called the Society of Consecrated Talent, whose fundamental principle is that each member shall make one personal effort a year or shall donate the income of one day to further the purposes of the society. The purpose of the organization is a combination of Toynbee Hall, People's Palace, and College Settlement. While making no claim to distinct originality, the society is broad in its scope. It spreads its drag-net of charity and kindness broadcast, and draws in from every class servers as well as those to be served. In forming the plan, cardinal, priest, rabbi, evangelical clergyman, rector, ethical teacher, musician, teacher, physician, author, artist, actor, and society men and women have evinced their interest and pledged their co-operation. Following the trend of the times, the plan aims at two important ends,—non sectarianism and centralization of work, recognizing in this latter particular the teaching of the day, that the principle of modern business must be applied to the distribution of modern charity.—The Altruist Interchange.

An event to be remembered in the Eddowes household occurred at Greeley, Col., on Oct. 24, 1894, when Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Eddowes celebrated their golden wedding. Mrs. Sarah E. Howard, a warm friend of the family, composed a poem for the occasion, which was read before a pleasant gathering of friends. Mr. Eddowes is a grandson of Ralph Eddowes, one of the founders of Unitarianism in this country. Mr. and Mrs. Eddowes are both over seventy years of age, and are as devoted to one another now as they were fifty years ago. Mr. Eddowes entertained his guests by playing a few tunes on the flute he played when first married.

Not Up to the Mark

—that's the way with the imitations of Pearline. It isn't surprising that so great a household help in all washing and cleaning should be so largely imitated; it isn't surprising that these imitations fail; and it isn't surprising that they make still more popular the article on which the fraud is attempted. The merits of Pearline alone would make its sales increase, and the claims of peddlers and unscrupulous grocers that they have "the same as" or "as good as" Pearline—mind you, never "better than" Pearline—have placed Pearline on the top notch.

Beware

Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you, "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, if your grocer sends you an imitation, be honest—send it back.

THE RED CROSS.

An article has recently been issued by the Red Cross Society which explains its origin and methods. The ideas which culminated in the International Treaty, now adhered to by forty-four separate nationalities, were conceived by M. Henri Dunant, a Swiss gentleman, a member of the Society of Public Utility of Switzerland. Happening to witness the battle of Solferino in Italy, June 24, 1859, he became horror-stricken by the needless suffering of the wounded and dying, who lay upon the field for days without medical aid. M. Dunant described in a souvenir book which he wrote the scenes which so profoundly stirred him.

He sets forth in his book plans for joining the governments of the world in an international compact which should afford immunity and protection to civil aid upon battlefields, thereby augmenting the military medical facilities and reducing the needless suffering. His ideas were earnestly taken up by his society; and, with the aid and co-operation of the Swiss Federal Council, a conference of nations was held in Geneva in October, 1863. And that was followed by the Geneva Convention of August, 1864, at which the treaty which bears that name was created. This treaty was at once signed by sixteen leading nations, which number has since been increased to forty, including the United States. The latter gave its adhesion by act of Congress March 1, 1882. The act was ratified by the Congress of Berne—the international ratifying power—June 9, 1882, and proclamation by President Arthur June 26, 1882. The incoming administration of 1881 was the first to awaken to the national importance of the Red Cross; and to the lamented Garfield, Arthur, Blaine, and Windom is due the credit of grasping the merits of the treaty with the utmost fervor. The Red Cross (a red Greek cross on a white ground) is the universally adopted emblem or insignia of that organization which is known as the Red Cross Treaty of Geneva. The resolutions of the Geneva Conference provide that there shall be in every treaty country one committee, and only one, whose duty it shall be to co-operate in time of war by all the means in its power with the medical and sanitary service of the army; and this committee shall place itself in communication with the government of its own country, in order that its offers of assistance in case of need may be accepted. In the event of war the committees of belligerent nations shall furnish relief to their respective armies in proportion to their respective resources; and, if need be, they shall solicit the assistance of committees of neutral nations within the treaty. With the concurrence of the military authorities they shall, upon request, place nurses upon the battlefields, but only under the direction of the military commanders. The interchange of communications between the several national committees is made through the Swiss committee, which bears the title of the "Comité International." As early as 1865 it had been indirectly proposed that the committees might increase their usefulness by relief work in cases of calamities other than war, but the proposal met with no favor. It was not until the formation of the United States Committee in 1881 that such a feature, owing to the earnest advocacy of such a progressive measure by Miss Clara Barton, took practical form, and thereby broadened the scope of the humane work. The matter was laid before the International Committee, which ably seconded Miss Barton's efforts. By that committee it was submitted to the other treaty countries; and, finally, unanimous sanction was given. The change or addition to the original intention became known as the "American Amendment." What this amendment has meant to the sufferers by fire, flood, pestilence, cyclones, and other great calamities in our own country during the past dozen years, need not be repeated here.

There is hardly a section of the country that has not made its acknowledgment in tears of gratitude. Upon adopting the treaty of the Geneva Convention, each nation is required to at once instruct its army in the philanthropic and humane objects, and the provisions of the treaty. Japan gave its adhesion to the Treaty of Geneva in 1886. In 1889, at the third reunion of the Japanese Red Cross Association, his majesty the emperor was tendered and accepted the presidency. In accepting, the emperor spoke as follows: "I am more than honored by this distinguished assembly in receiving and accepting this honorable position. It will give me great pleasure to be an active worker in an active association."

The full protection of the emblem of the Red Cross was given by an imperial decree forbidding its use for any purpose except by the army and the Red Cross Association. There can be little wonder, then, that the association is doing such noble and efficient work during the present hostilities; nor that the Japanese Minister of War promulgated, on September 22 last, a notice to the army and to the inhabitants recalling to their minds their obligations and duties in behalf of the cause of duty and mercy to the suffering, sick, and wounded, whether of their own army or that of their enemy.

A close relationship exists between the American and Japanese Associations. A delegation of citizens of Tokio waited on Miss Clara Barton, president of the American National Red Cross in 1886, and requested of her information and forms as to the organization of and methods employed by the American committee; and it is most probable that, should the exigencies of the present war tax the Japanese Association beyond its capacity, the American committee would be among the first to be applied to for assistance. And no other national committee would be more generous or prompt in its response. The spirit of the Geneva Treaty insists that, immediately a soldier is wounded or becomes disabled by sickness, he is no longer a belligerent, but becomes from that moment a neutral, a subject for the merciful care of those employed in administering relief under the treaty. Hence Japan, by instructing her army to show the same degree of tender mercy to a wounded, sick, or even a dead Chinese soldier that they would to their own, is simply carrying out with the most commendable faithfulness the obligations she took upon herself when her solemn signature and seal were given to the Geneva Convention, because this is not more nor less than every other treaty nation has pledged itself to do. This is what the Red Cross means; and no better object-lesson could be given to those who would know what the Red Cross is than that now being shown by the treatment of Japan toward her own and her enemy's sick and wounded. The notable and commendable charity of Japan so widely spoken of to-day is the result not so much of the "exceptionable humanity, progress, and advancement" of Japan as of the protection of the Red Cross, the co-operation of her military with it, and the strict discipline of her troops in regard to it. Japan is not only in perfect accord with the letter and spirit of the Red Cross, but her splendid work in this war challenges the admiration of the world. His majesty the emperor at once grasped the vital principle which is the foundation of the Red Cross,—the protection of its insignia,—and, having enacted laws prohibiting its use by any one unauthorized by the Red Cross Society or the War Department, is enabled to carry out the wise and beneficent provisions of the Geneva Convention unhampered.

The American National Red Cross has its headquarters at Washington. Its presidency was tendered to President Garfield, who declined in favor of Miss Clara Barton, "as a just recognition of her valuable services in having brought the Red Cross into this country, and carried the treaty through Congress and the American Amendment through the foreign ratifying powers."

Our American National Red Cross, under its amendment, has rendered relief in great disasters in civil life of the last twelve years. It now remains to be seen how well our government and people would perform their part in recognition, protection, and discipline in case of war.

ASK THEM Why?

Ask the men who are making imitations of COTTOLENE, the new vegetable shortening, why they give up lard and try to trade on the merits of COTTOLENE? Perhaps you can guess why.

ASK HIM Why?

Ask the grocer who attempts substitution, why he tries to sell an imitation when people call for that pure, palatable and popular vegetable shortening, COTTOLENE? Perhaps you can guess.

ASK YOURSELF Why?

Why should not YOU use COTTOLENE, instead of Lard for all cooking purposes? It has the highest possible endorsement; from Physicians as to healthfulness; from Cooking Experts as to superiority; from housekeepers as to economy. Use COTTOLENE and stick to it.

A little girl was overheard talking to her doll, whose arm had come off, exposing the sawdust stuffing: "You dear, good, obedient dolly! I knew I had told you to chew your food fine, but I didn't think that you would chew it so fine as that."

A little girl had a kitten. She was very fond of it, and it was a great delight to her to hear it purr. One night she was restless, and her mother said, "Cynthia, why don't you lie still and go to sleep?" "I can't," answered the little one, "papa purrs so loud."

In trying to gain a rational explanation of how a human mind can disappoint its proprietor, a story of an Oakland litigant throws some light on the problem. A friend asked him how he happened to lose his case. "Oh," he replied, "I had a lawyer who got to talking, and went off and left his mouth running." TRIALS OF A NATURALIST'S WIFE.

Richard spent the evening in examining some of the minute worms found in the muscles of a man (Trichina spiralis). . . . R. assured me that, in comparison to what surgeons had often to meddle with, it was sweet.

January 5 (1836).—Richard went to Bruton Street to cut up an ostrich. He is now engaged in writing on the "paper nautilus," and there is a lovely little specimen in spirits on the table.

June 21.—Engaged all day in drawing a wombat's brain for R. . . . 26th.—Finished the wombat's brain.

November 17.—Last night a kangaroo (dead) came to R. from the Zoo.

December 28.—Wrapped up the tortoise in flannel before I went to bed, and put it in the cellar.

April 11 (1837).—Dr. A. Farre and Mr. Darwin came here this afternoon. After tea muscular fibre and microscope in the drawing-room.

February 1.—The defunct rhinoceros (late of Wombwell's menagerie) arrived while R. was out. I told the men to take it right to the end of the long passage, where it now lies. As yet I feel indifferent, but when the pie is opened—

February 6.—R. is still at the rhinoceros.

November 21 (1849).—R. brought back with him to dinner Dr. Buckland, Prof. Agassiz, and Dr. Mantell, and afterward entertained them to their hearts' content with the microscope. They made some experiments in blood globules. Dr. Buckland's blood irregular, that of Agassiz regular. Dr. Mantell, who stated that he had a very slow circulation, on examination proved to have blood globules of a decidedly larger size than the others.

April 10 (1843).—He dissected a chimpanzee. Willie watched his father dissecting till he himself smelt like a specimen preserved in rum.

June 11 (1846).—The presence of a portion of the defunct elephant on the premises made me keep all the windows open, especially as the weather is very mild. I got R. to smoke cigars all over the house.

February 16.—Found the cook had a queer-looking bit of fish, which R. had brought in and told her to cook for dinner. There was only part of it in the kitchen, and I did not recognize it. The cook's chief objection seemed to be the name (Anarrhichas lupus) which her master had called it, and she was doubtful if a fish with such a name could be a fit thing to send up to a table. It turned out to be what they call a "wolf-fish," and R. declared it not at all bad.—From the Diary of the Wife of Sir Richard Owen.

Editorial.

THE full text of the last encyclical of Pope Leo to the Church in America has just been given out. It is moderate, pacific, and conciliatory. It is of more interest to Catholics than to non-Catholics, because it chiefly relates to the condition and administration of the Catholic Church in America. The faithful are exhorted to submit loyally to the authority of the Church, the bishops are exhorted to concord, the position of the papal legate is defined. The attitude of Catholics in regard to divorce is commended, and they are exhorted to shun secret societies. In considering the causes of the prosperity of the Catholic Church in America, the pope says: "The main factor, no doubt, in bringing things into this happy state were the ordinances and decrees of your synods. But, moreover, thanks are due to the equity of the laws which obtain in America, and to the customs of the well-ordered republic. For the Church among you—unopposed by the Constitution and government of your nation, fettered by no hostile legislation, protected against violence by the common laws and the impartiality of the tribunals—is free to live and act without hindrance."

REFLECTING, however, that such a eulogy of American institutions might be deemed a disparagement of monarchical institutions and a surrender of the prerogative of the Vatican, the pope says: "Yet it would be very erroneous to draw the conclusion that in America is to be sought the type of the most desirable states of the Church, or that it would be universally lawful or expedient for State and Church to be, as in America, dissevered and divorced. The Church would bring forth more abundant fruits if, in addition to liberty, she enjoyed the favor of the laws and the patronage of the public authority." This is very frank, and is unquestionably true. Roman Catholicism is monarchical in its history, character, and spirit; and, undoubtedly, this has led to much opposition from Protestants, which has grown to be bigoted and unjust. Though the pope is true to the genius of Catholicism, he nevertheless accepts the Constitution of this country as it is. "The Church," he remarks, "should keep pace with the great republic in the march of improvement, and aid in its growth." And this he would seek to bring about, not by any political method, but by strengthening the constitution of the Church, and by the spread of education.

THERE are two ways of doing missionary work. One is to plant seed, and water and cultivate it, and train it into organic life: the other is to seek to create the atmosphere which makes things grow and blossom and fruit. The influence of Unitarianism has been largely atmospheric. It has sought to create, and has succeeded in some measure in creating, a more genial climate; it has swept away clouds which obscured the sun; it has proclaimed a philosophy of religion and life which are gladder and brighter for it. And all this is a service not to be lightly estimated. But what it still needs to do is the work of seed-sowing and cultivating. This can only be done by the laborer in the field. The laborers are coming now more numerous than ever to till the old fields; but what is also needed is that missionary genius which prompts and fits men to sow the seed in a new soil, and to water and tend it until it becomes a strong and well-rooted and independent growth.

ARE the signs of the times in this nineteenth century more hopeful, or are they more depressing? There are those who do not hesitate to maintain that the world is getting worse,—that the outlook, at any rate, is more depressing than encouraging. If this be true, it constitutes, first, an indictment of human society, and then of the Providence which rules the world. It were sad, indeed, if, after centuries of development, the verdict of human consciousness were that this very development in the world had made men less fitted to enjoy the present or to hope for the future. The development of human consciousness enables man to recognize and to feel the pain of conditions which would not be felt in a state of savagery; but the same development enables him to discern and to devise methods of relief, and to recognize grounds of hope and promise which cannot be seen or felt by the shorter-sighted intellect of the savage or the child-man. It would be sad indeed if, with the development of science, art, literature, ethics, and religion, there should not be a basis for a philosophy of life which would be hopeful and encouraging. We believe most assuredly that a cold, chilling agnosticism, or a lurid pessimism, is not to be the outcome of either science or religion. For our religious faith there is a basis as firm as Immutability itself; and for our hope there is the inspiration of a trust in God and the belief that man, through his development, may help God to realize his purposes in human life and society.

THE Boston Transcript calls attention to the fact that, while Unitarianism has not suffered from any serious secession, it is obliged to meet a problem which comes from the accessions it has received from other denominations: "The number of ministers who have during the last few years joined the Unitarian fellowship in different parts of the country is such as to have completely changed the proportion between the number of vacant parishes and the number of available ministers. A few years ago the proportion gave the churches trouble: it was hard to obtain the required supplies. Now the burden falls on the ministers, and men are on the waiting list who would formerly have been eagerly sought. This state of things affects not only those who have come into this ministry, but those who are ready to do so; and men who would be counted accessories in more senses than one have been advised to postpone such action. The breakers ahead are those of the topmost waves which fall in advance of the mass. There are, in fact, more ministers than the denomination knows what to do with."

THIS is a state of affairs which furnishes Unitarianism with an opportunity which it ought not to be slow to embrace. It has prayed and pleaded for messengers to take the gospel, and now the messengers are coming faster than they can be sent. Commenting upon the significant fact, the Boston Transcript continues: "But this is a problem that most denominations would like to face. It has its difficulties, but it has also its promise. Our figure of the breakers should carry us not to the shallows, but to a tidal force behind. The tendency which now brings the burden upon the profession will afterward distribute that burden, so as to turn it into strength for the Church at large. A movement which has brought strong leaders and is now gathering strength, even in its restraint, is a prophecy of the time when it will spread among the people. This cannot fail to be the significance of the remarkable fact that we have noted. It is an embarrassment of riches. The overproduction has its root in causes which are bound to balance it in increased distribution. Where the shepherds go, those who know the voice of the shepherd will follow; and we venture the prophecy that the legend of Unitarian secessions will finally vanish before the fact of Unitarian increment, which, as present accessions indicate, will not be unearned."

THE political crisis in France has been followed by a political crisis in Greece, though there is necessarily no connection between them. President Casimir-Périer had a short and unimportant career, terminated by his own resignation under the feeling that the responsibilities of the office were too great for him. The return of imperialism in France would be a calamity; and it is a question whether the French Constitution would not be greatly improved if it were fashioned more after our own, with a president elected for a definite period. Undoubtedly, it would be a relief to many French patriots if they knew that the new president, M. Felix Faure, would remain in the office for the next four years. In Greece Mr. Tricoupi, having failed to secure the majority in the Voulé, has resigned. Statesmen in Greece are not plentiful; and, financially, the situation of the country is very unfortunate. It is possible that Mr. Delyannis, for many years an opponent of Tricoupi, may be called to succeed him. But he is an old man; and, though he has enthusiastic followers, it is doubtful if he can secure the confidence of the whole people or maintain for any length of time a majority in the Chamber.

EVIDENTLY, Broad Churchism has assumed somewhat alarming proportions in the estimation of the bishops of the Episcopal Church. Their pastoral letter recently published is one prolonged cry of "Wolf!" The substance of this letter demands more extended comment than can here be given; but the bearing of its observations lies in the application of them, and this is not left in uncertainty. "A heresy which would seek at the altar protection from the penalty of a violated vow forfeits the respect and tenderness due to honest doubt." We know well enough at whom this is aimed, as surely as if names were spoken. These good bishops are strenuous that their clergy shall not be guilty of "handling the word of God deceitfully." We wonder if some of these latter may not ask whether their shepherds make the most honest use of Scripture when, after being commanded not to stray in word or thought beyond the narrow pastures of the past, they are exhorted to "stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has made them free!" However, the letter is proof that signs of independent thought have awakened some apprehension in the Episcopal breast, and is therefore evidence that progress has been made.

THE Outlook, "though not conscious of any occasion for it as a letter of admonition or warning," responds to the "Pastoral" with warm professions of its own adherence to the Apostles' Creed. You see, my Lords spiritual, that, if your suspicions have glanced at us, they are quite misplaced. Really, the outside world must smile a little at the artlessness of these professions. The bishop's letter explicitly sets forth the historic faith that Jesus Christ is "the only Son of God." The Outlook believes in "Jesus Christ as God manifest in the flesh," and would seem to have its readers think that the two statements are quite the same. It thinks that "the tendency of our age is not to minimize, but rather to exalt the doctrine of the incarnation." Quite true! But is its own doctrine of the incarnation that which the bishops have now reaffirmed? We fear the bishops will not be convinced by the Outlook's declarations and will want to examine it still further before admitting it to full fellowship.

OUR SOUTHERN WORK.

In the new South that is rising it seems now possible to renew the interest in the work of the Unitarian Church which was excited in the early part of this century. When John Adams and John C. Calhoun signed the covenant of the Unitarian church in Washington, it seemed possible to such men as Thomas Jefferson that Unitarianism would soon be established throughout the South. The causes which led to the defeat of that expectation are now in the past. A new generation is coming forward, to whom this is ancient history. Again the causes are at work which make it possible to commend the principles of the "religion of the two commandments" (as Mr. Chaney likes to call it) to the cultivated people of the South. There is no considerable Southern community in which there are not men and women of great intelligence and high culture, who know what is going on in the higher realms of thought. They know, and frequently say in letters and private conversations, that ideas are abroad which will certainly destroy the claims of the churches which offer an exclusive salvation. No matter how many thousands follow those who preach the old creeds, they know that intelligence is quietly moving out from the shadow of the old beliefs.

The obituary notice recently published in the Register is one instance of many. Dr. Hall of Coosada, Ala., a colonel in the Confederate army, a man of social influence, falling in with some of our literature by chance, became an ardent Unitarian. One whose father was a planter and a slaveholder, a graduate of Harvard College, and a graduate from Calvinism, writes: "The South affords a great field for Unitarian work. Wherever I go, I find men and women to whom the old orthodox house no longer affords shelter. They are ready and willing to enter upon a broader life, if only they can find some leader to follow."

We are slowly coming back to social and political conditions which are favorable to the spread of liberal ideas and principles without the interference of sectional prejudice. The Unitarian Church, so far as it is a temporal institution, is founded on the principles which underly the Constitution and government of the American republic. Trust in human nature, confidence that freedom of thought is essential, and belief that whatever improves the quality of the life is of first importance,—these are simple working principles. They commend themselves to men and women of intelligence everywhere. They are working to some degree in all churches, but there ought to be a great future for the one that puts them forward as its characteristic methods. Whatever else it may do, the Unitarian Church of necessity makes its appeal to that class of men and women who reveal themselves wherever they are as ladies and gentlemen, without carrying the mark of the town or city in which they may happen to have been born. There are a few hundred thousands of such human beings who recognize each other wherever they may meet,—whether in Paris or San Francisco, in Boston or Tokio. They read the same books, they are interested in the same subjects, they have similar moral standards, and they have the same social traditions and habits. In the South there are many of this class. From this time onward it will be an increasing class. It comprises the men and women from whom ideas will work downward through all the strata of social and political life, until they reach the bottom. Whatever else it may do, the Unitarian Church ought to appeal directly to this class. Winning them, it will win the creators of public opinion,—those who fix the standards of social excellence; those who, in time, will be imitated and followed by the less intelligent classes.

To do this kind of work does not in any way make it necessary to overlook or neglect any other class in the South. The work among the freedmen and their children has appealed successfully to the imagination and the conscience of Northern people, and it has seemed to be both a duty and a privilege to take some part in the civilization of the colored people. The response has been eager and inspiring. The poor whites have to a less extent excited the interest and attracted the attention of Northern Unitarians, although the work to be done among them is equally important for the welfare of the nation. But it would be a mistake of the first magnitude to suppose that Northern Unitarians can confine their interest and attention exclusively or mainly to the less intelligent classes of the South with any hope of permanent success. The many problems which must arise between races so different can only be settled by bringing the intelligence of the South to bear upon them through the highest moral and social ethics. If Unitarianism is what we believe it to be, it follows as the day the night that a Unitarian church in the South, rightly formed and well developed, will be made up of men and women who regard their relations with the less fortunate members of society about them from the highest point of view. Planting such a church in Georgia, for instance; making it really a success; getting together a large congregation of men and women thoroughly alive with the inspiration of this form of religion,—we have made a centre from which streams of the best moral and religious influence will flow into all the community around.

A Unitarian church solidly established anywhere becomes by natural processes the fountain-head of every kind of social reform and progress. Benevolence of every rational kind flows naturally from such an institution. Public spirit is generated; and, greatly out of proportion to their numbers, the men and women in such a church will be chosen to conduct affairs of State. Patriots, lovers of our common country, all who believe in and are ready to work for a great future for our republican institutions, may put all their power into a sound-hearted, well-organized Unitarian church, confident of reaching through that all the higher interests of human life.

JOHN FARWELL MOORS.

After a long and lingering illness Dr. Moors died last Sunday at his home in Greenfield; and thus another marked Unitarian minister has gone. He was favored in his ancestry; for his parents, in their position and character, were typical illustrations of the best features of New England yeomanry. Born a farmer's boy, in Groton, Mass., Dec. 10, 1819, he was trained in the schools and academy of his native town, and entered Harvard College in 1838, and graduated in 1842. Then, after the usual three years' course at the Divinity School, he graduated in 1845; and early in the next year, January 28, he was ordained over the First Congregational Unitarian Church of Deerfield, Mass., where he remained until he was invited to take charge of the Third Congregational Unitarian Church at Greenfield in 1860, and continued his ministry here until 1884, when he was chosen by the American Unitarian Association as special minister for the New England States. Though at this time he had passed his prime, he entered upon his new work with the zeal and vigor of a young man, until about two years since he was obliged to resign on account of his health, and spent the rest of his life among friends to whom he was endeared by strong attachment.

Dr. Moors was eminently fitted, both by native gifts and training, for the duties of a minister. He had, to a remarkable degree, executive ability; and he carried into his parish work a sagacity, foresight, and judgment such as belong to men who succeed in large business enterprises. Though not pre-eminently a student, he kept himself fully informed of the current religious thought of his time. He was careful in the preparation of his sermons, and also gave a large portion of his time to the practical affairs of the parish. Believing that the church should touch and influence life at various points, he took a wise and deep interest in the public welfare. He devoted himself to education, and exerted a very marked influence by his various official positions. Both at Deerfield and Greenfield, for many years, he was the leading member of the School Committee; was also president of the Board of Trustees of Deerfield Academy, and was the first president of the consolidated corporation of the Deerfield Academy and the Dickinson High School. Later in life, convinced of the need of a seminary for young ladies which should be free from direct sectarian influences, he was the founder of the Prospect Hill School, which is now in a flourishing condition under the management of Rev. James C. Parsons.

During his ministry Dr. Moors filled many places of public trust, and was chosen both as a representative and senator to the General Court. Early in the war, under the inspiration of the patriotism of those stirring times, he became chaplain of the Fifty-second Regiment, and carried with him into the army the same fidelity, tact, and wise judgment which marked him through life. He not only gave the soldiers spiritual counsel by preaching, but in various ways became helpful. The sick found in him a sympathizing friend; the hospital heard his cheering word; on the march he would place a tired, wounded soldier on his horse, and walk by his side. He also wrote letters to the families at home for his comrades in arms. Thus his relation to them was not only that of a minister, but of a personal friend and brother. So closely allied was he with his regiment that he compiled its history, which was printed in 1893. The soldiers were so strongly attached to their chaplain that for years after the war closed he was called upon both to officiate at the glad hour of marriage and to light up the darkness of the open grave.

As a preacher, Dr. Moors was direct, simple, and practical. In his convictions he was a thorough Unitarian, and did yeoman's service for the faith he so deeply loved. Still, he valued most highly those great practical truths of religion which bear directly on daily life and character. Few men have illustrated, both in their preaching and their lives, more fully the rich quality of common sense. If we define eloquence as that power of speech which influences the hearers, then Dr. Moors possessed that gift. But he was wholly free from striking rhetorical effects. His sermons were marked by clearness of statement and vigor of thought. His Alma Mater bore witness of her appreciation of his ability by giving him the degree of D.D.; and he was heard with acceptance in all the Unitarian pulpits, especially in the Connecticut Valley, where he was so well known and esteemed.

His ministry derived additional strength from the fulness of his work in his parish. He was a man with a quick eye to see, with kindly sympathies, and a devout spirit. "As a comforter at the bedside of the sick or dying," says the Springfield Republican, "John Moors was what a minister should be. He brought cheer, he gave wholesome thought and hopeful outlook, and his prayer with the invalid in view of departure was the prayer of faith in the brotherhood of Jesus and the fatherhood of God."

His long residence in the Connecticut Valley, and the active interest he took in the churches of that section, gave him an exceptional knowledge of their needs, and made him a power. Often, at the meetings of the Ministerial Association, in his conversation he would show a minute acquaintance not only with the condition and needs of the neighboring parishes, but also with the personal characteristics of the leading members, greater in some cases than that possessed by the settled minister. When he began his missionary work in New England, he carried with him this same wise and minute oversight, which, taken with his other rare qualities, enabled him to add so large a number of new churches to the Unitarian communion.

Dr. Moors, in his private relations, was kind, genial, and sympathetic. He was decided in his opinions, and stoutly defended them. Many young ministers have been befriended by his aid and advice. His home was lighted up with cordial hospitality. Many can recall the cheerful welcome which brightened the hearthstone. His last days were shadowed by a lingering illness, the pains of which were alleviated by loving care and faithful devotion. He desired to live until the new church was consecrated. Only a short time since our columns gave the touching picture of the loved and honored pastor stretched on a couch as he was carried into the church, that he might witness the service. His cherished wish was gratified, and he has passed on. As loving hearts who have ministered to his last days are now filled with sorrow, they have a rich treasure of consolation which comes from the memory of a life so full of usefulness and faithful service, and which has brought light and cheer to so many in the hour of stress and need.

LOVE IN WAITING.

The familiar three-word text "God is love" is on our lips from the time that we can lisp, yet perhaps we may be grown men and women before any realization of that evangel penetrates our hearts. And even then it may not come through any mystic or transcendental experience. Simply from the manifestations of love in humanity we may come to believe with our whole hearts that God is indeed love, that out of his fulness we are all filled.

The mother croons her songs of love into her baby's ear, and the child grows up in an atmosphere of affection; but not till the deep experiences of life have come to her own heart can she appreciate what was the depth of love which was waiting to be revealed from that mother's heart. Not till parental love stirs her breast before the advent of her own child can she truly realize what love in waiting means.

The patience, the sweetness, the strength of this quality in love, are manifested in many ways. But for this quality how would the repentant son or the erring daughter dare to come back to the old home, and to those within it who have been disgraced and burdened with sorrow? For rarely indeed is the prodigal disappointed in his confidence. Not only is the door still open, but the father goes forth to meet the wanderer on his return.

One finds this love between friends. Years may go by, and they do not meet. No word has passed between them. Chance brings them once more within each other's grasp, and instantly the slumbering love is kindled anew and burns on, a steady, cheerful fire. What a joy and rest in life to have the assurance that at any turn one may thus come upon unexhausted springs of pure affection, oases where love is ever in waiting!

And not only for personal friends is this boon reserved. It is equally ready for the true man or the true woman, as soon as they shall be known. The human heart recognizes the claim upon it, and responds gladly. One sees this in a parish where a man may come unheralded, unpraised, who, by strength of his innate purity of life, strength of purpose, and warmth of affection, calls out at once the best that is in his people; and, before he realizes it, he feels about him the warm air of love that has been only waiting for his coming. And he is inspired and strengthened for his work, knowing that such a love will be patient and forgiving, helpful and comforting.

It is not strange, then, that, little by little, such experiences as these should finally lead one into a deep trust in the great Source of all love, and that, in spite of the sorrows, the trials, the cruel things of life, the trusting soul should be able to repeat with confidence the childhood text,—learned then because it was the shortest, spoken now because it is the sweetest,—"God is love."

PERSPECTIVE.

The true artist must master proportion and perspective, and so must the historian. We do not know things as we ought to know them until we see them in relation to other things. Events in our own life need to be studied to know the relation of proportion and perspective. Certain experiences seem very much to us to-day. The childish grief seemed a great mountain; but, after one has travelled many years on the road of life, it becomes a mole-hill. Certain experiences which are very vivid, and which take a large canvas in our imagination, drop into miniature when we view them in relation to the whole course of our lives, and in relation to the lives of others. It is one art of life to know how to hold things in just comparison,—to be sure that we do not overrate our particular misfortunes, magnify our ills, and minimize our blessings. There are scenes which fill our eyes now which we need to see in relation to many events which are to follow them. The true perspective of life, the true sense of proportion, will show us that we have often exaggerated or deformed, and that our conceptions have not wholly corresponded with reality. Thus we need to walk by faith because our sight is so often defective.

YOU.

Considered merely as a piece of mechanism and so much avoidsupois, it has taken the mechanical forces of the universe and many combinations of matter to make you what you are. You have a history. It does not begin with your birth, with that of your father or mother, or your grandfather or grandmother. It goes back into the long past. The roots of your genealogy cannot be traced. They are lost in the primeval history of the world.

But you are something more than a hundred and fifty or two hundred pounds of flesh and bone, with a telegraph system of muscles and nerves, with an engine pumping several gallons of blood through your veins and arteries. You are something more than a box of brain set on a vertebral column, with eyes and ears, and hands and feet, and powers of speech. All these are your instruments, but they are not you. You command them. They are your servants. Whether you go back through as many generations as your body is a speculation we will not stop to consider. The fact is that you are here,—a tenant of this house, and a master of these instruments. What can you, and what will you do with them? They can be made to minister to you, they can be made to minister to others around you. You can use them selfishly or generously. The relations into which you enter are not absolutely those of anybody else. You are invested with power and privilege. You are summoned by opportunity and duty. You are made of intellect, heart, conscience, social faculties, powers of will, religious and moral sentiments. Physically, you are separate and independent. Socially and morally, you are bound by ties which cannot be broken.

And so the question of your life is not yours alone. It is the question of your attitude to the whole range of activities which bring you in relation to your fellow-men. Your life would be poor, poverty-stricken, if you did not share the product of countless other lives. There is no century in the world that has not enriched you. You are an heir of the blessings of liberty and civilization. What are you to do with these bequests, this freedom, these powers, these opportunities? What is this life of yours? Its significance will depend upon the use you make of it. It may be a life of selfish isolation, or a life which is shared, and which gives as freely as it has received. The appeal which comes to you is yours because only you can receive it. The duty which belongs to you cannot be shifted to anybody else. There are personal duties which belong to you alone because they grow out of the fact that they beckon you and nobody else, and so the call which comes to you cannot be delegated to anybody else. Others may shape your life, but you alone can live it. Master its lessons, bear its burdens, suffer its disappointments, fulfil its duties, meet its retributions, and enter into its rewards.

Musings.

I WAS in a crowded Boston electric car last Sunday night. There were constant appeals from the conductor to "pass up front"; and the car seemed almost as elastic in its capacity as an old Broadway omnibus, in which there was always "room for one more." A large proportion of the passengers were women. There were five Chinamen all comfortably seated, while there were twelve women standing. The conductor made an effort to have the Chinamen move up; but the result was only about three more inches of room, not enough for another passenger. The conductor looked as if he would have liked to take these Chinamen by the back of the neck and haul them to their feet, or else put them out of the car; and, if he had acted in the spirit and suggestion of the law passed by the United States Congress, the Chinese would have had to go. But, as it was, they knew their rights, if not their privileges; and so they laughed, and "held the fort." It was one of their rights to sit down: it was one of their privileges to stand up and make room for five ladies. They clung to their rights, but ignored their privileges. I said to myself, "It is unfortunate that these Mongolians have not better manners, that they are not trained into more deference to women, that they do not consider it a privilege to rise and give their places to more lovely creatures. Would Americans be so impolite if they went to China?" Then it occurred to me that it might be worth while to look around the car and see how many men of American or European origin were sitting. There were just six; that is to say, the Americans outnumbered the Chinamen by one. Then I reflected that perhaps the Chinamen had not brought their manners from their own country, but had learned them here, and perhaps were taking a lesson that evening from the six white-faced men in the same car. And so I concluded that politeness, like charity, would better begin at home.

My Baptist friend who took me to the theatre when I was in Washington in December was not with me when I was there two weeks ago, but perhaps it was the force of his example which induced me to attend a revival at Albaugh's Opera House. It was not a revival of religion, but a revival of Napoleonism. The play was Sardou's "Madame Sans Gêne." Sardou does not print his plays until they are pretty well stage-worn, say for four or five years after they have been written and played. So, if you want to read a new one, you must go to the theatre and have it read to you. The French playwright has cleverly utilized the newly awakened interest in Napoleon, but he has not done it to offer any incense at the shrine of the hero. His real hero is Mme. Sans Gêne, a French laundress, afterward made a duchess. And it is she who completely conquers Napoleon, and makes him bend to her purposes, and notably when she presents to him an unpaid washing bill which he had incurred when he lived in a fifth-story attic in Paris. Sardou furnishes an excellent picture of court life under Napoleon, with its intrigues, scandals, suspicions, and revolutions of fortune. But he brings out also the power of a true love to defy the caprices of the emperor and his courtiers. And this is illustrated by

Mme. Sans Gêne and her noble husband. I was relieved to find that there was no cheap hero-worship in this play. Napoleon was pictured pretty much as he was. The play is one which will exact applause from the upper gallery, where the gods who have abandoned the pit bestow their favors. Sardou has written for the people, and not for royalty; and his play will not do any damage to the republic.

Brevities.

New York's Strong-minded mayor has already begun to feel the barbs of criticism.

With this number we bid good-by to January. Two-thirds of the winter gone, and still so much of the winter's work undone!

The statement of the Presbyterian Journal that "ministers and good people in general disapprove of dancing" is rather hard upon Episcopalians.

Apples have been so abundant in New England this winter that the brains of the people ought to scintillate after consuming so much phosphoric acid.

The record of the Boston Unitarian Club, as given on another page, shows how much earnest thought and practical effort may be aroused by a well-organized institution.

Dr. Talmage says he will preach out of doors as soon as the weather permits. The doctor knows that such a temple will probably not burn down during his lifetime, and that it cannot be sold for debt.

The Presbyterian Journal publishes nine reasons against dancing, but nearly every one of these reasons would be utterly void if good Presbyterians would take charge of and encourage this amusement under right conditions.

The Methodist Recorder has introduced a new beatitude, "Blessed be taffy!" It may be doubtful whether this ought always to be numbered among things blessed; but the Recorder explains,—"when it is warmed by the fires of human love and drawn out by the fingers of human helpfulness."

An English exchange advises "single women who nurse cats and indulge in poodles and canaries, or spend their time in dress and frippery," to turn their energies to philanthropic work. If there are any such in Boston, the Associated Charities will be glad to educate them as friendly visitors.

It is often asserted that, if the laity were as ready to follow their convictions as the clergy, whole religious societies would come over into the liberal ranks instead of allowing the pastors to go by themselves. The fact that in the past three years the number of Unitarian ministers is increasing faster than those of any other sect, chiefly by accession from those sects, points that way.

A Presbyterian clergyman writes the following tribute to the New World: "I hope the New World will be a success financially. In my opinion, it is a success intellectually and spiritually. Every article is pregnant with the deepest thought, with poetic imagery, with pure intellectual culture; and, above all, such articles are weighted with keen practical arguments for the good and the true in religion, science, and art."

A writer in the Amherst Literary Review thinks that Mr. Chadwick's book, "Old and New Unitarian Belief," will do much to correct popular erroneous beliefs about Unitarianism, showing that it means the elevation of man rather than "the dragging down of Jesus." The writer says earnestly: "We do not know anything about the niceties of theological controversy. We only know that we are thankful Mr. Chadwick has given us such an inspiring message. Because Unitarianism is the reason he has given this lesson of hope to men, we are glad that Unitarianism has been and is."

Rev. J. T. Sunderland has withdrawn from the editorship of the Unitarian; and Rev. F. B. Mott, who for several years acted as junior editor, has taken the editorial control. Mr. Sunderland was the founder of the Unitarian, and devoted himself with great energy and earnestness to the work and service he had planned. If at first the Unitarian seemed somewhat sectional, it has grown to be more and more national in its purpose and its service; and it will be still more representative of Unitarian thought and life. The devotion and ability of Mr. Sunderland established the journal; and, under the care of Mr. Mott, we believe that our contemporary is prepared and equipped to enter upon a new career of prosperity.

The London Christian World gives Rev. Thomas K. Beecher the credit of founding the first "institutional church" in the world. Forty long years he has labored devotedly in its service in Elmira. "Mr. Beecher saw early the awfulness of the waste in most Protestant churches in keeping the house of God closed one hundred and sixty-three hours and open five hours in the week; while the public-houses, which outnumber the churches, are open eighteen hours and closed six every day. The substitution of both amusements and intellectual activities of a high order in the church for those which are questionable or unqualifiedly evil elsewhere has wrought lasting beneficial results. The church keeps 'open house' every day in the year and all day long. Lights are out at nine o'clock."

Mr. Chadwick can answer for himself, but we must emphatically decline to accept the standard of "Convention Morals" which Mr. Snyder defends in our "Pro and Con." The standard of party ethics is one thing; the ethics of good citizenship, another. Unfortunately, they do not always coincide. Party ethics are simply based on party cohesion. In the last election both parties preached over and over again the detestable doctrine, "Never mind the men, but vote for the party"; and under this plea corrupt men were elected to office. To leave a party for personal pique, because one cannot have his own way, is one thing; to exercise the "divine right of bolting," as did James Freeman Clarke and George William Curtis, because one prefers country to party, is another. And, in our view, Mr. Snyder's argument does not minify in the least the moral significance and the moral clearness of the action of George William Curtis.

Pro and Con.

A BIT OF HISTORY.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

When Wisner was to be settled in the Old South Church, he invited Lowell of the West Church to give him the right hand of fellowship. The quadrant's local difference on the compass signified no diametric diversity of creed. Both churches were Congregational in good religious standing. But the ecclesiastical council resolved to set Lowell aside as not orthodox, and so countermanded Wisner's choice. Shortly afterward the two ministers met; and Lowell said, "I suppose we may be permitted to shake hands on the street." One of Wisner's successors, Gordon, joined with the clergy of many denominations to observe the fiftieth anniversary of the last minister of the West Church. With all its changes, the passing century witnesses thus a growth of charity. The hard-and-fast dogmas, transported like stakes that measure the glacier's motion into a milder climate, drop out and cannot be gathered up.

THE SINGLE TAX.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

A few months ago I contributed some articles to the Christian Register upon the subject of the single tax. They brought me many letters of inquiry, most of the writers asking the question where they could find the most satisfactory statement of the single tax in the briefest space. For the enlightenment of such, will you kindly allow me to mention a little pamphlet by Mrs. Eliza Stowe Twitchell, entitled "Economic Principles"? A letter enclosing 15 cents, addressed to her at Wollaston, Mass., will procure the book. It contains only forty pages; but therein are compressed the vital principles of the new reform, and presented in a manner to interest and enlighten the reader. I commend it to all those who would investigate what, to my mind, is the fundamental reform of the day. For a more elaborate compendium I would recommend the "Outlines of Louis F. Post's Lectures," just published by the Sterling Publishing Company, 106 Fulton Street, New York. Its price is 50 cents. It is illustrated with charts which speak to the eye, and with a text and copious notes appealing to the common understanding. Any one who masters the above-named books will have an excellent basis for comprehending the larger works of Henry George.

CONVENTION MORALS.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

In his admirable review of Mr. Cary's "Life of George William Curtis," my good friend J. W. C. uses this expression: "He [Mr. Cary] makes short work of the unmitigable stuff that a delegate to a convention is bound to support its action, showing that a resolution to that effect was rejected by the Republican Convention of 1884, in response to a speech by Mr. Curtis which anticipated his subsequent action."

I claim to be an independent in politics, and I was bitterly opposed to Mr. Blaine's nomination; but I am just stupid enough to believe that Mr. Curtis did not understand the ethics of his position. I sympathize with the "unmitigable stuff" of which Mr. Cary has made "short work." There can be no doubt, I think, that, speaking in general terms, it is understood to be a political and party axiom that delegates to a national convention will support its candidate. Each delegate has his own preferences; but, when the majority has spoken, he is expected to accept its decision. Otherwise there could be no such thing as party discipline and cohesiveness. Beyond question, Mr. Curtis was elected a delegate by a party constituency that accepted this principle. And there is no evidence to show (I think) that Mr. Curtis formally protested against this interpretation of his political duty in the primary meeting that gave him its suffrages. There is no evidence to show that he protested against this interpretation in the columns of the powerful journal of which he had complete control. The men who sent him to the convention, and the whole Republican party, had the best of reasons for believing that he recognized the generally received ethics of party action. Mr. Curtis declared in the convention that Mr. Blaine's nomination was "unfit"; but he knew that Mr. Blaine was a possible, probable, and even a certain candidate for nomination. If I remember rightly, a majority of the delegates had been pledged to Blaine before the convention met. It was not as if a man totally unfit for the position had been sprung upon the convention, under circumstances that left no doubt as to the corrupt influences that secured his success. And, even in such an emergency, Mr. Curtis's course would be clear. It would have been his duty to leave the convention at once, and allow his place to be filled by a less scrupulous alternate. But, when the nomination was made which he had abundant reasons for believing would be made, he remained a member of the convention, and, presumably, took part in the nomination of Gen. Logan. Mr. Cary says that the convention refused to pass a resolution formally binding every delegate to the support of the successful candidate, and that Mr. Curtis's speech in opposition to that resolution indicated his subsequent action, and, no doubt, in Mr. Cary's mind, justified it. But the inferences drawn from the convention's action by Mr. Cary, I think, are unwarranted. What the convention meant to say was, not that every man was to be free to "bolt," and still retain his standing in the Republican party,—such a conclusion would be palpably absurd,—but that such a resolution was unprecedented in party action, and implied a doubt of party loyalty which ought to be taken for granted.

I have unstinted admiration for Mr. Curtis, but I think he was morally confused respecting his political duty in the famous campaign of 1884. If a man works with a political party, he should accept the fundamental principles of party organization. If Mr. Curtis wanted to be absolutely free to fight Mr. Blaine, he ought to have refused to be a member of the convention which was morally certain to give him its nomination. And upon this decision I should like the judgment of such honorable gentlemen as John D. Long, ex-Gov. Robinson, Cabot Lodge, ex-Gov. Russell, John Andrew, and Senator Hoar.

ROBERT BURNS.

WRITTEN FOR THE 136TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTHDAY OF BURNS, JAN. 25, 1895.

BY REV. M. J. SAVAGE.

Dear Robert Burns, the years are flying,
And all along Time's roadway lying Great names, like fallen leaves, are dying;
But thine is seen
A leaf on Life's tree, death defying,
Still fresh and green.

A peasant child, the State could find thee
But some low task to which to bind thee:
So she to penury resigned thee,
Like penny-wise man,
Nor saw the proud wings bound behind thee,
A poor exciseman.

The Church, through creed-blind eyes that scanned thee,
A heretic rebellious banned thee,
Nor knew what wings of angels fanned thee
With breaths of truth,
Nor heard the higher voice command thee
With loving ruth.

When shone thy star o'er all declension,
Society's cheap condescension
For its amusement deigned attention
To thy great name;
But who would now their lordships mention
But for thy fame?

The learned, blinded by their letters,
Saw thee in ignorance's fetters,
Too proud to bow before thy "betters,"
Nor dreamed that thou
Wert one to whom all men, as debtors,
One day would bow.

O Poet, born of Scottish heather,
Of daisy blooms and misty weather,
Aurora tints, star-beams, no tether
Thy fancy bound
To heaven's height, or hell's deep nether,
Or sight or sound.

The scented winds o'er Ayrshire blowing,
The Doon amid its grasses flowing,
The plough, the mouse, the daisy growing,—
These knew thee poet;
Now all earth's winds thy thoughts are strowing,
And all men know it.

The cotter, 'mid his children kneeling,
The eldritch fear Tam's blood congealing,
The louse o'er fashion's bonnet stealing,— Things mean or grand,— Thou'st wrought to lessons of high feeling
With magic hand.

O peasant-born, thy heart of fire
Taught all earth's lowly to aspire,
The real to seek with high desire,
The coin to scan,
Than stamp of rank to value higher
The God-made man.

Oh, truer than thine age's preaching,
Thy heart of sympathy, outreaching,
Enfolded in its sobbed beseeching
—The lowest hell;
There rings out in thy hopeful teaching
Death's own death-knell.

Thou wast no saint; but man or woman,
Who knows what 'tis to be but human,
What hounds of passion still pursue man,—
And we are such,—
Will hear God's whisper of the true man,
"Thou lovedst much."

We walk God's earth, though few men know it;
"The eye to see, I will bestow it,
Make him of common things the poet,"
Great Nature said;
"The hidden glory, he shall show it Where'er men tread."

While stars shall wander their blue spaces,
While spring flowers seek their old-time places,
While hearts beat, and from human faces
Love looks out fair,
We'll con the lines thy genius traces,
Dear Bard of Ayr!

THE HIGHER GENEROSITY.

BY ISABEL FRANCIS BELLOWES.

How many of us realize that there is a higher and truer generosity than the generosity of giving,—and that is the generosity of taking? And the latter virtue transcends the former, because it necessitates a nobler outlook on life, a juster appreciation of its true values, and a greater indifference to the ordinary estimates of mankind. The virtue of taking is one which is seldom recognized or thought about. The world's coarse thumb and finger fails to plumb the motive of this subtle and beautiful virtue, as it is generally feeling after the much less exalted sentiment of gratitude,—a much more vulgar and ordinary emotion, with which the love of God has little or nothing to do. Gratitude and happiness man can do without, when he has replaced them by blessedness and love.

The generosity of taking involves an altruism of which the ordinary would-be-benefactor of his kind is incapable. It is comparatively easy to give clothes or money, or to visit the average poor, to read to invalids and send books to light-houses or hospitals, all the time cherishing an inward feeling that we are making the world and ourselves better by doing so; but it is not at all certain that this is the case. All these things are futile, so long as we are conventional and exclusive and condescending, and assume too much superiority. What possible good can come from visiting a very poor woman more than a very rich one, unless we carry to each that something which puts the thought of either poverty or riches into insignificance? Of the two, the rich one is infinitely more likely to stand in need of help of this nature than the poor. It is much more difficult to maintain a hold of the spiritual verities in intercourse with the conventional, worldly type than with the poor, who have few traditions, no conventionalities, scanty mental resources, and many needs. But, like that higher generosity which does not overestimate the value of material objects in comparison with love, it requires a higher type of spirituality to keep one's self unspotted in the world, to reach the hearts and souls of the comfortable and accomplished people, than to leave it, and associate solely with those who take kindly and easily to our ideas. There are, perhaps, as many people worth saving in one class as in another. I think that Jesus was as apt to love the young man who had great possessions as any one of the poorer sort, and to feel as entirely at home in the houses of the rich and the great as among the simple fishermen who were also his friends. If he had made himself disagreeable about matters of minor conventionality, the Pharisees would probably not have asked him to dine with them. On the contrary, he mildly reproaches one of them for not having observed the customary forms with him as with others. This reproof, coming from the greatest form-breaker, the most profound radical, of his day, shows the delicate balance, the knowledge of man, the largeness of vision, which are possessed by those souls who move the world. "I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil," he said; but one involves the other.

How limited the ordinary human nature is in this respect, how unspiritual, is shown in the workings of all great moral and religious movements,—in their one-sidedness, their materialism, their machinery. All these have a certain value, perhaps, but of a lower quality, simply because it is appreciable, and tends toward appreciable success. The garb of nuns and priests, the uniform of the Salvation Army, the dress of the Shakers, the ritual of jewels and incense,—all appeal to the lower nature of man, and testify to his weakness. They may serve as stepping-stones and crutches for the feeble,—man is a poor creature!—but, taken as an end, as a virtue, they are as false and pernicious as the most expensive and absurd garment ever turned out by a fashionable man-milliner.

So it is with the higher generosity. What love, what subtle insight, what dignity, is necessary to bear an obligation well! and above all, what unselfishness! What discernment is involved in the recognition of the fact that, because it is more blessed to give than to receive, we have no right to let a petty pride interfere with our neighbor's blessing! By just so much as we love to give ourselves, we should see that others, too, love it as we do, and not withhold from them their pleasure.

This is not by any means saying that we ought to allow ourselves to be provided for indiscriminately or by every one. Only for love's sake can we give ourselves; and there are too many people in the world, alas! who value their own bestowments so highly, and are so obtuse, that there is no resource but to refuse them, as the only adequate method of showing what we believe to be their true value. But it is a poor and narrow spirit which does not accept the fact that obligations are one of the great factors and educators in the development of the soul.

"Is, then, a noble independence nothing?" some one may rightly ask. "Is it a higher quality to sit by and accept than to work and eat the honest bread of labor?" By no means! But the thing balances itself; for the spiritual nature does not need luxuries, and can dispense with material comfort. So that all we can give in this way is nothing to it, willing as it may be to accept what we can offer.

It is not written that the heavenly child refused the gold, frankincense, and myrrh that were brought to him; but who can suppose he had need of them? Do we count Jesus Christ under an obligation to the man who spread the last supper for him and his disciples in his great upper room, or is Christ's spiritual power impaired by his accepting it? Was Marcus Aurelius lower than those teachers and helpers of whom he records so nobly his testimony of undying obligation? What could the gilded youth of Athens offer to the man who stood a day and a night oblivious of all things except the workings of his own mind, and who could endure frost and snow barefoot with indifference? But Socrates, with his last breath, called upon his friend Crito to pay for him his debt to Asclepius.

The web of our life is of a mingled yarn. Let us not reject any of the strands given us to make the fabric beautiful, and we may be sure that what we are weaving will not be perfect if we omit the delicate golden thread of a generous acceptance of help from whoso can give it.

In a little poem by Miss Adelaide Procter called "Maximus" are these verses, which express this thought most felicitously:—

"I hold him great who, for love's sake,
'Can give with generous, earnest will;
Yet he who takes for love's sweet sake
I think I hold more generous still.

"I bow before the noble mind
That freely some great wrong forgives,
Yet nobler is the one forgiven
Who bears that burden well, and lives.

"Glorious it is to wear the crown
Of a deserved and pure success.
He who knows how to fail has won
A crown whose lustre is not less."

A NOTABLE POEM.

BY A. EMERSON PALMER.

Rudyard Kipling calls it "McAndrews' Hymn." He might have called it "The Praise of Steam" or "The Oratorio of the Engine." It would make no difference. By whatever name, it would breathe the same inspiration, carry the thoughtful reader onward with the same irresistible swing, and teach the same lesson of the immanence of God in all the works of nature and of man. It is truly a great poem, one of the greatest of recent years. At this moment I recall nothing to compare with it since John Hay's "Israel" appeared in the Century for May, 1887. Assuredly, one is in the way of missing many good things who fails to read the magazines, though he is pretty certain to find the best of them put into books later on. But who would wait, when for a paltry quarter he can buy Scribner's for December and make Kipling's great poem all his own?

This is not a poem to be glanced at, or even read once and cast aside. Not until the third or fourth reading, I should say, will the majority of readers begin to enter into the spirit of the poem; and I can bear witness that fifteen or twenty readings do not exhaust its meaning. It is uneven, but at times, and repeatedly, rises to great heights.

McAndrews is the chief engineer of an ocean steamship. In the extract from a private letter which precedes the poem we are told that "the engines made him feel quite poetical at times"; and we can well sympathize with the wish of the writer of the letter that he had known the "pious old bird" earlier in the voyage. The strong, stern, weather-beaten face of the old Scotch engineer looks out at us in Mr. Pyle's first picture from his post beside the engine; and I am frank to confess that I like him better here than in the picture which represents him as a young man leaning over the ship's rail. It is a pretty picture, but it does not seem to me that the artist has caught the spirit of the poem.

The scheme of the poem is simple. To the "auld Fleet Engineer" steam is the only real thing in the world:—

"Lord, Thou hast made this world below,
The shadow of a dream,
An', taught, by time, I tak' it so,—exceptin' always Steam."*

What his engines mean to him—the medium through which steam does its work—is set forth in two of the most powerful lines in the poem:—

"From coupler-flange to spindle-guide I see Thy Hand, O God,— Predestination in the slide o' yon connectin'-rod."

*The punctuation of the poem, as printed, is not good; and in the extracts which I give I have taken the liberty of inserting a comma or two, to make the meaning clearer.

The engineer is unable to sleep, and decides to "Stand the middle watch up here,— alone wi' God an' these My engines, after ninety days' o' race an' rack an' strain

Through all the seas of all Thy world, slambangin' home again."

They are coming up the Channel, and are within a few hours of port. The sub-engineer in charge, Ferguson, is anxious to get home to his wife, and has increased the speed of the screw three turns. Though "there's none at any port for" him, McAndrews can easily put himself in Ferguson's place. "Old girl, ye'll walk to-night!" he exclaims, addressing the engine. With characteristic Scotch thrift, he comes back to this thought in the closing strain of the poem, this time addressing Ferguson directly:—

"Man, have ye ever thought
What your good leddy costs in coal?"

Which question is followed by the puzzling remark, "I'll burn 'em down to port." The most satisfactory explanation which I have heard of this is that McAndrews means that he will make up for Ferguson's extravagance when he gets to port by keeping the fires very low when only cargo steam is required.

The poem is a monologue, and embraces reminiscence, experiences at sea, temptation, sin, and repentance, contempt for first-class passengers and their ideas, and lofty and elevating religious feeling. Some of McAndrews's language—for example, his reference to Calvin's "Institutio" and his use of the word "artifex," as well as his familiarity with the terminology of the Calvinistic religion—suggests that he may have been a student of Scotch divinity before becoming a "boiler whelp." Through the whole work we feel the beat and throb of the engines, which, to McAndrews's mind, constitute a great orchestra sounding forth the praise of God and his chiefest work, steam. The engineer's youthful experiences—his yielding to the tempter's voice, his repentance, his fear lest he had committed the sin against the Holy Ghost, and his conversion—are described with power. Then comes the feeling that he has been of some service to his fellow-men in carrying thousands of them safe from port to port. A vivid picture is given of a voyage round the world. We see the huge vessel lying helpless on the waves, with her shaft broken and the fuel so nearly exhausted that they have to burn the masts,—"three jiggers burned wi' smoke,"—and again "steamin' to bell for fourteen days o' snow an' floc an' blow," with "The bergs like kelpies overside, that girn an' turn an' shift

Whaur, grindin' like the Mills o' God, goes by the big South drift."

And how the grim Scotch humor comes out in the next couplet!—

"(Hail, snow, an' ice that praise the Lord:
I've met them at their work,
An' wished we had anither route or they anither kirk.)"

There is a touch of pathos in the engineer's reference to the "Deferential Valve-gear" which he invented. But he found that one had to "stay in port to mak' a patent pay"; and so he burned his working plans, with all he hoped to earn:—

"Ye know how hard an Idol dies, an' what that meant to me,—
E'en tak' it for a sacrifice acceptable to Thee."

McAndrews, as has been said, has little patience with first-class passengers; and we are quite prepared to appreciate, if not to share, his indignation at the question of the titled "dude" whom he had shown over the ship only because he was a relative of one of the owners. The viscount asks, "Mister McAndrews, don't you think steam kills romance at sea?" And even Scotch Presbyterianism is not proof against the temptation to use language commonly deemed profane. That very morning the engineer had been down below to see what ailed some part of the machinery; and, as he lay on his back with the giant cranks descending within three inches of his nose, he has no doubt of the real romance which steam at sea engenders. Here no condensation of the poem can indicate its strength, virility, and sweep. Only a poetic genius could have produced this superb description of the various parts of the engine, like the several instruments in an orchestra, blending together and giving forth a noble harmony; while here and there the quaint humor of the Scotchman perforce crops out. Let me quote a few lines:—

"Romance! Those first-class passengers they like it very well Printed an' bound in little books. But why don't poets tell?
I'm sick of all their quirks an' turns,—the loves and doves they dream.
Lord, send a man like Robbie Burns to sing the Song o' Steam!
To match wi' Scotia's noblest speech yon orchestra sublime, Whaur to—uplifted like the Just—the tail-rods mark the time;
The crank-throws give the double-bass; the feed-pump sobs an' heaves;
An' now the main eccentrics start their quarrel on the sheaves.
Her time, her own appointed time, the rocking link-head bides,
Till—hear that note?—the rods' return whings glimmerin' through the guides.
They're all awa! True beat, full power, the clangin' chorus goes Clear to the tunnel where they sit, my purrin' dynamos.
Interdependence absolute, foreseen, ordained, decreed,
To work, Ye'll note, at any tilt an' every rate o' speed.
Fra skylight-lift to furnace-bars, backed, bolted, braced, an' stayed,
An' singin' like the Mornin' Stars for joy that they are made;
While, out o' touch o' vanity, the sweatin' thrust-block says:
'Not unto us the praise, or man,—not unto us the praise!
Now, a'together hear them lift their lesson,—theirs an' mine,—
'Law, Order, Duty, an' Restraint, Obedience, Discipline!
Mill, forge, an' try-pit taught them that when roarin' they arose,
An' whiles I wonder if a soul was gied them wi' the blows.
Oh for a man to weld it then, in one trip-hammer strain, Till even first-class passengers could tell the meanin' plain!"

One cannot fail to note the force of the word "purrin'" applied to the dynamos: no other adjective in the language could convey the same meaning. Not only is the gentle noise of the dynamos accurately suggested, but there is a hint given that they are the old engineer's pets. That single word is a touch of genius. Observe, too, the delicious naïveté in the second line following, as well as the renewed indignation at the viscount and all of his kidney evidenced in the last line of the citation.

Enough has been said to show that we have here a poem of rare quality, bearing the unmistakable marks of poetic genius. Kipling's ballads have had a wide popularity, but here he reaches deeper depths and rises to far loftier heights. The decade which witnesses the production of "McAndrews' Hymn" need have no apprehension that the twilight of poesy is at hand.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

BY A CHRISTIAN SCIENTIST.

ITS HISTORY, GROWTH, AND PRINCIPLES.

To re-establish the religion of Jesus of Nazareth; to demonstrate to the world that this religion has an ever-operative Divine Principle which heals both sin and disease; to exalt the idea of Deity as impartial Love,—the One Father and Mother God,—and Man as the unfallen likeness of this God; and to emphasize the supreme dominion of Spirit over the flesh, of Good over all types of evil, the eternal reality of Mind, and the unreality of matter,—this can be called the fourfold mission of Christian Science.

"To give to man Christ's love,
To lift from sin above,
To bear the message of His peace,
To bid the restless heart-throbs cease,
To heal the sick and free the bound,
Till songs of praise from all lips sound,—
Such is its mission here."

Any attempt to define so vast a theme as Christian Science in a few words must necessarily end in giving but a meagre outline of its history, nature, aims, organization, and growth; but, if its cardinal characteristics can be briefly given, these will serve at least to pave the way for a more critical survey of its works as one of the vital and significant forces of the great spiritual awakening of the era in which we live.

HISTORY OF THE MOVEMENT.

The Movement properly begins with the discovery by Rev. Mary Baker Eddy, in 1866, of the spiritual truth that constitutes the fundamental statement of the system;

i.e., that "all Causation is Mind, and every effect a mental phenomenon." In relation to this point it has been well said: "Not that Truth included in the scientific statement is new. Its presentation is by way of discovery, not of creation,—a fresh discernment and apprehension in the human consciousness of things which are eternal."

In 1875 the first edition of the Text Book, "Science and Health, With Key to the Scriptures," by the Founder, was published. In 1894 it had gone through eighty-nine editions of one thousand copies each.

In 1879 Mrs. Eddy founded and organized the Mother Church of Christian Science in Boston known as "The First Church of Christ, Scientist."

On Jan. 6, 1895, the new edifice of this Church was dedicated. Four different services were held on this day to accommodate the six thousand persons who came to participate in the event.

The Mother Church is a testimonial to the Founder of Christian Science. It is situated in the Back Bay district of Boston, and was built with the offerings of Christian Scientists the world over, at a cost of over $200,000, exclusive of the cost of the land. It is a massive and beautiful stone edifice, a fitting testimonial to one whose labors have brought to suffering humanity a mighty boon and panacea for both moral and bodily ills.

There are nearly three hundred Christian Science Churches, and over two hundred and fifty thousand adherents of the religion, in the United States and Canada. It has also spread to Norway, Sweden, Russia, Germany, Greece, Italy, France, China, Japan, Ceylon, and Australia.

In 1881 the Massachusetts Metaphysical College was chartered, with Mrs. Eddy President. During seven years some four thousand students were taught by her in this institution. In 1883 the regular official organ of the Movement, the Christian Science Journal, was founded by Mrs. Eddy; and in 1886 a national Christian Scientist Association was formed, which body created the Christian Science Publishing Society, with headquarters in Boston.

The Movement is thus well organized; yet it lays but little stress on mere outward organization, but depends upon the sympathetic spiritual unity of its adherents to advance its teaching and healing.

ITS PRINCIPLES.

In taking for its motto, "Not things, but Men; not matter, but Mind," the recent Parliament of Religions sounded forth the key-note of the Christianity of the twentieth century, and prepared the way for a more metaphysical interpretation of the teachings of Jesus.

Christian Science is no mere revival of transcendentalism, nor is it the speculative and undemonstrable idealism of Berkeley, Kant, Spinoza, or of certain other past and present philosophers. It is the sober verdict of a spiritual, illumined mind, which proves its faith by its works, and seeks to attain to the possession of the essence of Christianity rather than of its outward forms.

In Christian Science we have consummated a long-looked-for union; namely, the marriage of Religion and Science. To be divinely true, the teachings of Jesus relating to the nature of God, man, the universe, and individual salvation from sin, disease, suffering, and death, must be also scientifically true; and, if scientifically true, they must be demonstrably true; and, if demonstrably true, then must not Science be Christian, and Christianity be one with Science?

If asked to name the basic and cardinal doctrine of Christian Science, we would at once answer, "The absolute and eternal Omnipotence, Omniscience, and Omnipresence of Good, Divine Consciousness, Mind, Life, and Love as Deity or Causation." But suppose, on giving this answer, we are met with the assertion that this is not alone the basic doctrine of Christian Science? To this we would say, "The statement that Good, Mind, Consciousness, Life and Love, as Deity, is all-power, all-science, and all-presence, makes the Divine Mind the only Truth or Ego of being, and forces us to admit the unreal, temporal nature of evil, matter, hate, discord, and death. That which opposes itself to the All-Good can neither be of divine origin nor a part of the eternal plan of Wisdom."

In a recent lecture before a Medical Society in California Dr. A. A. Sulzer had this to say upon this basic statement of Christian Science, which is so generally misunderstood: "At the threshold of our study, then, we are met by an apparently absurd proposition; i.e., that the very existence of those things which have been most apparent to us do exist is denied. It is this abrupt announcement of the major propositions of Christian Science which often repels investigation, because of seeming puerility in its first utterances. But let us loosen the hinges of those propositions a little, so that they may swing open and disclose the real meaning.

"Wessn the Christian Scientist asserts the non-existence of certain evident manifestations of nature, he does not, if sufficiently advanced, mean quite what he is misunderstood to mean. You are walking along the street with the glare of the electric light behind you. Before you is a shadow as visible to the passer-by as you are yourself, and it moves as rapidly and as truly as yourself, and, in a sense, is as much a fact as is yourself; yet is it something, or is it nothing? There it undoubtedly is; yet, just as undoubtedly, it is absolutely nothing. It is rather the mere absence of something: that which is lacking is light. Still, it is a manifestation of something to material sense. The one All-Good, the Divine Mind, is the only permanent Reality; and it is ever life and health to all who earnestly, persistently, and intelligently strive for it with purity of heart.

"To ignore this truth of the One Eternal Good as the only Reality, and to seek for causation in inert clay, is, in the eyes of the Christian Scientist, to mistake effects for causes, the temporal and transitory and powerless for the real and eternal, the shadow for the substance, the shadow to be the thing itself, the disease to be the reality instead of the absence of the only reality,—reality which Jesus taught stands ever ready to supplant the substanceless evil with the substance-Good."

Turning to Webster, we find the word "real" defined as "actually being or existing, true," and "unreal" as "that which is not substantial, having appearance only." Holding to these definitions of the words "real" and "unreal," can we for a moment argue that sin, sickness, discord, and death are real (true), at the same time assert our firm conviction that Good, health, harmony, and life, eternal and undying, are also real (true)? Rather let us say with Paul, "God is light [source of knowledge], and in Him is no darkness [Empire of Satan, the grave] at all."

Christian Science, then, teaches that evil is real to the human mind and personal sense, but unreal to the Divine Mind and to spiritual sense. Hence the stress it lays upon right thinking and proper mental training, to the end that all evil in human consciousness be destroyed by the individual acquisition of the Mind of Christ.

"The natural man [natural, illegitimate, bastard, formed by the lower animal nature merely, Webster] receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned."

The inevitable result of wrong thinking is wrong acting, and the sure outcome of both is mental or bodily suffering. Discord and suffering, like false notes and mathematical errors, imply broken law. All Law is divine; and, as long as the divine law is broken, either knowingly or ignorantly, suffering will be the lot of human-kind.

This doctrine of the reality of Good and unreality of evil is the very heart of Scripture, and in no wise tends to blind one to the evils of mortal existence, but, on the contrary, increases one's ability to distinguish good from evil, and intensifies one's hatred of "whatsoever worketh abomination or maketh a lie." For only as men grow into the divine likeness do they gain the discernment that enables them to "render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's."

Christian Science exalts the idea of God's impartial Love, and the ultimate universal salvation of all men from that which wars against the divine likeness. It holds strongly to the idea of an eternal law of progression through which man rises from glory unto glory into the grandeur of divine sonship. It proclaims the Brotherhood of man as the central fact of existence, and the present (though unseen) perfection of man and the universe; also the great truth that things are thoughts, and that the true substance or nature of the multitudinous objects of creation, including man, the image of the Divine Mind, is the Creator of all things, "in whom we live, move, and have our being."

It accepts the Messiahship of Jesus Christ, and looks upon the founder of Christianity as the Wayshower to the life divine, whose works were not supernatural, but divinely natural, and whose career all must reproduce in their own. It also teaches that sickness is no more a part of God's law than sin is. As it cannot be truly said that a man in the act of committing a wrong deed is reflecting his heavenly Parent, the All-Good, so it cannot be asserted that a sick man expresses the true essence and dominion of sonship with the God who gave man "dominion over all things." It emphasizes the idea that the same spiritual power or law that heals sin will and does heal every manner of disease, and that true Christianity consists of imitating the life of Jesus. Hence, as he, his disciples, and the early Christians healed sin and bodily disease for the first three centuries of Christianity, through the power of the Word, or the divinely Spiritual Light or Mind, so must all Christians to-day; for did Jesus not say, "The works that I do shall ye do also, and greater works than these shall ye do," and "These signs shall follow them that [not you, but them, in this and in all times] believe"? "They shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover." This healing was not miraculous with him, nor was it a special and mysterious gift to Jesus and to his immediate disciples, but was the manifestation of a law of Mind "as eternal as the everlasting hills"; and, as all law is eternal, it is here to-day, ever ready for man's use. Its interpretation of the Bible is a metaphysical and spiritual one. It recognizes its inspiration and divine mission, and holds it to be the Word of Good uttered by inspired men, their inspiration being governed by the extent to which they had risen in the scale of Being into oneness with Spirit, with rising clearness toward the zenith of revelation through the teaching of Jesus Christ and the Revelation of John.

It lays especial stress upon the law, "Like creates like," and repeats Jesus' words, "A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit." Hence it holds that the animal and material never evolve their divine and deathless opposites, the spiritual and immaterial. Consequently, it rejects the common teaching that evil is the means to good, or, as one has said, that "the evils of this world are the growing pains of good." It also rejects the theory that man, the reflection of the Perfect Mind, the climax of creation, is ever less than man. In the place of the notion that imperfection begets perfection, and death ushers men into the immortal and perfect Life Divine, it invites thought to the rationalism of the teaching that man has but to come into at-onement with the divine nature—i.e., purity, love, perfection, and Soul—to know that "God is the Everlasting Right;

The Eternal Day, that knows no night;
The Good, that giveth only Light;
The Truth, that is the only Might;
The Purity, that knows no dross;
The Soul, that never knoweth loss;
The Unseen Fount, that ever springs
Within the heart of men and things,
To keep them sweet and pure."

Strange it is that, in this hour of scientific advancement and religious development, any really thinking people can be found ready to stamp a system that exalts and proclaims the exclusive supremacy of Good over evil, and of Mind over matter, and lifts the standard of manhood and womanhood, as visionary, vague, and undemonstrable.

It was authentically stated at the recent Parliament of Religions that hundreds of thousands of people have been reformed by its benign influence, and over one million cases of hopeless disease healed by it in the last decade of this century.

At this present stage of the Movement's career it is interesting to recall the words of Wendell Phillips, who, in making mention of the early work of the Founder of Christian Science, said, "Had I young blood in my veins, I would help that woman." Also the utterance of A. Bronson Alcott, who said, in speaking of the Christian Science instruction in one of Mrs. Eddy's classes, "You are taught all there is worth knowing in our institutions of learning, and more than they can ever furnish."

The men and women of the present hour stand amid the falling walls of creeds, amidst changing scenes, and under threatening skies; yet amid all there shines over all nations the sun of progress, liberty, reform, and spiritual growth. Old things are passing away, and all is becoming new.

In its presentation of rationality, liberalism, and Scientific Religion, and in its rejection of dogma, form, mystery, and blind belief in religion, Christian Science is surely a messenger of the good new days.

Hypnotism, the action of the educated mortal or human mind, is the antithesis of the stately healing power of the Christ Mind. The first is born of animality and magnetism; the latter, of chastity, purity, and Christ-likeness. Hypnotism, which is being so generally used in these latter days as a criminal power, is the human antipode of Divine Mind, which heals disease and destroys evil.

The principles of Christian Science have nothing in common with spiritualism, mind cure, faith cure, and theosophy.

The Standard Dictionary defines Christian Science as follows: "A system of moral and religious instruction founded upon principles formulated by Rev. Mary Baker G. Eddy (1866), and combined with a method of treating disease mentally as presented in Mrs. Eddy's 'Science and Health.' Christian Science is based upon teachings of Scripture which it interprets, giving the Christ Principle and rule in Divine Mind, which heals the sick and sinful. It explains all cause and effect as mental, and shows the scientific relation of man to God."

To-day Christian Science insists that, if we would destroy vice, annihilate the myriad forms of evil in the world, and reform man, we must go directly to mental causation, and there wrestle with, and overcome sin, disease, and death in the human mind. Centuries of bitter experience have proven the fallacy of attempting the destruction of vice and vicious habits by mere corporeal punishments and penalties. Men must be shown the way to destroy the conscious and unconscious thought-germ of evil and disease ere it would destroy them. Amid the awful manifestations of depravity in human consciousness, can it be reasonably argued that the perpetual exalting of the pure and perfect ideal is detrimental to substantial progress out of evil and imperfection into good and perfection? If not, then Christian Science must be freely accorded the right to continue its labors for the establishing of Christ's Kingdom of justice, love, purity, health, and right on earth, by pursuing along its well-chosen line of action its practical demonstration of divine law, in the train of which follow the destruction of sin, the healing of disease, and the ultimate triumph of the high ideal of manly and womanly perfection. Truly sung our loved Lowell,—

"Still through our paltry stir and strife
Glow down the wished Ideal,
And Longing moulds in clay what Life
Carves in the marble Real."

ARGYLE vs. HUXLEY.

—The controversy still wages in England between what may be regarded as two different classes of thinkers. This is seen in the article by the Duke of Argyle in the December Nineteenth Century, which is a reply to a paper by Prof. Huxley in Nature. We are not here concerned with the duke's defence of Bacon, but with the questions at issue. After stating what he supposes to be the doctrine of Huxley,—that physical conceptions are the only region into which the human intellect can penetrate, and that the idea of two spheres vanishes under the teaching of modern science, so that little is left of one but "cloudland,"—the duke says this is "simple nonsense." "There is no need," he adds, "in arguing against it, considering that all the interests of human life—all moral and spiritual truths on which we habitually rely in our individual, social, and political conduct—are entirely inaccessible to this physical 'organon' or method, and that the habit which has become common of confining the word 'science' to the physical science is a habit incapable of defence." Continuing on this line of argument, he says: "We must at once set aside any philosophy as irrational which denies to our knowledge of any kind of truth the title and rank of science. Neither love, nor justice, nor mercy, nor benevolence, nor duty, nor, indeed, any other moral or spiritual truth, is even approachable by the 'organon' which Mr. Huxley sets up as the coming ruler over all 'the regions into which the intellect can penetrate.'"

Objection is still further made to Mr. Huxley that he does not stand up to the unity of nature, but adopts and dwells upon a separation between the natural and the supernatural. This the duke calls the grossest of all the fallacies of modern philosophy. "There is not one of the physical sciences which does not lead up to some 'law' which is an adjustment,—a combination of elementary forces, a thing invisible, a purely intellectual conception,—considering some established methods of work which are obviously by a Mind other than our own." Furthermore, he does not believe in the supernatural; "that is to say, I do not believe in any existence outside of what we call Nature which is not also an existence inside of it, and even filling it to the very brim." "In denying distinctions which Bacon saw, Mr. Huxley is setting up a far deeper distinction between two worlds than that which he ridicules and condemns." At this point the Duke of Argyle passes to the discussion of the doctrine of evolution. The only one which is indisputably true is simply this: "that throughout the universe of nature, so far as we know it, everything happens through the operation of definite causes, which are so managed as to co-operate in the production of certain definite results." This general doctrine, furthermore, has nothing to do with theories about the ultimate nature of those causes or about the conditions of time under which they have worked. The point of difference, as stated in this article, is that Mr. Huxley's doctrine is "that all life, as known to us in animal and vegetable organisms, has been evolved by the processes of ordinary generation, and no other." The Duke of Argyle, after a fuller outline, which we must omit for lack of space, affirms with confidence that Huxley's doctrine seems to deny one of the most far-reaching conclusions of his own science and the teaching of one of its chiefest apostles:—

No one knows better than Mr. Huxley the doctrine of the great John Hunter, that life is the cause of organization, and not its consequence. Somehow and somewhere, and at some time, organic life was really originated in our world; and the first organism was not its own originating cause, but, contrariwise, life was the cause of the first organism. It cannot, therefore, be true that science affirms of organic life that it began by ordinary generation, and "no other way." But, if life must have been at least once introduced into our planet by "some other way" than ordinary generation, evolution as conceived by Mr. Huxley ceases to hold the place which he assigns to it. If organic life has certainly been otherwise begun, we cannot possibly decide on any safe a priori grounds that the other—the originating—process, whatever it was, may not have been many times repeated since organisms were first created.

THE BOSTON UNITARIAN CLUB.

REPORT OF THE COUNCIL FOR THE YEAR 1894.

The secretary has the honor to report for the Council the operations of the club for the past year. Its prosperity continues, its membership is full, its waiting-list is large, and a wide interest continues to be awakened in its monthly meetings.

During the year the Council voted to print and issue twenty thousand copies of the "Unitarian Annual," edited by Rev. D. M. Wilson, which has been widely circulated in Unitarian homes. It was prepared with a view to give, in an illustrated and attractive form, information as to the activity of the denomination in every department of its work; to awaken the individual and personal interest of all Unitarians in their missionary enterprises; and thus to stimulate the yearly contributions of the churches to its funds. The demand for this little publication has been such, from all parts of the country, that the Unitarian Association has issued another edition of ten thousand copies from the plates which have been transferred to them. The issue of this particular pamphlet carries with it no pledge for a renewal of it another year.

The National Conference at Saratoga in September greatly quickened our denominational work. It moved the churches to a deep sense of the obligation resting upon them to carry forward our Unitarian Christianity with a zeal and power never before known in its history. It has proved and is proving a revival in the best sense,—an awakening of our people to their great opportunity for the spread of our rational faith, so fitly paraphrased in the new words which the Conference has inscribed upon its banner.

We represent in this Unitarian Club, to a larger degree, perhaps, than any other organization, the bone and sinew, the strength and physical resources, of our religious faith. However widely scattered, however strong, or however weak our individual churches may be, they all look, naturally, to the great centre of Boston Unitarianism for courage, for faith, for stimulus, and for example in the work before them. What organization so fit for leadership as ours? Where, if not here, shall our constituency look for wise suggestion, for helpful, generous service in the good cause,—to whom, if not to us, for that spirit which unfolds the new banner of love to God and love to man, and carries it to the front of battle?

Action upon the death of Dr. Grindall Reynolds has been appropriately taken here. Let us renew again our sense of this great loss to our cause. Almost from the day of his death, after the adjournment of the Conference, we have been discussing, in public and in private, the new plans for the future operations of the Unitarian Association. The new secretary, the enthusiastic choice of the entire body of Unitarians in America, has been elected. We had the pleasure of introducing to you here at our last meeting the gentleman selected for financial secretary,—a highly trained business man, all on fire for his cause; and we hope he will accept the office. It is our duty to stand back to back behind these officers. It is not an easy task we commit to them. It is our business they are doing. Let us see to it that it is not half done, or is but falteringly done, because of failure on our part to generously sustain it.

Our necrology covers loved and honored names,—William R. Austin, Robert S. Covil, Charles G. Wood, Theodore H. Bell, and James Wentworth Brown. We recall the name of Charles G. Wood with peculiar tenderness and sorrow. He was closely identified with every movement of our denominational life. He gave his best powers and resources freely to our cause, and for all good causes his generosity rose above the standard of many generous men. Indeed, there were few interests in Boston appealing to the sympathy of the public where he did not reach out the hand of help and healing, as if it were the privilege of his life to be in touch with suffering everywhere. The quiet dignity and charm of his presence here will long be remembered.

James Wentworth Brown, in the full maturity of life; and Theodore H. Bell, who had passed the golden line of threescore years and ten,—both passed suddenly on to join the invisible company of those who had faithfully served in their day and time. The activity of the former in large business enterprises, which still left leisure for all good works, and for all the kindly amenities of life; the gentle, retiring disposition of the latter; and the service of both in all noble causes in the community,—brought to them large circles of friends, who mourned their loss.

We have had several memorable meetings during the year. In January Dr. Lyman Abbott gave an inspiring address on "Personal Religion," which added a noble paper to our literature. Those who were present will recall the thrilling earnestness of his speech,—the prophet's voice proclaiming the eternal verities. In February we had a discussion of the question, "Is Righteousness the Law of the World?" by Rev. Theodore C. Williams, Mr. Merle St. Croix Wright, and Rev. Mr. Savage. In March we welcomed a large company of ladies to the hospitalities of the club, and listened to addresses by Mr. Jacob A. Riis of New York, and by Dr. Robbins of the Rivington Street College Settlement of that city, on "The Children of the Poor of Great Cities," illustrated by the stereopticon.

In April we had the pleasure of listening to an address by Dr. Felix Adler of New York on "The Teachings of Jesus." It was an event to be remembered by those of us who sat under the charm of his speech and felt the profound, tender reverence of his thought. He seemed to lead us back by simple steps directly to the personality of Jesus himself, as we listened to the fresh interpretations of his great ethical teachings. It seemed at the time to many of us that this address was the great event in our history.

The summer then intervened; and our October meeting gave us the echoes of the great Conference at Saratoga.

In November Mr. Francis C. Lowell read a remarkable paper on the subject of "God and the Ideal of Man." By general consent, I think, this paper has taken its place in our memories as one of the noblest among many noble papers read upon this platform. It is to be hoped that it may be reproduced, and given a place in our permanent literature.

The December meeting brought our year to a close by addresses by Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, George W. Stone, and Hon. Horace G. Wadlin, on "Business Methods in Missionary Work"; and a noble policy was outlined there.

A remarkably wide and friendly interest is taken by the public in these monthly discussions. The press echoes our words, and we have an audience much greater than the one usually gathered here. We hear of this even from friends in other religious communions, who follow our work with care, and are often inspired by our inspiring themes.

Whatever the subject may be, we never forget that we are Unitarians, and carry deep in our hearts the great verities of our faith. And, because we are Unitarians, we naturally ally ourselves with every good cause that works for righteousness and truth, whether found within or without our denominational lines, still working that the kingdom of God may the sooner come on earth.

All of which is respectfully submitted in behalf of the Council.

WILLIAM HOWELL REED, Sec'y.

The Sunday School.

The usual Channing Hall "talks" at the Unitarian Building, 25 Beacon Street, will be held next Saturday, February 2. Subject, Lesson XIX., "The Parable of the Sower." Primary at 2 P.M., conducted by Miss A. C. Dockham; Intermediate and Advanced at three o'clock, led by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford. All cordially invited.

UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION OF BOSTON.—At the fourth meeting of the season the secretary announced that the directors had filled the vacancy in the Executive Board by appointing Hon. Charles H. Porter of Quincy president, and by choosing Mr. Frank B. Thayer for the vice-presidency.

The first speaker, Rev. Edward A. Horton, spoke upon "The Offer of Rewards in Sunday-schools." He called attention first to the fact that, though the schools, as a whole, disapprove the practice, yet there are many walks in life where we find prizes given. If the law of compensation is necessary in what we may call the outer world, why should we not use it in the Sunday-school? The danger lies in encouraging rivalry and greediness, the very spirit which we are trying to correct in our pupils, and in the fact that those who lose the prize are apt also to lose interest. The child may be taught to strive for the approbation of teacher, minister, and superintendent. Then, too, the true child has a love for knowledge, and will appreciate the benefit to be derived from regular attendance in a wide-awake school.

The second topic, "Sunday-school Concerts and Entertainments," was assigned to Rev. E. J. Prescott, of Kennebunk, who urged that children have frequent entertainments in which they may take some part, however slight. They care much more for school or church, if taught to feel that it is their school or their church. He advocated a richer form of service, and that we use vastly more music. If a concert be held, let it be a genuine, religious, helpful concert.

Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer of Providence, who has succeeded wonderfully in her Lend a Hand organization, unconsciously revealed the secret of her success as she spoke upon the subject, "Lend a Hand Clubs and Other Philanthropic Work." After enumerating the "four grand divisions" of our work,—Lend a Hand Clubs, Unity Clubs, guilds, and King's Daughters,—Mrs. Spencer said that she has found the Lend a Hand Club most helpful to her in her work, and for this reason: it has a twofold object,—to develop the spiritual side of one's nature and to give friendly help. The guild cultivates the giving of expression to religious thought; but is it natural for youth to look within, is it healthful to have too much introspection? Will not an occasional religious service for young people provide as well for that? Such a service may be under the control of the Lend a Hand Club. But this club, to exist, must do something for somebody else. So Mrs. Spencer forms her whole school into one club, and has it work for some city charity. The truly liberal church teaches all people to work together socially, and it is a real hurt to youth to feel itself in isolation. If the children find that they can meet with other children on some common plane, they will love their own school more, however small it may be.

Miss Kate L. Brown made a brave defence of guilds. Rev. B. F. McDaniel spoke of the helpfulness of both organizations, and believes that no one who knows the work of either will do away with either. Rev. Mr. Shippen of Dorchester says that the system of rewards takes its supply in outward motive, while the object of religious work is, or should be, in inward motive. He suggests a new line of work for the young people; namely, to take reading to older ones who are kept from attending church or lectures. He would make it on a wider plane than the so-called Bible readers, and believes that, whatever book be chosen, the youth will get some good from such contact with their elders. Mr. Reccord of Cambridge has found help in a roll of honor containing the names of the ten pupils whose attendance has been most regular during the year.

After another word or two from Mrs. Spencer, the meeting adjourned at 8.30, as usual.

NEW YORK UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.—Next regular meeting, Monday, February 4, at the parish house of All Souls' Church, 104 East Twentieth Street. Directors' meeting at 4.30 P.M., business meeting at 5.30 P.M., supper at 6 P.M., discussion at 7 P.M. Subject, "Sunday School Music," continued from last meeting, opened by Rev. Stephen H. Camp. George H. Badger, Secretary.

Religious Intelligence.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning; announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.]

THE regular monthly meeting of the South Middlesex Branches of the Women's Alliance will be held at the Unitarian Building on Thursday, February 7, at twelve o'clock.

THE fine portrait of Rev. Grindall Reynolds, D.D., painted by Mr. Jacob Wagner, was presented to the American Unitarian Association in Channing Hall Tuesday afternoon, January 29. The presentation was made on behalf of the committee by Mrs. S. E. Hooper. Informal but appreciative remarks were made by Hon. George S. Hale, Rev. Charles G. Ames, Rev. E. E. Hale, Rev. E. J. Young, Prof. Joseph Henry Allen, Rev. Solon W. Bush, and Thomas Gaffield, Esq. The likeness was considered an admirable one, and gives general satisfaction. The committee and the donors received the thanks of those present at the meeting, as they will, though unspoken, those of many other friends of Dr. Reynolds and the Association,—not only for the gift, but for the promptness with which the plan was carried out.

CHANNING CLUB.—The January meeting of the Channing Club was held last week. Mayor Curtis, Rev. W. R. Lord, and Rev. Mr. Beach of Cambridge were the speakers. The mayor thought it would be a good thing to take the control of granting saloon licenses out of the hands of men controlling the police. The two powers should be distinct, and in the hands of two different boards. He believed, too, that young men ought to take a greater and deeper interest in political affairs. Rev. William R. Lord also spoke on the "Norwegian Liquor System," the topic of the evening. He compared the saloon as it is to-day with the saloon as it would be under the proposed bill, and outlined the arguments advanced in favor of the adoption of the measure. Rev. Mr. Beach of Cambridge, in his speech, gave an outline of the history of the plan proposed in the bill, and told something of its workings in Norway and Sweden.

Rev. M. J. Savage will conduct the service at King's Chapel on Wednesday, February 6, at twelve o'clock.

Ministers' Monday Club: February 4, 10.30 A.M. Rev. Loren B. Macdonald will preside. Prof. C. C. Everett, D.D., will give the essay, on "The Devil."

Parker Memorial, corner Berkeley and Appleton Streets (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): Service on Sunday evening, February 3, at 7.30. Rev. Edward Everett Hale, D.D. Subject, "Religion of Daily Life." Music by boy choir, twenty-three members. Mr. J. J. Cooper, choir-master.

South Congregational Church: The subjects and speakers before the class in good citizenship for the month of February are: February 3, Prof. T. D. Lindsay, "The Grammar School and the High School"; February 10, Curtis Guild, Jr., "Practical Politics"; February 17, N. W. Ladd, "The Massachusetts Legislature"; February 24, John Storer Cobb, "Cremation."

Bulfinch Place Church (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): Afternoon service at 3.15; evening at 8, when Rev. John Cuckson will speak upon "Great Ideals." On Monday evening Mr. Charles H. Rutan will speak in the good citizenship series, upon "Municipal Reform." Other meetings in this series will be as follows: February 11, "Trades-unions and their Relation to the Future," by Mr. Harry Lloyd of the Central Labor Union; February 18, entertainment, music and readings, programme to be announced later; February 25, "The Golden Rule and Competition," by Rev. Charles F. Dole, author of "The American Citizen"; March 4, "Child-saving," by Mr. Charles W. Birtwell, manager of the Children's Aid Society.

BILLERICA, MASS.—On Wednesday afternoon, January 23, Mr. Minot O. Simons was ordained to the pastorate of the First Congregational Society of Billerica. The council was organized by the choice of Rev. A. P. Putnam, D.D., of Concord as moderator, and Rev. C. A. Staples of Lexington as scribe. Pastors and delegates from the following churches were present; namely, Lowell, Chelmsford, Bedford, Concord, Lexington, East Lexington, Littleton, and Wellesley Hills. The day was sunny and pleasant, the congregation filled the church, and the services were impressive and inspiring. Mr. Savage's sermon was especially quickening and uplifting, on "The Church of the Living God"; and the address to the people from the retiring pastor, Rev. C. C. Hussey, who for nearly thirty years has been a faithful minister, honored and beloved by the whole town, was most tender, affectionate, and beautiful. Mr. Simons has a united and happy people, and a career of great usefulness lies before him.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.—On Monday evening, January 28, Rev. Messrs. J. W. Chadwick and S. A. Eliot were the guests of the Congregational Club, and the speakers of the evening, upon "Oliver Wendell Holmes."

LAWRENCE, MASS.—The Unity Club has published a neat programme for its weekly meetings through the winter, indicating a study of leading Americans in politics, theology, history, and various branches of literature.

NEWTON CENTRE, MASS.—The Association of Ministers in and about Cambridge will meet with Rev. B. F. McDaniel at Newton Centre on Monday, February 4. Collation at 1 P.M. Essay at two o'clock. Subject, "The Congestion of Wealth in the United States." Train leaves Boston & Albany station at 12.02 P.M.

NEW YORK, N.Y.—Evidently, a good degree of prosperity prevails in the Lenox Avenue Unitarian Church, as is shown by the annual report of the treasurer, which states that the receipts of the society have met the current expenses of $7,292.79, with a balance of $50 in the treasury; while the church debt has been reduced from $40,550 to $36,400. Some improvements in the gallery of the church have been paid for out of a specially contributed fund of $1,000, making the total expenditures for the year, for all purposes, $11,907.23. The new sittings let during the year have amounted to $627.50.

OMAHA, NEB.—The activities of Unity Church were never so brisk as this winter. The women are plying their needles, making and mending clothing to send to the needy in the south-western part of the State. Unity Club is attracting unusual attendance, especially in the political economy and Shakspeare sections; and the Sunday-evening lectures provided by the club are awakening much interest. The literary event of the winter, however, is a course of six lectures to be given on consecutive Monday evenings, commencing January 28, the proceeds of which bid fair to liquidate an organ debt of $500. Three of the lectures will be by members of the congregation; one by the city superintendent of public schools, Dr. A. P. Marble, late of Worcester; one by Rabbi Franklin of Omaha; and one by Rev. Elinor Gordon of Sioux City. Nine out of twenty-two announcements of "Coming Events" in a recent number of the Omaha Excelsior, society newspaper of the city, are of lectures to be given at Unity Church. The Sunday morning congregation, though showing the loss, by removal from the city in late years, of a number of staunch supporters, and having the shifting character that so marks the attendance in Western churches, is steadily increasing. The Sunday-school has become a decided success, leaping in the last year from next to nothing up to an average attendance of seventy-five.

STONEHAM, MASS.—The First Unitarian Church of Stoneham celebrated its freedom from debt by a festival on Thursday evening of last week. About two hundred people attended the banquet, which was served in the tastefully decorated chapel of the church. The company was welcomed by Rev. James Herman Whitmore, the minister of the church, under whose inspiring leadership this consummation has been brought about. Addresses were made by Mr. Whitmore, who presided; Myron W. Messer; William B. Stevens, Esq.; Rev. H. C. De Long of Medford; and Rev. C. J. Staples of Manchester, N.H. Among the invited guests who were present were Mr. George H. Ellis, publisher of the Christian Register, and Rev. Edwin Hitchcock, pastor of the Methodist church of Stoneham. Letters of congratulation were received from Rev. George Batchelor, secretary of the American Unitarian Association; Mr. Walter S. Blanchard, president of the South Middlesex Conference; Rev. E. A. Horton; Mr. Archibald M. Howe of Cambridge, and others. During the evening music was furnished by an orchestra of young people connected with the church. In their joy over this deliverance from the bondage of debt, the members of this church remember with gratitude the assistance which has been so kindly rendered them by the American Unitarian Association and the South Middlesex Conference; and they hope that in the future they may be more earnest than ever before in advancing the principles of liberal Christianity under which they are organized.

SWITZERLAND.—The Protestants of Geneva have established a new journal, entitled Le Signal. Such a journal has long been needed to express the sentiment of progressive Protestantism.

WESTBORO, MASS.—The people of the First Unitarian Society have raised money for electric lights in the church, and a memorial window is to be placed over the pulpit. Twenty-nine persons were received into the church during the month of December.

WORCESTER CONFERENCE.—The twenty-eighth annual meeting of the Worcester Conference, which met with the First Unitarian Society, Clinton, Mass., January 23 and 24, was one of the largest and most successful sessions in the history of the conference. An inspiring sermon was preached by Rev. S. M. Crothers, from the text, "Gallio careth for none of these things," Acts xviii. 17. If religion is to be identified with some outgrown dogma or some one system of theology, then the theologians and philosophers are rightfully interested; but others will "care for none of these things." If religion is identified with a ritual, it is only the Churchmen who are interested; and Gallio may rightfully say, "I care for none of these things." Men want to live their higher life, to develop their own life to the fullest results. People are not indifferent to the religion of Jesus. We would learn what that religion is, and how to apply it, even if it cuts right through the churches, showing us that everything which separates man from his brother separates him from God. The wisdom of religion is found not in books: it exists as well in the busy street as in the study. If you care for the sanctity of your home, you then come to the centre of religion. You build your homes and warm them with your love, but can shut out neither sickness nor death. You cannot make earthly homes which have no partings. The time will come when you will each see before you the inevitable. As in a trap, you see the trapper, and know you cannot escape. Then your joy is turned into bitterness, unless you have found something by which to be reconciled to that which must come. You must have learned to believe in a love larger than your own.

The conference was continued on Thursday morning with a devotional service by Rev. J. H. Weeks of Westboro, who spoke on "Social Life." The secretary, in his annual report, congratulated the South Church, Worcester, on the completion and dedication of its new edifice, referred to the suggestion of the Council of the National Conference that the local conferences make some effort to bring the detached Unitarians into living touch with organized Unitarianism, urged the need of the churches giving their generous support to the American Unitarian Association.

The essay of the forenoon was read by Rev. A. J. Culp of Winchendon, on "Faith and Agnosticism." The essayist undertook to show that the history of the Church is an illustration of the triumph of faith over the vacillations, uncertainties, and obstinacies of reason. Intellectual difficulties remain, but faith overcomes. Notwithstanding the discoveries of science and the results of Biblical criticism, showing traces of human infirmity on nearly every page of the Bible, people continue to believe and worship. Deeper than all intellectual statements, deeper than all forms of doctrine, the churches rest on the unshaken rock of faith. Yet faith is not impatient of doctrine. Age after age the Church has asked those who knocked at its doors what they believed, thus manifesting an extreme solicitude in the matter of doctrine. This was not a piece of stupendous folly long drawn out: rather it served a divine purpose in sifting out those who had it in them to become members of the living Church from those who lacked some inner vital quality necessary to such a consummation. Christianity has hitherto looked for the man of belief, and has shaped its demands accordingly. The person who stands baffled and confused in the presence of the unknown or the unknowable, not daring to believe, not venturing to hope, did not furnish the material for church-building. Such a one is marked with a certain incapacity of head or heart that unfits him for the moral and spiritual emergencies of life. The world is still to have a Church, and it will be a Church of faith. We may be less sure of many things,—may trust more and know less. We may have to stand on some simple statement that has more faith in it than half the creeds. It will never be less than a belief in God, the Father Almighty. The discussion of the essay was opened by Rev. W. F. Greenman, and continued by Messrs. Pratt, Littlefield, Allen, Hayward, Garver, and Blood.

The essay of the afternoon was read by Rev. V. E. Southworth of Ware, and called forth an animated discussion. The subject of his paper was "An Animated Moderation in Church Affairs." It was an earnest plea for "energy of mind with balance of mind" in the conduct of the church life. The essay was a philippic against preachers and people. It was a daring challenge to the members of the conference to disprove their lukewarmness and immoderate conservatism. After the discussion was opened by Rev. C. A. Roys of Uxbridge, who pleaded for more inspiration in our churches, while contending that there was as much earnestness in them to-day as ever before. It was seen that free platforms are not a rare thing in the Worcester Conference. The discussion was participated in by Messrs. Weeks, Greenman, Wilson of Hopedale, Porter, Pratt, Hayward, Kent, and Stebbins.

Rev. G. H. Hosmer of Neponset, Boston, represented the Unitarian Temperance Society, and in a short address gave the conference some information concerning the work of the Temperance Society.

A resolution on the death of Hon. Phineas Ball, the first president of the association, and a man of rare simplicity and integrity, was unanimously adopted.

The Missionary Committee, consisting of Messrs. Greenman, Kent, and Duncan, was reappointed, and $50 appropriated for its use. The following officers for the coming year were elected: president, Charles H. Blood (Fitchburg); vice-presidents, Rev. George H. Ball (Upton), John C. Otis (Worcester); secretary, Rev. J. C. Duncan (Clinton); treasurer, Edward F. Tolman (Worcester); directors, Jonathan Smith, Esq. (Clinton), Mr. E. W. Batchelder (Upton), Mr. W. S. Heywood (Sterling); Rev. Messrs. A. F. Bailey (Barre), W. F. Greenman (Fitchburg), A. S. Garver (Worcester); auditors, John C. Otis and Theodore S. Johnson (Worcester). A vote of thanks to Rev. S. M. Crothers for his excellent sermon was unanimously adopted. The motion of Mr. Garver expressing thanks to the Clinton parish for its admirable hospitality was unanimously carried by a rising vote.

Business Notices.

The Church of Light.—In grandfather's days somehow it didn't seem just the thing to have the inside of the church as bright and cheerful as the home. Folks thought that there was piety in dim religious light. Nowadays religion is the food of week-days as well as of Sundays, and people worship in the light. It's rather hard to make folks see the light of heaven in a dimly lighted church. The original command, "Let there be light," was decidedly material. I. P. Frink, 551 Pearl Street, New York, has just issued a book of Church Light,—129 engravings of chandeliers for gas and oil, electrolights, reflectors, side lights, and every kind of fixture for the lighting of a church. This book is worth having, and it's free to any one who will send a postal card request for it.

The Phenix Insurance Company of Brooklyn, N.Y.—The Phenix is one of the excellent companies of New York State, of which there are many. It began business in 1853. It has a capital stock of $1,000,000. Although the past year has been a trying one for fire insurance underwriters, the Phenix, owing to its excellent management, is able to show a handsome surplus as compared with last year,—namely, $406,359.53, which is $245,000 increase. The assets amount to $5,350,275.93. The company reports this year, among its assets, about $480,000 less due for premiums in course of collection. George P. Sheldon is President, Charles C. Little is Secretary.—N.Y. Independent.

Twins.—The pair of exquisite Twin Bedsteads in enamelled white iron, with full trimmings of polished brass, which is shown in another column by Paine Furniture Co., is one of the greatest bargains we have ever seen advertised in chamber furniture. It seems almost impossible that this pair of bedsteads can be sold at $13. A representative of this paper has seen the bedsteads; and they are beauties,—dainty and neat as wax, light but strong, and occupying only one foot more space than a double bed.

It seems hardly possible, but nevertheless it is true, that on an average every fifty-fifth person you meet wears W. L. Douglas Shoes. Did you ever realize what an immense undertaking it is to supply one article of wearing apparel to over one million people?

Mr. A. E. Winship, of the Journal of Education, is organizing, and will personally conduct, a delightful European party, sailing on ("City of Rome") June 29.

HEAVEN.

BY CELIA P. WOOLLEY.

Never a sigh or tear, you say;
Laughter and sunshine the livelong day,
Regret and pain banished for aye;
In heaven, you say.

Yet sighs and tears have helped most here,
And joy and pain have stood so near
We knew not which to hold most dear,
Which helped most here.

I like heaven in the making best,
On earth, where truth and love join quest
For good that lies in work, not rest,— Heaven in the making best.

CAN CALVINISM BE IMPROVED?

BY REV. JOHN SNYDER.

A careful study of the changes proposed by the Revision Committee of the Presbyterian Church in the Westminster Confession of Faith will reveal the fact that revision is demanded by ethical rather than logical considerations. It is evident that a feeling largely prevails in the Church that there are certain bald expressions to be found in the "Confession" which are obnoxious to the modern man's sense of justice, and it will be seen that the efforts of the revisers have been mainly directed to the removal or modification of such expressions.

Thirty-nine changes have been suggested by the Revision Committee. Perhaps fifteen or sixteen of these changes may represent an alteration in the religious feeling and moral sentiment of the Church; but only five or six, at the most, suggest any essential modification of its theological position. Some of these changes exhibit a commendable desire to erase from the "Confession" all traces of the acrimonious controversy with the Church of Rome which marked the birth of Presbyterianism. The denunciation of the pope as the "man of sin," the "antichrist," and the "son of perdition," is happily to be eliminated; while all the references to the Roman Church are softened and deprived of their controversial sting. The earnest declaration of the Confession that such as "profess the true, reformed religion should not marry with infidels, papists, or other idolaters," is changed, so as to read, "Such as profess the true religion should not marry with infidels, nor with the adherents of false religions." In like manner the word "condemnation" is substituted for "damnation," leaving a margin of benevolent uncertainty respecting the final fate of those who incur the Church's censure. The section which condemns prayer for the dead and "for those of whom it may be known that they have sinned the sin unto death" is to drop the last paragraph. The Confession declares, with perfect directness, that good works done by unregenerate men are sinful. The revisers would delicately intimate that the works of unregenerate men "do not meet the requirements of the divine law, and hence cannot be pleaded as a ground of acceptance with God." The amendment would seem to the superficial observer to be more acceptable to the ethical sense of mankind; but it is evidently based upon a radical misconception of Paul's words, "Whatsoever is not of faith is of sin." The original article is to be preferred. The same may be said of the change wrought in the article which treats of the fall of man, etc. The article reads, "From this original corruption, whereby we are utterly indisposed, disabled, and made opposite to all good, and wholly inclined to all evil, do proceed all actual transgression." To these words the revisers would add, "Nevertheless, the providence of God, and the common operations of his Spirit, restrain men from much that is evil, and lead them to exercise many social and civil virtues." It is difficult to see how this addition strengthens or clarifies the original article. If it means to teach that unregenerate men are constantly doing actions which are for the benefit of society, it is a truism. If it means to declare that such actions, even when directed by the providence of God, are calculated to favorably affect the final destiny of unregenerate men, it contradicts that article, which teaches that the good actions of unregenerate men "do not meet the requirements of the divine law, and cannot be pleaded as the ground of acceptance with God." The suggested changes in these closely related articles tend to weaken and confuse the Church's doctrines, and make no real concession to the enlightened moral sense. If an unregenerate man is sent to hell, it can make but a slight difference to him whether his sentence arises from good works that are sinful or good works which do not meet the requirements of the divine law.

But the attention of those who study the works of the Revision Committee is naturally centred upon its treatment of the doctrine of election. And this, of course, is by far the most important part of its work. The doctrine of election is justly regarded as the corner-stone of Calvinism, the foundation upon which the vast structure of the Presbyterian Confession of Faith squarely rests. Accepting this doctrine as its major premise, the Confession will be seen to be the most complete and masterly piece of logic which the ecclesiastical mind has created.

The Calvinist accepts all the common and familiar features of the orthodox scheme. He holds that all men are guilty of disobedience because of their relation to their "federal head," that Adam's sin condemned the race to everlasting punishment, from which they were conditionally rescued by the imputed righteousness of Jesus Christ, the second person in the Trinity, the condition attached to this rescue being the acceptance by the individual transgressor of Christ's freely offered sacrifice of himself. Thus far the different branches of the evangelical Church concur. Beyond this we see many and important differences. These differences may be considered under four distinct heads.

1. The Catholic doctrine. Catholic theology holds that, by Adam's fall, while man was left in a wretched and ruined state, yet he retained sufficient natural morality and reason to guide him into the true Church, and that his full salvation is secured by the sacramental relations he voluntarily establishes with this supernatural institution.
2. The Arminian churches. They teach that every man, though a fallen creature, entirely lost without Christ, may, by the exercise of his own free will, accept the proffered salvation of Christ; that God neither foreordains nor designs the fate of any human soul.
3. The primitive Universalism, which holds that, while all men are lost in Adam's sin, all men are redeemed by the sacrifice of Christ.
4. The Calvinistic churches. Basing themselves, in common with the preceding churches, upon the fall of man and the sacrifice of Christ, they hold that God foresaw and foreordained the whole history of man's disobedience and spiritual death, and the means of escape that would be offered by his beloved Son. Therefore, and by necessity, he must have foreseen and foreordained the life and final destiny of each individual of the race. This is the bare doctrine of election, stripped of its accidents and accessories. And this doctrine the Confession of Faith enforces in the plainest and most unequivocal terms. The chapter which treats of "God's Eternal Grace" says, "By the decree of God, for the manifestation of his glory, some men and angels are predestinated unto everlasting life, and others foreordained to everlasting death." Also, "These angels and men, thus predestinated and foreordained, are particularly and unchangeably designed; and their number is so certain and definite that it cannot be increased or diminished." Therefore, "Those of mankind that are predestinated unto life God, before the foundation of the world was laid, according to his eternal and immutable purpose, and the secret counsel and good pleasure of his will, hath chosen in Christ unto everlasting glory, out of his mere free grace and love, without any foresight of faith or good works, or perseverance in either of them, or any other thing in the creature, as conditions or causes moving him thereunto; and all to the praise of his glorious grace." "The rest of mankind God was pleased, according to the unsearchable counsel of his own will, whereby he extendeth or withholdeth mercy as he pleaseth, for the glory of his sovereign power over his creature, to pass by, and to ordain them to dishonor and wrath for their sin, to the praise of his glorious justice." For all these statements the revisers propose the following substitute, "God, before the foundation of the world was laid, according to his eternal and immutable purpose, and the secret counsel and good pleasure of his will, hath predestinated an innumerable multitude of mankind unto life, and hath particularly and unchangeably chosen them in Christ unto everlasting glory, out of his mere free grace and love,—not on account of any foresight of faith or good works, or perseverance in either of them, or any other thing in the creature, as conditions or causes moving him thereunto; and all to the praise of his glorious grace." But "the rest of mankind God saw fit, according to the unsearchable counsel of his will, whereby he extendeth or withholdeth mercy as he pleaseth, not to elect unto eternal life; and them hath he ordained to dishonor and wrath for their sin, to the praise of his glorious justice. Yet hath he no pleasure in the death of the wicked; nor is it his decree, but the wickedness of their own hearts, which restraineth and hindereth them from accepting the free offer of his grace made in the gospel."

Under the head of "Effectual Calling" the Confession emphasizes the doctrine of election by declaring that only those who are predestinated unto life are effectually called by God's spirit to the use of the means by which their salvation can be secured. It teaches that mankind, under the dispensation of this divine grace, is but a passive instrument in God's hands, and that "elect infants, dying in infancy," and all classes of elect persons "who are incapable of being outwardly called by the ministry of the word," are saved by the free grace of God. In their treatment of this phase or consequence of the doctrine of election the revisers would strike out from the article on "Effectual Calling" the limiting clause which in the Confession strictly confines the means of grace to the elect. They would deny that in the process of salvation man is altogether passive (although they would declare that he is "dead in sin"); and they would substitute for the clause which asserts the salvation of "elect infants" the words "infants dying in infancy, and all other persons not guilty of actual transgression, are included in the election of grace, and are regenerated and saved by Christ through the Spirit, who worketh when and where and how he pleaseth."

It is plain enough to the most superficial reader that the dominant object of the Revision Committee is to reconcile the doctrine of election, and all its logical consequences, to the enlightened moral sense of this generation; and, if the suggested alterations have any definite meaning, they would seem to involve the entire abandonment of this doctrine of Election and the complete surrender of the Presbyterian Church to the essential principles of Arminianism. While the committee has retained and even emphasized certain forms of phraseology relative to this doctrine, it has broken some of the strongest links in that logical chain which was so courageously wrought by the Fathers of Westminster.

To every thoughtful man the spectacle of a great Church attempting to readjust and resolve the mighty problems of life and destiny is one of the most profound interest. And we may well pause and ask ourselves the momentous question, Will the adoption of this report bring the Presbyterian Church into greater harmony with the religious sentiments and philosophical convictions of the nineteenth century? I am convinced it will not. Unlike the English Prayer Book, which is susceptible of verbal and even doctrinal improvement, because it is and was intended to be a theological compromise, the Westminster Confession is absolutely homogeneous in its structure. It is a theological vertebrate. It bears the apparent marks of no doctrinal concessions or compromises, and was evidently the product of a body of men who were in essential unity upon all great doctrinal questions. Like the czar of Russia, who rejected the report of the engineers who had been engaged to build a road from Moscow to St. Petersburg because the proposed road deviated from a straight line in order to touch important towns on the route, so the Westminster divines have built a straight line of logic from premises to conclusion, not deviating to touch a single theological concession. To strike from that Confession a single important doctrine would be like amputating the arm of a man. The amputation may be necessary to save his life, but it must always impair his usefulness and strength. Can the system of Calvinism be improved by these proposed changes? Can it be improved by any changes that will not permanently impair its usefulness to the Presbyterian Church?

Accepting as its basis the commonly received "scheme" of Orthodoxy, I am sure that Calvinism not only possesses more logical consistency, but greater moral dignity than any other system to which that scheme has given rise.

What were the admitted moral consequences of Adam's disobedience? They were of such a serious nature that they required the sacrifice of a God to cancel and obliterate them. Without that sacrifice man would have been sentenced to everlasting condemnation. We may well leave out of the account the system of the older Universalism, because that system is discredited and obsolete. Calvinism is really confronted among evangelical churches only with the theologies of Arminianism and Catholicity. The latter finds man, if not utterly ruined and undone, yet so constitutionally impaired in his moral and spiritual nature that he may be compared to a sand-blind person, who has vision enough to see the light, but not enough to distinguish objects. To this vision, deranged and impaired, are presented the claims of a supernatural Church; and the man is held responsible for its acceptance or rejection. With a vitiated spiritual sense, he is expected to discriminate between an infallible institution and a multitude of pretenders. And upon that decision rests his eternal destiny.

And Arminianism is in precisely the same predicament. Conceding the lost condition of mankind, it yet throws upon mankind the responsibility of rejecting or accepting the sacrifice of Christ. The poor soul, with clipped pinions, and weighted with the lethargic poison of inherited sin, is expected to rise to the moral height that is implied in the acceptance of redemption; and thus a weight of awful responsibility is thrown upon a vitiated and partially paralyzed will.

Calvinism escapes from these moral absurdities and contradictions. It declares that by Adam's transgression all men are made dead in sin, wholly incapable of acceptable moral activity. Therefore, as no individual man can be the object of God's moral preference, it bases God's selection of certain men for salvation purely upon his sovereign pleasure. Arminianism affirms that every soul consciously rejecting Christ must go to hell, but it makes the consequences of Adam's fall practically inoperative until the first dawn of moral discrimination. Dying in infancy, the soul escapes those consequences entirely. Reaching the shadowy borderland of moral apprehension, it becomes heir to the awful inheritance. Thus are the dread issues of heaven and hell thrown into the weak and wavering scale of a child's vitiated will and immature intelligence.

Calvinism declares that every soul in the universe bears the equal penalty of Adam's sin. Those in whom that penalty is cancelled have been selected by the mysterious preference of God himself. Under any system of theology man accepts the omnipotence and omniscience of God. Therefore, it follows that from the doctrine of election there is no logical escape. Every man believes in election who believes in the absolute foreknowledge of God. Even Mr. Ingersoll practically accepts that doctrine. The great agnostic regards man as the product of a series of inherited moral necessities, which have created alike the criminal and the saint. His system is pure Calvinism, minus the foreknowledge of God at one end of man's career and heaven and hell at the other end. The Calvinist sees that all men are morally slain by the sin of Adam, and he throws upon God the sole responsibility of selecting from the mass of the dead those individuals who are to be the objects of his saving grace. He cannot base his selection upon moral grounds. His reasons for preferring one man above another are hidden in the abysmal darkness of the divine nature. And, whatever may be the consequences of that divine choice, they must surely be as operative upon the child dying in infancy as upon the man dying at fourscore years.

The theologian who imagines that he is vindicating the moral character of God by throwing upon the human soul the responsibility for its own damnation, while he recognizes that God has, directly or indirectly, created the conditions that make that damnation possible, or who denies the possibility of infant damnation, while he crowds upon the narrow stage of the first six or seven years of conscious existence the awful possibility of eternal destiny, must have a very shallow conception of the demands of the human conscience.

Consistent and logical Calvinism takes out of human hands the final question of human destiny. That question is left to the unsearchable will of God. And, while individual Calvinists have always speculated upon the vexed problem of the ratio of the saved and lost, yet there is nothing in the system itself which necessarily limits the possibility of universal salvation. It might, consistently with itself, even adopt the Catholic doctrine of "invincible ignorance," and hold that every soul has been divinely elected for salvation who is incapable of "being called by the outward ministry of the word." That would not only include "infants dying in infancy," but the teeming millions of heathen lands. This would limit the possibility of future danger to those Christians who have the misfortune to have reached the years of discretion.

Calvinism may have but a slight foothold in the Bible; but it is surely socketed in the necessary conceptions of human philosophy, and it is re-enforced by the undeniable facts of human life. Every philosophy leads to the massive and closed door of fate and free will. We can only escape from the doctrine of moral necessity by falling back upon the primal consciousness of personal freedom. And we see that men and women are born into the world weighted with the dread consequences of inherited misconduct,—people in whom the sense of moral responsibility can scarcely be said to exist. The student of human history and experience might well declare that the mass of men seem to be "elected" to a destiny in which the personal will, at times, plays but an insignificant part. Whether that destiny—be it good or evil—expresses the mysterious purpose of an infinite Intelligence, or merely represents the results of a blindly operative natural force, may be one of the unsolved problems of philosophy. Little children are born bearing the curse of sin, which defiles them in soul and body. They are predisposed to all evil, and made wholly opposite to all good. Whether, as science supposes, they are bearing the inevitable burden of a brutish ancestry, or, as Calvinism declares, the imputed sin of a "federal head," cannot, I conceive, be a question of much practical difference to them.

Calvinism has no place in Christianity; but, if it would cut itself clear from its very equivocal Biblical support and stand fairly upon the basis of philosophy, it would, as a system, command the intellectual respect of mankind.

If what has been said will stand the test of examination, it is certain that Calvinism cannot be logically improved by the verbal changes and obscurations it is likely to receive at the hands of the Revision Committee.

Of one radical improvement it is susceptible,—an improvement which would denude it of all of the ethical objections which, as a pure philosophy, it must always encounter. We have seen that it harmonizes with some of the most significant phases of human experience, that it offers a possible solution for some of the obvious moral mysteries of human life. It is not a cheerful view of human destiny to imagine that all spiritual inequalities, all hereditary taints of blood and brain, are inherited tendencies of evil springing from the mysterious will and pleasure of an infinite God. Such a conclusion is awfully inconsistent with the spirit of the New Testament. But it is a view which is philosophically tenable, and in its moral results does not differ radically from the common judgment held by such thinkers as John Stuart Mill, that human ills are probably due to the intractable nature of the material with which the divine hand works. The vast difference between this common judgment and Calvinism is that the former, if it looks beyond the confines of this present life, sees that the inevitable ills of existence may be educational in their nature, and that present sorrows, and even sins, may find their compensation in the final enrichment of character. Calvinism conceives of a future from which the ethical element of probation is rigorously excluded.

Whatever may be the educational advantages vouchsafed to the elect, the non-elect are shut up in a prison-house of remediless, useless, purposeless, and perpetual suffering. The ethical sense can endure the thought of suffering, even if that suffering is permitted or inflicted by God. Every theist must hold some modification of this doctrine. But to believe that God burdens men with sin, poisons their years with suffering, and then allows them to die impenitent, granting them no final destiny except eternal damnation, is to conceive an injustice so gross as to outstretch the capacity of human language. It does not lighten the injustice by the weight of a feather to urge the responsibility of personal freedom. To make the punishment of sin eternal is to rob such punishment of all moral significance. Whether the sinner eternally damns himself, or is eternally damned by God, is not a ground for the slightest moral distinction. The mere existence of an eternal punishment for sin makes the creation of free will in man an act of the greatest injustice and cruelty.

To give Calvinism, then, a logical place in philosophy, it must readjust its eschatology to more rational conceptions, it must take from its vision of the future the fixed and crystallized states called heaven and hell, it must leave room for the soul's growth out of the conditions which seem inevitable in its earthly career.

The essential theory of Calvinism may be the best solution of the universe. It is at least conceivable that God deliberately determined before the foundation of the world to bring upon men the sorrows and sins and burdens under which they groan, and from many of which it is impossible for them to escape. The indictment which men like Mill and Schopenhauer bring against nature may be, possibly, brought against God. Such a theory contradicts the central doctrine of Christ; but it is ethically endurable, provided it encloses the conception of an unlimited opportunity in the future for spiritual development and education. Lacking this, the system becomes a horror of great darkness. This is the only improvement in Calvinism which does not involve either the sacrifice of its logic or the surrender of its morality.

THE LOVE OF TRUTH.

BY REV. WILLIAM H. FURNESS.

The truth that I desire has reference to the present conduct of life, to the relations in which I stand to those around me, and to the duties which these relations involve. And I am perfectly satisfied that, if I seek to ascertain the truth that lies near to me, within my own immediate sphere, I shall have employment for all my time and all my strength; and I shall obtain all that I need. Life, at the longest, is very short. We are here to-day, and to-morrow we are gone. Let me try to harmonize the things that are close to me. This, I say, is a great work; and it takes all that a man has in him to do it well. With the best endeavors, I shall fail oftentimes. Still, I may make it my aim, the commanding principle of my life, to cultivate a desire for such truth as is needful for my guidance. I cannot afford to waste a moment.

It is a great thing when we have learned to distinguish things indifferent from matters of vital moment. The misfortune is that men are forever mixing up chaff with the wheat, and making no distinction; or, if they make any, it is in favor of the chaff and to the neglect of the wheat. Thus religion, or what men call their religion, instead of being the actual business of life, the discharge of all natural obligations, has become a mere childish formality, a barren routine of words, which people are so engrossed with repeating that they are blind to the iniquities that fill the world with misery.

What wonder is it that intelligent and thoughtful men lose all interest in religion, all faith in the possibility of arriving at any truth in regard to it, when they who profess to be seeking and advancing religious truth turn the whole subject into such a pitiable thing as this; when the results are as worthless as we see; and when shadows are worshipped, dogmas and forms; tithes of mint, anise, and cumin are scrupulously paid; while justice and the love of God are ignored. Who cares to inquire whether such a religion as this be true or not? It carries its low, earth-born origin written on its long face; and every man who is not blinded by prejudice and self-interest may read it running. Again, I say, it is a happy thing for us, it is the turning-point, the beginning of a new era in our existence, when we learn to distinguish. This we cannot do until we cease to take counsel of our prejudice, our passions, and our temporal interests, and are actuated in all things by one simple desire,—to see everything, not as it falls in with our comfort and success, but as it truly is. We all know how pleasant it is to gratify one's pride, how hard it is to suppress the bitter feeling and the hasty word, how easy to commit ourselves to the popular opinion, and to find shelter in the authority of the many. But, oh, how much nobler and happier it is to put one's self entirely out of the question, and to see every case in which we are concerned precisely as it stands! It saves us from doing others any injustice and from the reproachful and mortifying remembrance; from the blush of shame which mantles every man's cheek when the hour of calm reflection comes, and he is forced to recollect things said or done in the heat of passion which truth does not justify.

I counsel you, dear friends, to cherish the love of truth in the little things of life, in the sudden and hourly emergencies of social intercourse. He who is faithful to this love in the ordinary circumstances of every day is being prepared for the critical moments which try the stuff and quality of men. But by what a host of hostile influences is the precious desire of truth every instant surrounded! It is endangered by the strength of our kind sympathies, by an undue complaisance, tempting us, for the immediate prospect of conciliating the good will which is so dear to us all, to suppress or to compromise the truth. This danger is so great that the field of battle does not offer greater occasion for heroic courage than a social party or the domestic circle. Then, again, in what numbers of the young does the fine sense of truth suffer detriment from the habit of exaggerated speech in which we fall, from our anxiety to create a sensation! It is a delicate and difficult work to guard against these cunning influences. But it pays. Truth rewards those who are faithful to her with a more than royal munificence, and rewards them with a sense of security and power such as nothing else can give, and with an influence in the world which no advantage of education or position can bestow. Yes, it is the truth-loving men, the men who prove that they love nothing so ardently as to be just,—it is these who, in the long run, rule the world, and control the course of human affairs. These it is, or the sainted memories of these, that give men comfort and guidance in times of uproar and danger. Jesus of Nazareth sacrificed himself for the truth, wrote his testimony to it in his blood; and now to his dominion there will be no end. He reigns and must reign in the grateful faith of mankind.

Finally, as it is not the possession, but the desire, the love, the spirit of truth, which is the one highest qualification of any human being, let us have done, once for all, with estimating men by the faith they possess, by the opinions which they avow. Whenever we see evidences of a truthful disposition, there let us freely accord our respect and confidence as to a friend of God and a brother of Christ. And this I say, not in reference to those who are styled orthodox: we seldom find any difficulty in being liberal toward those who believe more than we do. It is those who believe less than we, those who wholly reject what we warmly maintain, whom we are most apt to distrust and to look down upon with "an unconscious self-righteousness," as if we were better than they,—not because we are heartier lovers of truth, but because of certain forms of thought which we hold to. This is the sin of the whole Christian world. In the pride of our mere Christian name, we undervalue those who, though they do not accept the Christian name, yet give abundant evidence that they seek only truth. I would be emancipated from the bondage of mere names. I would learn to honor the desire of truth as the most expressive sign of the grace of God, when it appears in those whom the Christian world denounces as infidels and atheists. I would learn to recognize no other distinction than that between those whose supreme desire it is at all times to behold things as they are, and those who wish only to see things as they please and serve them. Meditate on this thing, my friends. I commend you to the All-ministering Spirit. Raise your hearts to that in silent and inexpressible worship!

Spiritual Life.

Our happiness is an incident, and not an end. The end is that God's glory, his own nature and being, be manifest in us. All else may go uncared for: happiness will take care of itself, and strength and peace will flow from celestial heights.—Horatio Stebbins.

How many weeks will any of us be able to live without coming to some spot where it will be felt as a rational comfort to believe that all our way, step by step, trial by trial, surprise, success, failure, loss, removal, was ordered for us by Him who sees the end from the beginning?—Bishop F. D. Huntington.

To-day thou shalt discover lack in thy brother of integrity or of high moral standards, but beware of self-righteousness. To-morrow thou shalt thyself disappoint a friend, or fail in helpfulness or in deep spiritual insight. Thou shalt fail even as thy brother failed, unless thou hast beheld his fault only with love and sorrow.—Letters from an Unknown Friend.

If you could once make up your mind in the fear of God never to undertake more work of any sort than you can carry on calmly, quietly, without hurry or flurry, and the instant you feel yourself growing nervous, and like one out of breath, would stop and take breath, you would find this simple, common-sense rule doing for you what no prayers or tears could accomplish.—Elizabeth Prentiss.

The San Francisco Report commends the example of the Unitarian Club of that city, insisting upon punctuality:—

The fact that the Unitarian Club has solemnly resolved that members must be punctual at the annual dinner to-night, and that laggards will be given but five minutes' grace, will strike people from more civilized communities with surprise,—not surprise that people are required to be punctual, but that they have to be so informed. There is nothing much more indicative of bad breeding than lack of punctuality in social or personal affairs, or of lack of proper training when the matter is one of business. But it is a cold, unpleasant truth that punctuality is hardly expected by a very large number of San Franciscans, either in social, personal, or business matters, or those of amusement. The ease, comfort, and general desirability of perfect punctuality in all spheres of life, from the arrival of a train to the warning tap of a theatre conductor's bâton, cannot be appreciated by those who have not at some time enjoyed them. However, it is only a matter of time. We shall all follow the example of the Unitarian Club some day here,—be punctual ourselves, and insist upon punctuality in others.

THE UNITARIAN CLUB OF NEW YORK.

"The Modern Novel" was the subject considered at the annual dinner of the Unitarian Club, which was held Wednesday evening, January 23, at the St. Denis Hotel.

Rev. Dr. James G. Townsend, by request, repeated his paper previously given at the Ministers' Luncheon. At the end of the dinner he was introduced by the president, Mr. Gilman H. Tucker, who in his opening remarks sketched the growth of novel-reading.

Dr. Townsend's paper was earnest, eloquent, and carefully reasoned. In substance he charged "that, for the most part, the novels of to-day are tiresome, trivial, unreal, or false"; but he gladly excepted "The White Company," "The Manxman," "Rhoda Fleming," "The House of the Wolf," and "Marcella," books which express, at least, something of worth, something of beauty." Dr. Townsend admitted that the novel should be a work of art, and maintained that it should be something more than this. The author in the field of fiction should be an artist, teacher, and a prophet; and his work should make for education, for morality, for beauty,—in all which many of the novelists of to-day lamentably fail. It is not the mission of the novelist to discover new ideas; but he should give the ideas of his time in noble forms, enshrine them in beautiful women and loving men. The pathos, the mystery, the meanness of life, are not to be excluded; but the great movements of humanity, with their many examples of gladness, goodness, and courage, are to be included. The long and short stories of to-day have often a depressing element. They gather for us a multitude of facts that are of no more consequence than the sweepings of the floors of our common rooms. It is not the reporter who makes the novelist, "but he who with clear and simple glance perceives the salient, the revealing, the inspiring fact."

Passing by, in his criticism, the class of ephemeral and commonplace writers,—in which class he placed Ouida, Conway, Haggard, and Besant,—Dr. Townsend spoke of Robert Louis Stevenson, who, in the judgment of many, stood first among recent story-writers. He granted him a foremost place in the world of letters, but thought that the critical faculty in Mr. Stevenson exceeded the creative. His stories did not possess the simplicity, the completeness, the beauty, the sustained vigor of the whole, the gradual culmination of thought and feeling, which should make the writer rather than fine passages and climaxes of sensation.

So, too, with Du Maurier's "Trilby." The book has a certain charm. This is found in its style, its dramatic situations, and its strange characters. But the main personages of the story are a hypnotizing devil; an almost too good youth; and a blanchisseuse de fin, who, after an awakening of a true sense of shame, declares on her death-bed that her darkest sin was an act of thoughtlessness to her little brother,—a strange ethical implication, that makes the loss of chastity one of the minor vices.

Dr. Townsend closed his paper with a remonstrance against the morbid character, the prevailing pessimism of the recent novels. This he attributed to a loss of faith,—not in God in a theological sense, but in man, in goodness, in truth, in beauty.

Miss Marguerite Merington spoke next. Her address was witty and colloquial rather than argumentative. She believed that spirituality was, after all, the thing to be striven for by novelists and all men.

Mr. Robert Bridges, who followed Miss Merington, is the assistant editor of Scribner's Magazine and "Droch" of Life. His weekly literary criticism for the next number of that paper he anticipated by reading it to the club. It is called "Little Way Off," a criticism of the pessimistic novel, of Ibsenism, and can be read in the current number of Life.

Mr. Bridges was not inclined to take the modern novel very seriously. It was rarely a guide to life, because it was not written by a practical person. As a Presbyterian, he would rather take the Shorter Catechism for his guide than "The Heavenly Twins." After stating that there were novels that were written for respectable people and novels that were written for fools, and after criticising the "new-woman novel," the "sanitarium novel," the "scientific pessimistic novel," Mr. Bridges summed up his remarks by saying: "The true novel should be devoted to the life of good, healthy men and women. It should teach wholesomeness of living. It should be an expression of good or bad human nature, but it should be strong; and it should encourage goodness, healthy living, high ideals."

Rev. John W. Chadwick next spoke. He did not think that Dr. Townsend had the right perspective. The modern novel is not the novel of the last few years only. We should go back far enough to include Trollope, Dickens, Meredith, and others of their set. What we speak of as the novel of to-day may be the merest eddy in the current. Mr. Chadwick agreed with Mr. Bridges that the modern novel must not be taken too seriously. We do not go to the novel for moral help, although the best of the works of fiction often do give us this help. Nor must we judge the novel of to-day too narrowly. The wonder is, not that we have so much dullness, but that we have so much brightness. The harm of the middle-class novel is intellectual rather than moral. It produces, so to speak, a fatty degeneration of the mind; and, if it hurts us morally, it is because we are all of one piece. The test is, Does a novel make us care more for the mean than for the good things of life? If it produces the former result, it is bad for us: if the latter, it is good for us.

This closed the after-dinner talk, and there only remained the election of officers for the new year. The committee on nominations presented the names of the following gentlemen, who were unanimously elected to serve for the ensuing year: president, John A. Taylor, Esq.; vice-presidents, N. R. Holden and Monroe B. Bryant; secretary, Percy D. Adams, Esq.; treasurer, Charles H. Pinkham, Jr.; members of the Council, Henry L. Faris, William H. Kenyon, Esq., DeBorden Wilmot, Esq. Mr. Taylor, on taking the chair, made a fitting and most excellent address.

A LAYMAN'S CREDENTIALS.

Our readers will be interested, perhaps amused, to see the form of the credentials which an English bishop gives to people who are willing to go round and read among the poor in his diocese.

Some of us can read without being commissioned by some one else. But there are stages in society where, undoubtedly, such a document as that which we copy—particularly if it has an Episcopal seal—carries a certain weight with it.

Even Paul says, "How shall they go unless they are sent?" And perhaps we shall be asked to believe that Paul waited, brooding in Tarsus for some years before he went out on that mission which has changed the world, and that he waited simply because nobody asked him to go that he was too modest to start on his own responsibility.

SEAL. Mandell—by divine permission Bishop of Peterborough. To our well-beloved and approved in Christ, John William, Greeting. We do by these presents grant unto you our Commission to execute the office and perform the duties of a Lay Reader in the parish of Loughborough, within our Diocese and Jurisdiction, on the nomination of the Reverend Thomas Pitts; and we do hereby authorise you to read such of the Holy Scriptures and explain the same to the aged, sick, and impotent, and to such other persons in the said Parish as the Incumbent shall suggest and direct; to read the appointed Lessons in the Parish Church; and also to read publicly in the Mission Rooms, or in any other place allowed by Us, such portions of the Morning and Evening Service in the Book of Common Prayer as we shall appoint and direct, and after such service to expound some portion of Holy Scripture to those assembled, or to read such godly homily or discourse as by the Incumbent may be judged most suitable and edifying. And we exhort you to seek out Children not baptized, and to notify cases of sickness to the Parish Priest, and to give diligent heed to Prayer and the Study of Holy Scripture, and to be an example of Godliness, Sobriety, and Brotherly Love; and we do hereby notify and declare that this our Commission shall remain valid and have full Force and Authority until it shall either be revoked by Us or our Successors, or a fresh Institution to the Benefice shall have been made and completed, at and after which last-mentioned time it shall be competent for an Application to be made to Us or our Successors for a Renewal and Continuance of this our present Commission and Authority. And so We commend you to Almighty God, whose Blessing and Favour we humbly pray may rest on you and your Work. Given under our Hand and Seal this Tenth day of April in the Year, etc., etc., 1894, of our Consecration the Third.

LORD ORMONT AND HIS AMINTA. By George Meredith. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.—In this novel, we are assured, George Meredith delights his friends and confounds his enemies as he has not done for many a day. It has been compared to his next before this, "One of our Conquerors," greatly to the latter's disadvantage. Certainly, this book is much shorter than that, and contains much less dull reading. But how about the relative moral value of the two? "One of our Conquerors" was a story of the collapse of a man of brilliant social unreality. The book was morally bracing and inspiring. But in "Lord Ormont and his Aminta" we have quite another matter. Lord Ormont is a brave and able and distinguished British general. In the first chapters we have a boys' school and a girls' school in the same town; and in the former there is a boy, and in the latter a girl, full of enthusiasm for Lord Ormont's character and career, and with a generous liking for each other. These chapters have a delightful promise in their pleasant stream. They are as good as the opening chapter of "Diana of the Crossways" is bad. Meredith has written nothing better of the life of boys and girls. Years pass; and, when we meet Aminta again, she is the wife of Lord Ormont, who is sulking, like Achilles in his tent, because the British public has been dull to his great worth. And shortly Matthew Weyburn, Aminta's school-boy lover, becomes his private secretary, with a view to writing his military memoirs. To punish the British public for treating him so shabbily, Lord Ormont plays off his wife upon it as a woman doubtfully virtuous and perhaps irregularly joined with him. He is, however, about ready to do her every honor, when she declares her independence, and goes off with Weyburn, to be matron, while he is teacher, of a school for boys and girls in Switzerland,—"woo'd and married and a'." Thrown a good deal together, the wine stirred in the cask: the old love had "renewed its ancient rapture." No one can deny the beauty with which Mr. Meredith sets forth the loves of Weyburn and Lady Ormont, culminating in "A Marine Duet,"—a love-scene, the parties to which are swimming with a fine hilarity. The reviewers have generally taken for granted that Mr. Meredith means to set the seal of his approval on the conduct of Aminta and her lover. They understand him to say that such a marriage as that of Lord Ormont and his Aminta is more honorable in the breach than in the observance. These opinions may be just, but they are not necessarily so. He may mean no more than that such a marriage as that tends to make such a rebellion as Aminta's, and that, given two such persons as Aminta and Weyburn, they would do as he lets them do. But the last point gives us pause. Mr. Meredith's characters generally act from their individuality with a remarkable coherency. But Matthew Weyburn does not seem to be the man to do what he is represented as doing. He is singularly self-contained, and even something of a prig. True, even such have broken down under the stress of an abounding loveliness of womanhood. Your man of intellect is often capable of a grand passion to an astonishing degree,—most astonishing to himself. But Weyburn's conduct does not seem to be logically related to his moral character. He and Aminta are less satisfactory than the other characters in the story. Aminta's aunt is a terror of vulgar social ambition. Lord Ormont's sister is one of his best creations, as imperious as Queen Elizabeth, and as impatient with her feminine restraints as Mary Queen of Scots,—a woman who would be a man. Lord Ormont's mingled strength and weakness are as true and sad as their reality in human life. As for the style of the book, it is inimitable,—at least, such is our hope. A cross sea was never choprier. But Mr. Meredith might say with Father Taylor, "My verb has lost its nominative, but I'm bound for the kingdom of heaven all the same." Many of his sentences are a kind of queer notation, which convey no definite meaning; but we snatch at something tangible in the dark. Others yield up a meaning clear enough to the third or fourth reading. Others still are packed with meaning, beauty, wit. Like Browning, Mr. Meredith often seems to be writing in a shorthand of his own invention. But we understand enough to make us glad and thankful, while we cordially forgive the rest.

J. W. C.

MICAH CLARKE. By A. Conan Doyle. New York: Harper Brothers.—This vigorous account of an English Covenantor who took part in the uprising of Monmouth bears little resemblance to the stories with which the name of its author is at present chiefly associated. The narrative is told in the first person; and, if all those who resisted the Stuarts had been like Micah, possessing "the thews of an ox and the heart of a woman," one can well believe that this handful of resolute peasants, with their pikes and scythes, might indeed have altered the whole course of English history, as he says they came within an ace of doing. The book is long and closely written, but it has shown itself interesting enough to hold the attention of readers of different ages. It is a noble historical novel, deserving the attention it has received, and suggesting that we may expect other really great books from a writer who is something more than popular.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE MASSACHUSETTS PUBLIC SCHOOL SYSTEM: A HISTORICAL SKETCH. By George H. Martin. New York: D. Appleton & Co.—Many of the books in the International Education Series are mainly interesting to those who are making a serious study of pedagogy, but the present volume will appeal to many classes of readers. Mr. Martin is one of the Supervisors of Public Schools in this State, and has had abundant material at hand for his interesting book. He sketches the successive steps of progress in education here, as compulsory teaching, compulsory schools, compulsory certificating of teachers, compulsory supervision, and compulsory school attendance. Besides these, he notes other highly important epochs, and reviews their influence and results. The book is well worth attention from all who are interested in our public school system, from whatever cause.

I AM WELL: THE MODERN PRACTICE OF NATURAL SUGGESTION. By C. W. Post. Boston: Lee & Shepard.—This is the second edition of a text-book for those who desire to use mental practice for healing, and the author has endeavored to state the subject so that it may be readily grasped without preliminary study in psychology or metaphysics. It gives rules for daily treatment, first bidding the patient "to still all voices from intellect which will object to the teachings herein." So far as it promotes steadiness of nerve and quiet of mind, no one need object to its teaching, however much or little he may believe in or distrust the extreme positions stated.

MASTER AND MEN; OR, THE SERMON ON THE MOUNTAIN PRACTISED ON THE PLAIN. By William Burnet Wright. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.25.—The main thought of Mr. Wright's book is indicated by the subtitle. It is an honest endeavor to understand the words of Jesus in the face of the problems and perplexities that meet the student of Christianity as it presents itself to-day. The writer believes that the current religious discussions and so-called infidelity are signs that Christendom is learning to look to Jesus instead of Paul as its ultimate teacher; and his book is an earnest, helpful call to nobler living.

THE CHURCH AND SECULAR LIFE. By Frederick William Hamerton. Boston: Universalist Publishing House.—The eight lectures which this book contains were delivered at the Church of Our Father in Pawtucket, R.I. They consider the relations of the Church to education, charity, business, labor, politics, and other aspects of life and society. They are written out of a belief that the Church is, potentially at least, the best and strongest agency at hand to help bring about a better social order, and that the Church should assert itself as having to do with every activity of human life.

SOCIAL GROWTH AND STABILITY. By D. Ostrander. Chicago: S. C. Griggs & Co.—This book is a consideration of the factors of modern society and their relation to the character of the coming State. The author writes from a belief that from the wage-earner is withheld his just proportion of the benefits which have come to this age by reason of the great discoveries in mechanical science. He thus desires to promote a better understanding in regard to men's relations to one another. He considers these relations in various phases. The book is thoughtful, but rather diffusive.

COMMEMORATIVE ADDRESSES: GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS, EDWIN BOOTH, LOUIS KOSSUTH, JOHN JAMES AUDUBON, WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT. By Parke Godwin. Harper & Brothers.—These essays or addresses are rich in graphic description, delicate analysis, and genuine appreciation. They present their subjects as seen by one quick to catch characteristics and able to compress much comment and judgment in short space. Kossuth and Audubon have especially needed such interpretation as this. The essays will all be read with interest.

THE POWER OF AN ENDLESS LIFE. By Thomas C. Hall. Chicago: A. C. McClurg. $1.—Rev. Thomas C. Hall is the son of Dr. Hall of New York, and is now settled over the Fourth Presbyterian Church of Chicago. His Presbyterianism is of the progressive kind; and his sermons are not intended to be theological, but practical. Four of the sermons are concerned, respectively, with the impulsive, the intellectual, the ethical, and the mystic types of Christianity, taking Peter, Paul, James, and John as their representatives. Mr. Hall writes with directness and vigor.

PESSIMISM, SCIENCE, AND GOD. By John Page Hopps. London and Edinburgh: Williams & Norgate.—The name of Mr. Hopps is familiar not only to English, but American Unitarians. He says in a brief prefatory note that the preparation and publication of this book were suggested from "beyond the veil." There are twelve meditations, representing the circle of the year, and considering in different lights and shadows "the mystery of God, the dark problem of misery and sin, the dim gropings, and the exultant certainties of science."

THE LIFE AND GENIUS OF TINTORETTO. By Frank Preston Stearns. G. P. Putnam's Sons.—Much has been written about Tintoretto in the way of eulogy or illustration, but no systematic examination of his works or analysis of his claims to honor has ever appeared in English. Mr. Stearns has performed his task in a thorough manner, and the result is a book that will be interesting and valuable to every lover of art or art history. The frontispiece is a fine reproduction of the portrait of Tintoretto by himself.

JEAN BELIN. From the French of Alfred de Brébat. Lee & Shepard. $1.50.—Jean Belin is the French Robinson Crusoe, and this book is issued as a companion to "The Swiss Family Robinson." Jean and his companions are cast upon an uninhabited part of Africa, where they show the same fertility of resources and ingenuity of invention that we should expect from rivals of our old friends. The book is not only interesting, but suggestive of the value of self-help and thoughtful action.

UNDER FRIENDLY EAVES. By Olive E. Dana, Augusta, Me. Published by the author. $1.25.—Those of us who have country cousins may find their likenesses hung under these friendly eaves. They are not rural or rustic or even picturesque; but they are natural. These sketches are made without much attempt at style or finish; but they are sweet with sympathy. In the collection there are, perhaps, too many Thanksgivings, Christmases, and Valentine Days for one season's reading.

THE LIGHT OF LIFE. By Frank Walters. London: Philip Green.—The seventeen sermons in this book are not connected with each other except as they all urge the power of goodness, and the importance of the religious life. Mr. Walters believes in the coming of the kingdom of God on earth, that there is no permanent power of evil in the world, and that suffering is the minister by which man is compelled to work out nobler conditions of life. Thus his gospel is one of encouragement and hope.

Miscellaneous.

Three recent numbers of the Riverside Literature Series give, respectively, selections from Whittier's "Child Life in Prose," "Child Life in Poetry," and poems of Goldsmith. The latter includes "The Deserted Village," "The Traveler," and other poems, edited with a biographical sketch and notes, both explanatory and suggestive.

The book of Job is published in Maynard's English Classic Series in such a way that it may be easily studied as a dramatic poem deserving its high place in literature. The text is printed as in the revised version, the poetical portions being put in lines. The notes are comparatively few in number, designed, usually, to elucidate a passage that might be misunderstood.

HERALD SERMONS. By George H. Hepworth. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.—In an introduction to this book Mr. Hepworth describes a conversation with Mr. Bennett of the Herald, showing how the idea of printing weekly sermons in the Sunday edition of that paper originated, and then states his aim in writing them. They avoid controversy, aim to be non-sectarian, and simply tell the people what is necessary to an honest life. They are all short, and treat of practical topics.

In Love with Love.

Four Life-Studies. By JAMES H. WEST, Author of "The Complete Life," "Uplifts of Heart and Will," etc. pp. 109.

Contents: 1. Transfigurations; 2. Serenity; 3. True Greatness; 4. Our Other Selves.

[JOHN W. CHADWICK, in the Christian Register.]

There is something singularly fresh and strong in Mr. West's way of putting things. Any one of these studies read at night would sweeten a man's slumber, and waken him in the morning to some better sense of his great opportunity.

[LILIAN WHITING, author of "The World Beautiful," in the Boston Budget.]

"In Love with Love" is a book which must be read to be appreciated. It is one of those gems of spiritual richness, the sufficient value of which the reviewer is powerless to name. It can only be said, in the most abstract manner, that this little volume, by James H. West, author of "The Complete Life," "Uplifts of Heart and Will," and "Visions of Good," as well as numerous poems, is a very little minister carrying very big truths. It is a book which every one should own, for it cannot but make a disciple wherever it finds a reader. Its theme is life, and its animus is love.

HOW DO THEY FARE?

BY ANNA OLCOTT COMMELIN.

We say "God-speed" to dear ones when they leave us

For distant lands beyond the foaming wave,
But ever still, for word and sign and token
That all is well, our hearts, expectant, crave.

How do they fare, the well-beloved, the living,
Who seek, afar, earth's wonders on their way?
We follow all their footsteps in their journey,
And watch and wait each message, day by day.

We lay our loved away,—our dead and dearest;
How fares the soul? our hearts in anguish cry.
"Tis not for us to rend the veil of silence,"
Who ne'er have drunk from sorrow's cup reply.

"Seek not communion with the world of spirits,
And all thy efforts, unavailing, cease;
Turn thou to others in the throng of living,
Leave thou the dead to slumber and to peace."

The dead, who loved us, come again in longing!
Would they be happy in some far-off sphere,
Estranged from all the tender ties once sacred,
Which made of life its consecration here?

No! Still they love us! Still they long to tell us,
In wondrous way, by message and by sign,
"All is not lost! we seek you as you seek us!"
Wouldst thou shut out these messengers divine?

CHRISTMAS AT RAMONA RANCH.

BY SARAH E. SPENCER.

You will wish to know how your wards and their guardians in the hills of Montana spent their Christmas. Had it not been for the mysterious preparations going on all over the house,—the unpacking of barrels and boxes at night, when the young Crows were in the land of dreams; and the careful closing of doors when they were awake,—one could scarcely realize that Christmas was so near at hand. The weather had been so mild it had seemed more like October than December. We had wondered how Santa Claus was going to endure such warm weather, when, lo! a change comes on Sunday. It blows and it snows, and the mercury sinks down until it stops at ten below zero. That will do for Christmas weather.

The Indians had returned from their summer home at the agency, and had camped near by for several days, so as to be handy to send a messenger each day to find out "how many sleeps to Christmas." The hills had lost one more of their beautiful evergreen ornaments, and this time the Indian boys had been intrusted with its selection; and you may be sure it was a handsome one, with wide-spreading branches.

For several days the teachers had been busy assorting, marking, and hanging up the many gifts which had appeared from the depths of boxes and barrels, where they had been packed weeks before by loving hearts and generous hands so far away. These tokens of good will, many of them, were labelled "A merry Christmas to the little Indian boys and girls!" "A merry Christmas to the little Crows!" or "A merry Christmas to all at Ramona Ranch!" Most earnest and cordial thanks for the kindly greetings as well as the beautiful presents for the children!

Tuesday evening finally arrived, and with it we hear the glad cry of the children, "The Indians are coming!" Sure enough, we can see them coming in separate parties from the north and the south,—from the camps of Sorrel Horse, White Fox, Big Ox, and Old Wolfe. How different this cry of the children from what it would have been a few years ago! They are not coming now in war paint and feathers, and riding wild ponies, but are, most of them, on foot, coming leisurely to enjoy their children's Christmas festivities. It is a great pleasure to the children that their "people" can be with them at Christmas time. Many of them always begin asking, "Can my father, mother, and grandmother come?" as soon as they begin asking, "How many weeks to Christmas?" This time some of their friends evidently came without their supper, for at our table the children forego eating their favorite biscuits that "my faver might have it." The fathers, mothers, and "friends" continue to come until we can count seventy-five, besides many papposes which peep out of hoods and blankets from the broad backs of their mammas. When our ushers get the crowd of Indian visitors packed in Hemenway Hall, you who know the location may, if you can, come in to see and listen. In the east end of the room are all the "big Indians," banked against the wall and packed in on the seats, in the aisles, and on the floor, so that, if one tries to get in, he must walk over their heads. A few of the large boys and girls occupy seats, but most of them take the wall for support. The small children have "reserved seats" on rugs and carpets on the floor in front of the tree.

In the west end of the room is the tree, with branches reaching from side to side and gracefully bending with the weight of dolls and toys of every description. We will try to listen to the children's Christmas songs, but our eyes as well as our thoughts are on the fruits of the tree. If I had been set back fifty years or more, and were cherishing expectations from the tree, I should be wondering which of those beautiful dolls perched in the branches or swinging from a limb was to fall to my lot,—whether it would be one of the beautiful blondes dressed in blue, with eyes to match, or a lovely brunette in pink gingham. Then there is a flaxen-haired sailor-boy in blue, pronounced lovely by all. The thoughts of the boys are on the strains of melody which they will evoke from those horns and mouth-organs, or perhaps they are longing for a book, a knife, or an engine. Perhaps, also, all are thinking of that pile of sixty bags of candy and peanuts as helping to make "merry Christmas." That bushel basket of peanuts on the floor, all know, is for the visiting Indians as they pass out.

When the children finish their songs, the door opens. A fairy appears, and introduces a son of Santa Claus, since it is stated that Santa Claus, Sr., has gone on a long journey elsewhere. Our young Santa bears his honors well, and helps to distribute the presents with celerity. To give a picture of bright faces and satisfied looks is impossible. We wish the young ladies who spent so much time in dressing the pretty dolls could see the loving looks and caresses bestowed on them. Our Ruth brings a sweet little brunette to the table, which she holds with one hand while with the other she manages to eat her dinner. The boys seem as well pleased with their toys, mittens, caps, and knives; and, of course, every one is delighted with a bag of peanuts and candy.

When the Indians are invited to pass out, that bushel basket of peanuts is soon empty; and so is the room.

Now pass with me for a moment into the play and sewing rooms, which have been given up to the children for an hour to visit with their parents and friends,—to eat peanuts and show their treasures. All sit on the floor, to the number of one hundred and forty,—the children dressed in their Sunday best, and many of the Indians in civilized costumes. All are talking,—a medley unintelligible to us; but looks and actions are not so, and we know that they are happy.

JOHN HENRY'S ADVENTURE.

"John Henry, John Henry! Come here to me-e-e! Quick now! Do you hear-r-r?"

"Yes, ma!" came in a clear, shrill voice from far down the snowy road; and presently the boy came into sight.

He was a very small boy, indeed,—a thick-set, rosy boy, with cheeks like bright, speckled apples; and he was swinging two small school-books round and round at the end of a long, thin strap.

It was late in the afternoon; and John Henry was just returning from the district school-house, which stood at a fork in the road fully half a mile away.

"John Henry, what is the matter? You're late,—later'n usual," his mother said. She was a good-hearted, busy woman, but very apt to be severe.

"Yes, ma. Teacher she kep' me in 'cause I spelled rate R-A-T, an' 'cause I forgot an' drew Bobby Long on my slate stead o' doin' sums."

"O John Henry, you're an awful bad boy!"

"Yes, ma: I guess I am," he assented cheerfully. He had heard it said of him so often that he had come to believe it must be so.

"And here I've been waiting and wondering what had become of you!" his mother went on. "For I want you to take back this umbrella I borrowed yesterday of the minister's wife, when I got caught down in the village in the storm. You take good care of it now, John Henry; and give my compliments to Mrs. Tomlinson, and tell her I'm much obliged. And be sure to remember to take off your hat and wipe your shoes well on the door-mat. And I want you to go just as quick as you can."

"Yes, ma. I could go twicet as quick on my skates,—if you'd only let me!"

"Well, well, John Henry, go anyway you like, so long as you don't get into any mischief and are back by supper-time."

Five minutes later, and the small, chubby boy, with a big, baggy, brown cotton umbrella in one hand and a large pair of skates (which his big brother had outgrown, and he himself had not yet grown into) in the other, sat himself down on the river's bank.

Another minute, and he was off, and speeding down the river before the wind, with both arms swinging in unison with his rapidly moving legs.

Half an hour later, and the same boy was toiling up the river against the cutting wind to the very place whence he had started, and where the big umbrella, which he had forgotten, was lying prone on the icy bank. He had never once thought of it until a bend in the river far below had brought the church and the minister's house into view, and had so recalled his errand.

And now it was growing late, and John Henry's sturdy legs were working hard in his effort to overtake the time his forgetful head had lost.

But at last he had a luminous idea. Why should not the big umbrella do its share of the work? The wind at his back was blowing harder than ever as John Henry tugged at the obstinate fastening, until it finally consented to open; and then, "Hurrah!" he cried, for he was an ice-boat now, and was skimming along with all sail set.

"Hurrah! but whoa there! Not so fast!" For the umbrella, with a sudden ominous flap, has turned itself inside out.

Never mind: it still serves as a sail, still helps him to skim over the ice with flying speed; and it will be time enough to turn it back again, he thinks, when the end of his journey is reached.

"Hurrah!" He has come now to the place where the river broadens, and where there are other skaters; and yet, by the wonderful umbrella's aid, he passes them all. They pause, and regard him with amazement,—this small, flying figure under full sail. They even point their hands at him, and call out; but their words are lost in the boisterous shriek of the wind.

"Hurrah!" And he laughs for glee. But crash! And, as the ice gives way beneath him, John Henry's laugh ends suddenly in an outcry of distress.

Oh, how bitterly chill the icy, black water is! How swift is the current which is trying to draw him under, and how brittle are the sharp edges of the ice which crumble away at his grasp! His mother had bidden him not get into mischief. What would she say if she saw him now? But, mindful of his trust, he still clings desperately to the fateful umbrella; and that steadily buoys him up.

Help is soon at hand; and, by the aid of planks and a rope, John Henry is drawn up out of the hole at last, a chilled and shivering boy, and minus the cherished, but too large skates, which, loosened, no doubt, by the spasmodic workings of his frightened legs, have gone to the bottom of the river, their final resting-place.

Lifted by friendly arms, John Henry is being borne away to a cottage on the shore near by, when, "Oh, be sure an' bring along that umbrella!" comes in smothered tones from the depths of the great-coat in which they have muffled him from head to foot. And so the umbrella is brought along.

The minister and his wife had just seated themselves at supper, when there came a knock at their door. Mr. Tomlinson rose to open it, and stood, lamp in hand, surveying in speechless astonishment the amazing spectacle of a very small being clad in the garments of a full-grown man. The trouser-legs and coat-sleeves, though rolled up to their utmost extent, were still many inches too long; and the coat-tails were dragging upon the ground. The wreck of a big umbrella was firmly grasped by one invisible hand, while the other was making ineffectual efforts to remove a sodden and battered cap.

"Ma sends her compliments," the strange, small figure began.

"But who or what are you?" interrupted the astonished minister. "And who is ma?"

"I'm Mrs. Perkins's John Henry, an' I've come to bring back the umbrella Mrs. Tomlinson lent ma. An' I fell in a hole in the ice with it, an' lost my skates, an' broke three ribs, an' tore it awful—three of its ribs, I mean; an' another man he pulled me out, an' lent me his clothes while mine's a-dryin' by the fire; an' I come right along to ask if you'd let me take it back home again till we could get it mended. For ma'll feel awful 'cause I broke it, an' I'm dretful sorry," the small figure ended breathlessly.

The minister had drawn John Henry into the room, and it was all that he and his good wife could do to keep from laughing outright at the comical sight before them.

"You are sure you are not hurt yourself? Nor cold? Well, then, it doesn't matter about the umbrella. You needn't feel badly at all," Mrs. Tomlinson kindly assured him. "It was an old one, anyway; and I'm glad that you got off so well, though I'm sorry about your skates. Now sit right down here and have some warm supper with us."

"No, ma'am," John Henry said, though he looked at the table with hungry eyes. "'cause ma told me to go as quick as I could; an' I went an' forgot the umbrella first off, an' had to go back; an' then I fell in, an' I've been gone an awful long time already."

"Well, then, take all these cookies to eat on your way. I'm glad to see that Mrs. Perkins has such a good and truthful little son."

John Henry shook his small head vigorously. "I ain't a bit good," he said sadly. "I guess most any one can tell that; but I don't tell lies about things, 'cause that makes a feller feel too awful small an' mean."

Then, with a queer little bob of the head, he vanished into the outer darkness before the minister or his wife could put out a detaining hand.

By the time John Henry had gone back to the riverside cottage and exchanged the borrowed clothes for his own, which had been drying there during his absence,—and had given his new friends Mrs. Tomlinson's delicious cookies (all but the one he couldn't help eating on the way) in return for the kindness they had shown him, and had trotted the long country mile from there to his own home, it was dark, and very cold, and long past supper-time. John Henry's spirits had been falling lower at every step of the way, for the prospect of his mother's reception of him preyed upon his troubled mind.

But the idea of trying to deceive her never occurred to him. To escape the foreseen whipping by telling a falsehood would, as he had said to Mrs. Tomlinson, have made him feel "too awful small and mean." But he did not want to give his mother such a "turn" as she had had the day of Brother Jake's fall from the barn-loft; and he was still puzzling how to tell her about his unfortunate plunge in the river, and its consequences, without giving her unnecessary alarm, when home was reached.

"Late again, John Henry!" was his mother's rigid greeting. "There's some supper I saved you. Now sit right down and eat it. There's time enough for talking and excuses afterward."

John Henry needed no second bidding, but fell to work with the ravenous appetite of a hungry boy.

"Well, now," said Mrs. Perkins, when he had finished, "what did Mrs. Tomlinson say?"

"She said," John Henry answered thoughtfully,—"she said it didn't matter."

"Well, I declare!" Mrs. Perkins exclaimed in astonishment.

"You see, ma, it had got broke," explained John Henry.

"Got broke! When, I should like to know?"

"When I lost my skates," John Henry said sadly.

"Lost your skates, indeed! And how did that happen?"

"You see, ma, it happened when—Well—you see, a boy broke through the ice; an' it was awful cold an' wet. But there wasn't no danger, for the umbrella was bigger than the hole. So he didn't get drowned, after all. An' that was what made me late."

"What boy was it?" asked Mrs. Perkins, eying him now with growing anxiety and suspicion.

"Your boy, ma," said John Henry.

"I know I'm dretful bad, but I didn't mean to be. An' they got me out all right, only my skates was so big they fell off an' got lost, an the umbrella it somehow got broke in the ribs. You ain't much scared though, are you, ma? I knew you'd scold; but, somehow," straightening his small self bravely, "I guess I'd rather take the whipping than not tell you 'zactly how it happened."

And thereupon he went back to the beginning, and told the entire story.

But happy-go-lucky, thoughtless, truth-loving little John Henry got only tender mother-hugs and rare caresses on that eventful night.

And his delight can be better imagined than described when the next bright Saturday morning he found a pair of fine new skates by his bedside, a present from kind-hearted Mrs. Tomlinson.

As he was starting out right after breakfast to try them, his mother called him back and said: "Now, John Henry, just you try to remember to keep yourself out of mischief, and out of danger as well. I know you're not really a bad boy, but only a very thoughtless one. And mind," she added, with her face puckering into one of her rare smiles, "don't you ever try to turn yourself into an ice-boat again,—and with a borrowed umbrella, too."—Judith Spencer, in Observer.

DORA AND HER RING.

As little Dora was feeding some birds out of her window, a pretty ring slipped from her finger and fell, and nobody could find it. She felt very sorry, for the ring had been given to her by her grandmamma. It was too large for her; and she put it on only once in a while, and then would lay it away. Somebody said, "How foolish for her to feed the birds!" One day, three or four weeks after she lost the ring, Dora thought she would look for it again; and she found in the bushes beneath her window a bird's-nest, and, peeping in, saw five little birds. The mother-bird flew around so wildly that Dora thought she would wait till some other day to look at the little baby-birds. But she got only a peep now and then, for the mother-bird kept watching as if she feared somebody would rob her nest. But one day in July, when all was still, Dora stood tiptoe and gazed into the nest. The birds had all gone, but she saw something shining brightly in the soft down at the side of the nest where the birds had lived. It was her own precious ring, which had fallen into the nest! She never lost it again, and she was always glad that she fed the birds.—Little Men and Women.

TOM AND DOROTHY.

BY A. D. M.

[Two little Boston children who are much interested in the Home for motherless little negroes at Mount Pleasant, N.C., and the beautiful work of Miss Munroe, who is giving her life to be a mother to these homeless little ones, have received the following sweet acknowledgment of their Christmas presents.]

Who can they be? Who can they be,—
This little Tom and Dorothy?
I wonder whether they're large or small,
Whether they're short or whether they're tall,
If they are fat or if they are lean,
And how many Christmases they've seen,
Bless me! how old can these children be,
This little Tom and Dorothy?

I wonder whether their eyes are bright,
Whether their hair is dark or light:
It isn't woolly, that's very clear,
Like that on the heads of the children here.
They must be good, these little elves,
And thoughtful of others beside themselves,
To send their picture-books and toys
And pennies to these little girls and boys.
Bless me! how I'd like to see
This little Tom and Dorothy.

One thing I know, these children two
I shall have to judge by what they do:
Their hands are willing, their hearts are kind,
The pleasures of others thus to mind.
May they ever be kept, these hearts and hands,
In the way of the dear Lord's commands.
God bless them both, wherever they be,
This dear little Tom and Dorothy!

WHAT HAPPENED TO DOT.

Dot was on the porch getting Clementina Blanche to sleep, when she heard mamma coming downstairs. "Dottie, where are you?" she called. "Don't!"—

Dottie jumped up all at once, and, slipping softly down the steps, ran out into the orchard as fast as her two little legs could carry her.

"I don't want to know anything about any don't's," she said to herself. "Charlie Norton said for me to come over there after dinner, and his mother would let his Dickey bird out of the cage a little while, and I want to go. I don't mostly suppose she was going to say, Don't you go out of the yard, she was prob'ly just going to tell me not to play in the sun. Anyhow, I didn't hear her say not to go away, so I'm going."

And away Dottie went across lots over to Charlie's, but she felt guilty all the time; for, after all, she was pretty sure that mamma was going to say, Don't go away. However, the surer she felt, the faster she ran.

"I didn't hear her say a word 'bout not coming," she kept saying.

They had a great time, she and Charlie. Mrs. Norton shut the doors and windows, and let Dickey out of his cage. He flew from one to the other, and hopped about, and seemed to enjoy it so much.

Finally, Mrs. Norton said he must go back to his cage, but this Dickey did not wish to do; and he was so cute about it that the children were very much amused.

He would perch on a chair or picture, and let Mrs. Norton almost catch him, then, just as she was about to put her hands on him, off he would go to some point beyond her reach, and, cocking his little head on one side, pour forth a flood of melody.

The children were on the lounge: in their excitement they stood up, leaning against the wall.

Suddenly, without any warning, out went the lounge, and over on to the floor went the children. Dottie struck her head on a sharp corner, and for a few minutes she felt too faint and sick to move. Then she broke out sobbing. "I want—to go—straight home—to my mother," she said between her sobs. And home she went soon after, her head done up in brown paper soaked in vinegar.

"Did you call to me, and tell me not to go away?" she asked the first thing.

"Why, no, dear," answered mamma. "I called you an hour or so ago to ask you if you didn't want to go to ride with papa, and I could not find you, and he has gone alone."

Poor little Dottie, her tears fell afresh at this.

"I runned away, so's not to hear, 'cause I was 'fraid you meant to tell me not to go away, and I wanted to go over to Charlie's; and we fell, and got hurted, and I haven't been to ride with papa this long, long time."

It was too bad, wasn't it? Dottie thought so a great many times that long afternoon, as she lay on the lounge with a hard headache.

"I expect I deserved it all," she said to her mother that night, "but I'll remember after this. It is always just so when I'm naughty. I always get into troubles."

"Yes," said mamma, "it's the way with us all. The Bible says the way of the transgressor is hard; and it always is. The right way may look the hardest and most uninviting; but it is the safest and happiest in the end, my little daughter."

"Yes'm," said Dottie, meekly, "I guess it is. I'll remember."—Child's Hour.

THE USES OF CORK.

In Spain beehives, kitchen pails, and other culinary utensils are made of cork, including pillows. In Italy images and crosses are carved out of it, and footpaths are paved with it. In Turkey it forms cabins for the cork-cutters and coffins for the dead. In Morocco it appears in the form of drinking-vessels, plates, tubs, and water conduits. In Algeria shoes, armor, and boats, and various articles of furniture consume their share. Cups made of cork have been recommended for the use of hectic persons. One familiar article in which a great deal of cork is used in our own country is the cork jacket, an adjunct to the outfit of the mariner which cannot be dispensed with. This life-protecting apparatus, although no doubt a vast improvement on the original, cannot be classed among modern inventions; for Plutarch, in his life of Camillus, mentions that the messenger sent by that general to his fellow-citizens when besieged in the Capitol used a cork jacket in swimming across the Tiber, the Gauls being in possession of the bridge. The Portuguese use cork for structural purposes, such as roofing houses and lining wells, as well as in articles of domestic use.

Recreation is intended to the mind as whetting is to the scythe, to sharpen the edge of it, which otherwise would grow dull and blunt. He, therefore, who spends his whole time in recreation is ever whetting, never mowing,—his grass may grow and his steed starve,—as, contrarily, he that always toils and never recreates is ever mowing, never whetting, laboring much to little purpose. As good no scythe as no edge. Then only doth the work go forward when the scythe is so seasonably and moderately whetted that it may cut, and so cuts that it may have the help of sharpening.—Bishop Hall.

MISS LUORETIA BABCOOK.

In a recent number of the Register was a brief mention of the death of Miss Lucretia Babcock. Hers was a life which, though spent in comparative seclusion, deserves more than a passing notice. Born in Milton eighty-three years ago, she passed nearly sixty years in the house where she was born, the last few years of that time being spent in faithful and loving attendance on an aged and helpless mother. After her mother's death she lived entirely alone for nearly twenty-five years. By nature she was cheerful and sympathetic, and her interests were wide and far-reaching. She lived in the lives of others, and her friends never went to her for advice and sympathy without coming away cheered and helped. Though her means were small, her private charities were constant. She was active in church work during the early years of the Unitarian church in Milton, and kept up her attendance at church, and at the social meetings of the parish, as long as her strength would allow. She had an intense love of nature, and the ability of getting great pleasure from every-day things. Her religious faith was strong and unflinching, but she felt no weariness of life. She often said: "I am in no hurry to get through. I have enjoyed my life." Her illness was short and painless; and the end came just as she would have wished, for it had always been her great dread to live to be a burden to others. Many of her earliest and warmest friends have died within a few years, but she leaves a large circle to whom she is an unspeakable loss.

Education.

Rev. A. D. Mayo, M.A., of Boston was invited by a number of prominent gentlemen in Washington,—including Secretary Hoke Smith, Carroll D. Wright, William T. Harris, and a number of senators and representatives,—to deliver a lecture on "Robert C. Winthrop and the Peabody Education Fund." Mr. Mayo accepted the invitation; and the lecture was given at Lecture Hall of the Columbian University, corner Fifteenth and H Street, last Monday evening.

Science.

Experiments made upon certain freshwater crustaceans, says the International Journal of Microscopy, show that they are sensitive to sounds corresponding to more than forty thousand vibrations per second (sounds that we cannot hear), and to ultra-violet rays that we cannot perceive. Now, all the rays that we can perceive appear to us with definite colors; and it should be the same with these animals. So that it is probable that they see colors that are unknown to us, and that are as different from those that we are familiar with as red is different from yellow or green from violet. It follows from this that natural light, which seems white to us, would appear colored to them, and that the aspect of nature would be entirely different to them from what it is to us. It is possible, therefore, that to certain animals nature is full of sounds, colors, and sensations that we have no idea of.

KINDERGARTEN WORK IN SAN FRANCISCO.—We are in receipt of the "Fifteenth Annual Report of the Golden Gate Kindergarten Association of San Francisco." In opening this report, the president, Mrs. Sarah B. Cooper, says that, notwithstanding the stringency of the times, the past year has been one of the most successful of all the years of the association's work. Two new kindergartens have been organized, making a total of 38 now under this board, with a total annual enrolment of 3,504, an increase of 186 over the former year. The total receipts for the year were $39,017.88; total number of children trained during the fifteen years, 18,126, nearly all of whom were from 3 to 5 years of age. Strong testimony to the value of the work is given by the superintendent of public schools, the principals of primary schools, and the chief of police. The last-named states that his opinion is based upon the reports received from police officers. Mrs. Leland Stanford has permanently endowed her memorial kindergartens, having given $100,000 for that purpose. From first to last this noble woman has contributed $179,000 to the work. Mrs. Phebe A. Hearst has also been a liberal contributor. Eighteen of these kindergartens are permanently endowed. A very valuable adjunct of this work are the mothers' meetings, where thrift, industry, and domestic economy are inculcated. The "Extracts from Teachers' Reports" form a most interesting feature of this fascinating compendium of information concerning this great and good work on the Pacific Coast,—a work which owes more to the organizing capability, wise head, and loving heart of Mrs. Cooper than to any other cause.

Here and There.

A London physician states that he recently attended six cases of typhoid fever, and in every instance the mischief was traced to the eating of oysters.

According to statistics recently furnished to the Medical News by Dr. James Wood of Brooklyn, of all the patients applying for treatment at the chief dispensary of that city, no less than 10 per cent. are teadrunkards.

An English chemist named Armstrong asserts it as his belief that no chemical action ever takes place except in the presence of some substance capable of being decomposed by electricity, and that therefore all chemical phenomena are electrical.

A Trieste physician states that 252 cases of diphtheria have been treated with serum within three months, the mortality being 17½ per cent.; and that in 65 cases which had to be treated without serum, owing to the scant supply, the mortality was 50½ per cent.

The uses to which paper is put are constantly increasing. Cornices, panels and friezes, medals, boats, carpets, mattresses, and even coffins and telegraph-poles are among the articles now manufactured out of paper; and inventors, it is said, are hoping to find a preparation of compressed paper that will serve as a coating for the armor of war vessels, and not only protect it from corrosion, but even add to its power of resistance.

A tornado in Eastern Oregon last June was attended by hail in the nature of sheets of ice, which averaged from three to four inches square and from three-fourths of an inch to an inch and a half in thickness. Prof. Cleveland Abbe, in the Monthly Weather Review for July, says that these sheets of ice had a smooth surface, and in falling gave the impression of a vast field or sheet of ice suspended in the atmosphere and suddenly broken into fragments.

Chicago has the first woman setter of music type in the person of Mrs. L. S. Jones. Mrs. Jones is said to be the pioneer of her sex in this work in this country. She thinks it a valuable and very suitable trade for women, as it requires patience and neatness rather than strength. She is of New England birth, and learned her trade in Boston, against pronounced opposition from the members of the other sex working at it.—Sunday Journal.

The Boston Herald says: "In variety of occupation the Armenians must be placed first among all the races which we have entertained in Boston. Barely eight hundred strong, they can show engravers, artists, electricians, photographers, furriers, carpet merchants, enamellers, jewellers, brass-finishers, confectioners, plumbers, shoemakers, restaurant-keepers, fruiterers, and members of many other trades, besides clergymen and students. The patient 'Turk' who weaves a thick rug in one well-known window, the young woman who rolls 'Turkish' cigarettes in another, are Armenians. They pick up English in no time, at once look about for some trade demanding skill and yielding opportunities, and in two or three years are employing workmen under them. With this brightness, ambition, and adroitness, they join attractive address and a fine Oriental intelligence, which procure them the welcome they crave into polished social circles."

ORIGIN OF THE HEBREW SABBATH.

Though it is quite possible that the Israelites may have invented a seven-day week and a weekly Sabbath spontaneously, like the Tshi and Gã tribes, yet the evidence of the books of the Old Testament goes to show that they borrowed both these institutions from the Babylonian Assyrians during the captivity, and that, prior to that epoch, they had, like the Mendis, Bechuana, and Sofalese, only a monthly Sabbath, which was the festival of the new moon. No mention of a weekly Sabbath is to be found in Joshua, Judges, the books of Samuel, or the first book of Kings. After Deut. v. 15 no mention of a weekly Sabbath is found till we reach 2 Kings iv. 23; and the word "Sabbath" does not appear either in Psalms or Proverbs. But there is more than a mere omission to mention a weekly Sabbath in the old historical books: there is evidence that the institution was unknown; for many occurrences are described by which the weekly Sabbath, had it existed, must have been violated. Jericho was encompassed for seven days in succession, which must therefore have included one weekly Sabbath (Josh. vi. 13-16). During the events narrated in 1 Sam. xxix. and xxx. David was on the march for twelve days in succession, without any day of rest being observed; and, since Solomon gave a feast to the people of Israel which lasted fourteen days (1 Kings viii. 65 and 2 Chron. vii. 9), and so must have included two Sabbaths, he could have known nothing of the injunction that on the Sabbath every man was to abide in his own place (Ex. xvi. 29). Elijah must likewise have broken the rest of several weekly Sabbaths (1 Kings. xix. 7, 8). In the article on "Marriage and Kinship among the Ancient Israelites" we gave several valid reasons for supposing that the Levitical law was not compiled till about the period of the Babylonian captivity; and this ignorance of the institution of the weekly Sabbath on the part of those who must have known about it, had it existed, is an additional reason. We cannot suppose that the Sabbath rest was wilfully broken, for its violation was considered so grave a crime as to be punished with death.—Col. A. B. Ellis, in Popular Science Monthly for January.

Temperance.

THE BEER-DRINKING MANIA.

An insurance journal of Berlin, Die Deutsche Versicherungs-Zeitung, in its notice of Dr. Brendel's lecture before the Anthropological Society of Munich, is letting the German people know what some of their leading scientific men think of the habit of beer-drinking,—a habit which German immigration has gone far to render national in the United States. After referring to the prevalence of drunkenness in modern times, which he called "the alcoholic period of man," Dr. Brendel spoke as follows: "Alcohol, which apparently brings so much pleasure to its partaker, acts as poison, if even consumed in small doses daily, by means of its cumulative action, as strikingly shown here in Munich, the centre of beer consumption, by the frequent sudden cases of death of apparently healthy men. Fatty enfeebled hearts, shrivelled kidneys, fatty or hardened livers, changes in the texture of blood-vessels, which cause paralytic strokes and softening of the brain by bursting in the brain, chronic catarrhs of the stomach and bronchial tubes, etc., trembling of the limbs, aberrations and diseases of the mental faculties, delirium tremens, etc.,—these are some of the consequences of an immoderate drinking of alcoholic stimulants.

"Prof. Dr. Bollinger of this city [Munich] has in the same manner proved the prevalence of various diseases of a definite nature of the internal organs caused by the universal drinking of beer. A normal heart or kidney is the exception only here in Munich. This state of affairs also injures the progeny in a most serious manner. Dr. Demme found that of the children of non-drinkers 82 per cent. were sound, while of those of drinkers only 17 per cent. were sound.

"Although large quantities of beverages were drunk formerly, still only in the last century, and more especially only in the last decades, in which the brewer's art was perfected, drinking has become universal. It has spread everywhere, and increased to a frightful, most alarming extent. It has been introduced even into country communities; and the only inevitable consequence will be the thorough degeneration of the human race, if the evil is not checked before it is too late.

"Although it is contended that beer contains less alcohol than either wine or whiskey, it is, nevertheless, as injurious as either of them; while its vaunted nutritive value stands in no proportion to its price. When a man is required to perform the greatest feats of corporeal exertions in battle, sport, explorations, etc., the baneful effect of alcohol is most strikingly shown. . . . In spite of the marvellous advantages of our present age, a great retrogression in an ethical sense is undeniable, the chief cause of which is principally due to the increase of drunkenness, because the beer saloon has become the centre and focus of social life."

A course of lectures at the Royal Institution which has created much interest is that by Capt. Abney, on "Color-blindness." Excessive tobacco-smoking has long been known to be an important factor in color-blindness, and Capt. Abney indorses the truth of this observation.

It appears, from the recent report of the English War Office, that at the present time more than thirty thousand English soldiers serving in India are total abstainers; and it is found that, taking these into account, and comparing their record with that of those who indulge, to a greater or less extent, in the use of liquor, the abstainers are the model men in the service. The records of the hospitals show that the liability of the total abstainers to sickness is only one-half as great as the liability of the alcohol-consumers.

It is a very noticeable fact that, as a rule, the habit of smoking blunts the moral sense to the extent of inducing in the smoker disregard of the feelings, tastes, and rights of others, and even of fine decency. Some very curious cases in point could be cited. Here is the latest. Scene: A long-distance express-train at St. Pancras.—In a smoking compartment, a delicate-looking woman and three young children, aged about five, seven, and nine. "Are you all going to smoke?" gayly asked a bystander. "Oh, no!" replied the woman,—"only my husband." That important person soon after went in, and, for his own bit of self-gratification, subjected the woman and his young children to the foul chances of a smoking compartment, perhaps for half a day. That is precisely the cloudy and quite unconscious callousness which the steady habit of smoking does frequently produce.

Mozoomdar's BOOKS.

The Spirit of God. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. 323 pages. Cloth, $1.50.

An idea of the work may be gained from the titles of the chapters: The Spirit, The Hindu Doctrine of the Spirit, Doctrine of the Spirit in Christianity, Sense of the Unseen, The Spirit in Nature, The Kinship in Nature, The Spiritual Power of the Senses, The Spirit in Life, The Spirit in the Spirit, The Spirit in Love, The Spirit in Conscience, The Spirit in Christ, The Spirit in History, The Spirit in all Religions, Live in the Spirit.

Heart-Beats. A Book of Meditations. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. With Portrait and Biographical Sketch of the Author. Cloth, red edges, $1.50; white, full gilt, $2.00.

Its poetic title is suggestive of its contents. It is a collection of brief paragraphs, which are not so much the scintillations of the intellect as poems of the imagination and pulsations of the heart. It is an illustration of the lofty heights to which devotional sentiment may rise, free from all tinge of superstition.—Christian Register.

The Oriental Christ. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. New Edition. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

The existence of this book is a phenomenon;—more than a curiosity; and rich as a new, fresh, and very suggestive study of the character and person of Christ.—Christian Union.

Important Works.

Afterglow. By FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY. 81 pages. Cloth, 50 cents.

There are few who, reading it, will not be strongly attracted to this little book. It is written out of life,—out of the struggling, perplexing, troublous, hopeful, aspiring life we all know and dread and delight in. And grow in. And this is how the book is to help us.

CONTENTS: I. Voices out of the Silence; II. They had all Things Common; III. Spiritual Awakening; IV. "The Star! The Star!"

"Afterglow," like Gannett's "Wrestling and Blessing," is a book which one would like to keep in stock, to be given to the stricken, the troubled, the perplexed, the struggling, and the discouraged.—Christian Register.

Members of One Body. Six Sermons by Rev. S. M. CROTHERS. 132 pages. Cloth, 75 cents; paper, 50 cents.

In the whole list of Liberal Religious books, past and present, it would be hard to find any series of utterances freer with the true freedom—more ingenuous, more appreciative, more prophetic of the unity that is to be, more religiously "satisfying"—than Mr. Crothers gives us in these six discourses. The outline alone, which each chapter contains, of the stronger, more helpful points in the various schemes of religious thought and life discussed, renders the book invaluable.

A Year of Miracle: A Poem in Four Sermons. By Rev. WM. C. GANNETT. 106 pages. Cloth, limp, red edges, 50 cents. Fine edition, bevelled edges, full gilt, heavy paper, $1.00.

"A dainty little book, full of delicate fragrance. Love of nature is in it, and a longing to interpret that secret of nature's power over the soul which no man has yet understood. There is devotion in it, too, and neither clashes with the other."—Critic.

The Work of the Ministry. Lectures given to the Meadville Theological School. By Rev. W. P. TILDEN. 186 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: The Ministry; Object of Preaching; Pastoral Work; Sunday Schools and Guilds; Pulpit Services; Usages and Duties; Personal Influence; Sealed Orders.

Written in a delightfully fresh style, free from pulpit tone and theological terminology, but serious, earnest, and up to the high plane of ministerial responsibility.—Independent (New York).

Kindling Thoughts. By ELIZABETH P. CHANNING. 315 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

Contains fifty-seven brief essays, such as Dev upon the heart; The angel in the shadow; A disappointed life; Plain living and high thinking; The spiritual tangle; The charm of the old; Accepting ourselves as we are; etc., etc.

It is a long time since anything so brightly refreshing as these Kindling Thoughts has come to us. . . . They are full of that best cheer which comes from the deepest clearest springs of faith.—Unitarian.

What could be finer for a guest-room than this pair of bedsteads, executed in enamelled white iron, with polished brass trimmings? The entire top of both head and foot is in brass,—brass posts, tops, rail, and ornaments.

The frames are light, but very strong; easily moved or taken apart, clean and neat as wax; and they harmonize with any surroundings. We have them in all brass at slightly increased cost.

These bedsteads have the new extension foot, allowing the clothing of the bed to fall straight to the floor, without being "tucked in," as in the ordinary patterns.

Separate beds are recommended by all physicians.

UNSOLICITED COMMENTS:

I take great pleasure in the Unitarian and recommend it right and left. There are few other magazines I read so much.—Massachusetts.

I take a good many papers and magazines, but no other periodical so full of spiritual nutrition as the Unitarian. It is splendid.—Nebraska.

I thought the first number of the publication, years ago, a good thing, and I may say that my first estimate rather increases than otherwise, right up to the current number.—Wisconsin.

Social Buffalo is having a great time with duplicate whist. The women are daft over it, and the Commercial says that concise invitations now take this form: "Duplicate whist at eight; two tables, individual scores. Husbands may be ordered at eleven."

Guibollard looks at his watch with concern. "I can't understand it," he says to his wife. "What has happened to my watch? I think it must want cleaning." "No, papa," chimes in little Fanny: "I am quite sure it is clean, because baby and I have washed it in the basin."

Mrs. Ormiston Chant tells this joke about herself. When before the License Committee of the London County Council, she overheard a gentleman ask another, pointing to two of the witnesses, "Which of those old cats is Mrs. Chant?" Mrs. Chant leaned over, and said, "That particular tabby, sir, is behind you."

An organist spoke often and long about her proficiency upon the organ, but one Sunday in the midst of the anthem the insignificant blower let the wind die out of the bellows; and, as the player was in despair, he looked around the instrument, and inquired, "Don't you think we play the organ now?"—Advance.

At a reception in Paris a traveller, who was a strong "Anti-Semitic," was talking to Rothschild on the beauties of the island of Tahiti, and sarcastically remarked, "There are neither hogs nor Jews there!" "Indeed!" retorted Rothschild. "Then you and I should go there together. We should be great curiosities."

Sullivan bought a goat, for which he paid $5. Shortly after he received a tax bill on the goat of $8. He called on Rafferty, the assessor, and said, "Why do you tax me $8 on my goat, when I paid but $5 for him?" "Well," said Rafferty, "I have carefully read what the statutes say; and it reads, 'Whoever owns property abutting on the street shall be taxed $4 a front foot.'" Shoe and Leather Reporter.

A gentleman who was going to Algeria for his health promised to bring back to a friend some of the fresh fruit of the date-palm,—a luxury which the friend had long wished to enjoy. But he came back without it, having totally forgotten the commission. His friend chided him sadly. "But, really, you must pardon me," said the traveller. "You know I have always had such a poor memory for dates!"—Youth's Companion.

Müller meets his friend Nagel at the Turkish baths. Each is troubled with a gouty foot, and has been ordered massage by his doctor. During the operation Müller cried out lustily with pain, while Nagel maintained a stolid composure, greatly to Müller's astonishment, who afterward asked him: "How could you stand the rubbing so quietly? Didn't it hurt you atrociously?" "Nothing of the kind," smilingly replied Nagel: "I simply held out my healthy foot!"—Lustige Blätter.

A RUSSIAN STORY.

A good story about a Tolstoyist comes to us from Tiflis. The Tolstoyist, Prokopenko by name, had some business with the governor of Tiflis, and presented himself at the chancery dressed in the peasant's costume which he habitually wears. The officials were simply amazed at the "peasant's" temerity, and hunted him unceremoniously out of the chancery. In a few days he returned in the fine attire of a gentleman, was politely received by the officials,—who, of course, did not recognize him,—and ushered into the governor's presence. Prokopenko, like a true Tolstoyist, seized the opportunity of explaining to the governor how absurd the whole matter ought to look in the eyes of a sensible man, of showing on what a foundation of folly all the business of "receiving" rested. To the governor's credit, it must be added that he took his lecture good-humoredly, and told his officials that Prokopenko, at any rate, was to have free access to him, even when attired as a peasant.

THE sad loss of the "Elbe," with three hundred and thirty-four souls, is the dark cloud in the news of the week. Thus far only twenty-one survivors can be counted in the total number of passengers and crew, and only one woman among these. The sad story is lighted up by no record of heroism or supreme devotion to duty on the part of those from whom it might be expected. There was a sad lack of discipline on the "Elbe"; and the captain of the "Crathie," the vessel which collided with the "Elbe," who might have stood by until the extent of the damage was learned, sailed away without saving a soul. The captain of the "Elbe" was not on duty at that time, and is not held responsible for the accident, and went down bravely with his ship.

THE remarkable thing about the pastoral letter of the Episcopal bishops is that it should have been written in this day and age. Written a hundred years ago, it would not have seemed so much out of place. The bishops are making a plea for a faith once delivered to the saints, but it is not the faith of to-day. Therefore, they lament. But the faith of to-day now delivered to the saints is something which contains the best faith of the past expanded and blooming into new and richer color, and ripening into still better fruitage, and with buds of promise on the stem. The pastoral letter is a mechanical and physical rather than a luminous interpretation of Christianity. It is of the letter which killeth rather than of the spirit which maketh alive. It is in the shape of a dose of morphine to put their Church to sleep instead of a reveille to wake to the new light of to-day. But, if the bishops are bent on being historic, let them go back far enough to the earliest Christian faith, and they will find that the virgin birth, and the Deity of Jesus, and the infallibility of the Bible, were not a part of the faith first delivered to the saints, as a study of the book of Mark and the Epistles of Paul would show. These elements, like the doctrine of the apostolic succession, were ideas grafted upon early Christianity,—not far from the root, indeed, but, nevertheless, no part of the root itself.

AH, the humor of the Churchman! Or is it not meant for humor? Is it simply an unsuccessful attempt to be serious, when it speaks of the Episcopal Church as "the American Church"? It is very much as if the eighth son in a family of a dozen children, and visibly much smaller than any one of the seven brothers, should maintain that he alone had the right to represent the family name. His older and larger brothers might smile at this manifestation of childish weakness, and the claim would develop amusement rather than acknowledgment and respect. If the Churchman will turn to the record of the Church Congress in which this subject was discussed at length, and will read the powerful address of Bishop Brooks on that occasion, it will see how this strut of childish arrogance was rebuked by one of its own household. It is arrogant indeed for any religious body in this country to assume the title of the American Church, just as it is arrogant for any one religious body to assume that it is the Christian Church against all the other churches in Christendom. We believe there is no official warrant for the use by the Churchman of this term, and a larger part of the Episcopal Church would join with Phillips Brooks in rebuking any such stilted pretension on the part of one of their denominational newspapers.

IN his annual report, just issued, President Eliot of Harvard College treats the subject of college sports with refreshing frankness and vigor. He shows the excess to which they have been carried, resulting not in the invigoration, but frequently in the exhaustion, of the participants. It is against football especially that President Eliot directs his criticism: "In particular, the game of football grows worse and worse, as regards foul and violent play, and the number and gravity of the injuries which the players suffer. It has become perfectly clear that the game, as now played, is unfit for college use. The rules of the game are at present such as to cause inevitably a large number of broken bones, sprains, and wrenches, even during trial or practice games played legitimately. And they also permit those who play with reckless violence, or with shrewd violations of the rules, to gain thereby great advantages. What is called the development of the game has steadily increased its risks, until they have become unjustifiable."

PRESIDENT ELIOT recognizes what every candid person must admit, that the players themselves are not wholly responsible for the evils of the game: "They are swayed by a tyrannical public opinion,—partly ignorant, and partly barbarous,—to the formation of which graduates and undergraduates, fathers, mothers, and sisters, leaders of society, and the veriest gamblers and rowdies, all contribute. The state of mind of the spectators at a hard-fought football match at Springfield, New York, or Philadelphia, cannot but suggest the query how far these assemblages differ at heart from the throngs which enjoy the prize fight, cock fight, or bull fight, or which in other centuries delighted in the sports of the Roman arena. Several fatal accidents have happened this year to school-boys and college students on the football field; and in every strenuous game now played, whether for practice or in an intercollegiate or other competition, there is the ever-present liability to death on the field. It is often said that, by employing more men to watch the players, with authority to punish instantly infractions of the rules, foul and vicious playing could be stopped. The sufficient answer to this suggestion is that a game which needs to be so watched is not fit for genuine sportsmen. Moreover, experience indicates that it would be hard to find trustworthy watchers." The extravagant expenditure for teams throughout the season, the fact that such sports as football involve dangerous reactions, and that they have no direct application, like many other sports, in the after life of business or professional life, are pointed out. President Eliot has set an example which we hope the presidents and faculty of other colleges will be prompt to follow. The united action of the colleges will soon stop the evil.

CATS are fabled to have nine lives, but the lives of heresies are innumerable. Theological persecutors have drowned, burnt, crucified the heretics; but they have not slain thereby the heresy. It has come again and again to light, wearing a new body and a new name, and dressed in new clothes and speaking a different language, but still the same old heresy. It may be attacked again, disrobed, and beaten, or hewn, like Agag, into pieces; but the pieces will come together again: a spiritual phoenix will rise from the ashes whenever there is enough truth in a heresy to give it that immortality which all truth enjoys. There are, to be sure, heresies which are simply ephemeral notions and fancies, eccentricities of thought and manner, which are superficial and perishable. But the truth which may be represented in a heresy cannot be buried or exterminated. It will come up with its inevitable questions again and again. It will come in at the door of the church or at the window. It may be labelled Unitarianism, Universalism, Arminianism, Pelagianism; or it may appear under the name of Orthodoxy or Calvinism itself. But by and by the heresy which appeared as a foe is welcomed as a friend.

IN religious work we need both the power of impulse and the power of principle. Impulse is intermittent: it flashes and flames, and then dies out as suddenly as it appeared. It may flash in the pan, or it may serve to give a momentary but mighty impulse to some object, as the powder speeds the bullet. Impulse, therefore, is not to be undervalued. To roll the bullet does not do what is accomplished by shooting it. Impulse means a sudden concentration of power; and it may be mighty in an individual, in a church, an army, or a community. But it needs to be re-enforced by the steady application of well-conceived and well-directed principle, which acts with even continuity. The slow, steady action of the drill is needed before the cartridge can do its work. Constructive processes are generally slow. Architects must carefully plan, and workmen must toil laboriously, to lay foundations and rear superstructures. The things which grow in a night are likely to wither in a day. So in religious work, while we need revivals of enthusiasm and the enthusiasm of revivals, we need the steady determination and persistent action which come from the clear consciousness that work must be done because it is worth the doing. There must be just such labor as the farmer puts day by day into his field because he knows that he is a laborer together with God.

THE BISHOPS' PASTORAL LETTER.

THE one thing that seems clear about the pastoral letter of the Episcopal bishops is its purpose to resist the tendencies which have characterized the Broad Church party. It is plain enough at what its authors mean to strike, or, rather, threaten to strike; for never was there a more skilful flourish of swords appearing somewhat terrible, but hitting nothing in particular. The letter abounds in phrases that are calculated to carry much comfort to the ultra conservative mind without doing any damage whatever to progressive views. Is it possible that this was partly within the scope of its authors' design, and that they chiefly meant to pacify those who have been saying of late that "something ought to be done"?

The bishops say that they have considered their duty "in view of certain novelties of opinion and expression which have seemed to us [them] to be subversive of the fundamental verities of Christ's religion." But what these novelties are we are not told. Not one of them is so referred to or described that it can be identified. When the apostle Paul addressed one of his churches in reproof, he left no uncertainty as to the exact things to be complained of. A hundred years hence any student of ecclesiastical history reading this present letter will search it from end to end in vain to discover what innovations and heresies it was meant to combat. The letter says, "We reprobate and rebuke the irreverent rashness and unscientific method of many professed critics, and the presumptuous superciliousness with which they vaunt erroneous theories of the day as established results of criticism." A good mouth-filling sentence, but what does it mean? Who are these critics, and what are their erroneous theories? There is not a line or a phrase further to enable us to distinguish them. If any one is pricked by his conscience to confess judgment, time will discover him; but certainly the bishops have displayed a most Christian spirit in that they have refrained from launching their accusations at any particular person or thing. And we imagine that those to whom the letter is addressed will, therefore, with one consent, charitably bestow its teachings upon their neighbors.

The main body of the letter is concerned with setting forth, in the language of the creeds, the two doctrines of the Incarnation and the Inspiration of the Scriptures. Its assumption appears to be that the exact ideas of the past are thus handed on to the present and the future. "Fixedness of interpretation is of the essence of the creeds. . . . The creeds of the Catholic Church declare eternal truths. . . . It were derogatory to the blessed Spirit to suggest that any other than the original sense of the creeds may be lawfully held and taught."

Elsewhere the bishops speak of their Church as one "to which, in a peculiar manner, the deposit of faith has been intrusted." Now "deposit" is a highly suggestive word. It suggests something that is indeed hard and fixed, but at the same time something that is dead. The faith of the past has produced a deposit. When it was alive, it wrote itself into a literature; and that literature remains, in part, till the present time. But is any educated person now simple enough to believe that people of to-day can read these ancient phrases and attach to them exactly the same meanings which their authors once put into them? If this be the belief, then the Catholic Church must ask her children to receive it by an act of pure faith. Certainly, it is impossible to prove that the ideas of Ortho-doxy have undergone no change; and all natural probabilities are against such an assertion. Words remain without change on the written or printed page, but not in the living speech of men. The phrases of which a creed is composed are not lifeless bricks to retain their color and form after thousands of years have passed away. They are among the most changeable of all changing things, and it would be a miracle indeed if any dogma handed down by their means had been preserved precisely as it was first conceived. They clearly have the right of it who would hold a creed for "substance of doctrine." There is no other way in which it can be held, and they who think they have the faith of the Apostolic Church unchanged and unimpaired merely cherish a delusion.

As to the two doctrines with which the letter deals, they are here to be found in their most narrow and literal form. No tendency to broaden them out into universal principles of the spiritual life is recognized or tolerated. Jesus Christ is "the Only Son of God," the one instance of God made manifest in the flesh. Inspiration is spoken of as if it virtually ended when the New Testament had been composed, and this by men one of whose great doctrines is supposed to be that of the inspiration of the Church. The promise, "When the Spirit of Truth is come, he will guide you into all truth," is read as if it applied only to those who wrote the Gospels and the Epistles.

It is hardly necessary to speak of the utter futility of this attempt to stand against one of the strongest mental currents of our time. Thinking people have nowhere the least interest any longer in alleged events or occurrences which bear no relation to the action of universal laws. That we have as yet explored only a little portion of this wonderful universe is now generally recognized, and there is small disposition to deny any statement of fact simply because it is marvellous or strange. But it must present itself as a fact that belongs, presumably, within the supreme and perfect order by which all things are comprehended, and which is all the divine government of the world that thinking people now care to talk about. If this affirmation that God rules by laws which stand fast forever, and not by special edicts published only in this or that particular place, be what the bishops regard as one of the "erroneous theories of the day," then we are sorry for them as often as it is their fortune to be found in conflict with it.

Somehow, this document does not read in all its parts as if it had been penned by one "to the manner born." Men who have been brought up on dogma from their earliest years are apt to become so accustomed to it that they do not sing its praises in quite such triumphant strain. At all events, we feel sure that the letter fails to represent adequately the best and highest tendencies of the Episcopal Church; and we have no fear that it will serve as a serious check to the growth and spread of those influences which now cluster about its greatest bishop's name.

SELF-JUSTIFICATION.

One wonders sometimes how many men or women are accepted by their friends and neighbors at their own valuation. Probably not one of us. A man may know that in his heart he has desired to do the right thing, that he has tried to struggle against temptation and has fought against an unutterable longing, when others can see only the pitiful weakness and the final failure. Another may be aware that he holds the admiration of those around him, and yet carry with him the consciousness of secret shortcomings, which, if known, might almost paralyze the faith of those nearest to him. How Browning has taught us to respect the hidden struggles of which the outside world can know nothing! How he has revealed to us the golden philosophy that a man's true success may rest in his apparent failures, and that only God can see the whole! Nevertheless, it is quite likely that, in the long run, a man's reputation among those nearest to him is not very different from what he deserves. Character, as it concerns others, is the sum of the impressions we make upon them by our daily living; and it is not often that any amount of self-explanation can change the final result. A man cannot make his neighbors believe that he is truthful by simply going to their houses and assuring them that he would not tell a lie. On the contrary, they would immediately begin to wonder how he came to feel the need of such self-assertion.

The helplessness which a man feels under unjust suspicion is indeed almost unbearable; and it is small wonder, perhaps, that in earlier times innocent people were sometimes willing to appeal to even the most preposterous and inflexible methods of self-justification. The old ordeals were based on the belief that God will defend the right, even by a miracle if need be; and the innocent one was challenged to throw himself on God and abide the result. In one ordeal the accused was required to plunge his arm up to the elbow in boiling hot water, and he was pronounced guilty if the skin was injured in the experiment. In another he was bound and thrown into the river. If he sank, he was acquitted, curiously enough; but, if he floated, he was accounted guilty. His acquittal availed comparatively little, however, when he was drowned in the process. There seems to be little reason in such trials, and yet one is reminded of them by hearing of the method of self-justification taken by a student in a New England university recently. Having heard that a classmate had circulated false reports concerning him, he immediately procured a horsewhip and chastised the defamer until, presumably, his honor was satisfied and his innocence proved to his own satisfaction. Apparently, this was not the deed of hasty, unreasoning wrath, but deliberate action. More than that, a club of young men in the college sent resolutions of sympathy to the horsewhipper when he was expelled from the place. They sent these resolutions, not as to one of their own number, whom they were sorry to lose, and who in a moment of passion had done that for which he would undoubtedly be sorry at a time of reflection, but as a deliberate recognition of the creed that personal honor may be maintained by such methods. Such attempts at self-justification are evidence of an undeveloped ethical sense and a lower form of civilization. "Wouldn't you have had him resent it?" asks a boy, eagerly. But resent it to what purpose? In such a way as to tacitly give the impression that it could be resented in no other way? Have matters been improved by the fact that his answer to the charge simply proved his ability to knock down and injure his accuser?

It is a good thing to remember that in this world we really need not trouble ourselves as to whether we are getting our just deserts or not. On the one hand, it is of no avail to claim more than we are receiving in any way than by setting to work to deserve more; and, on the other hand, when we ache with the hidden weakness, and feel as if we could not endure the good opinion of others, we may take it as the needed encouragement to try all the harder to conquer that weakness. Emerson has said that the world is full of judgment days. We need not speculate as to what other men think of us. "As much virtue as there is, so much appears: as much goodness as there is, so much reverence it commands." "A man passes for what he is worth. What he engraves itself on his face, on his form, on his fortunes, in letters of light. Concealment avails him nothing, boasting nothing. There is confession in the glances of our eyes, in our smiles, in salutations, and the grasp of hands."

KEEPING IN TUNE.

Once in a while a man is born with a genius for keeping in tune with life, just as occasionally one is born with such an exquisite ear for musical tones that he is never false in his notes. If he sings in a chorus, he is never guilty of a false tone. The musicians in the orchestra might tune their instruments by the yet finer instrument of his voice. One listens to such a singer with rest and satisfaction. There is no unconscious anxiety lest he swerve from the key in such a way as to make the cold shivers creep down the spine. Those who sing with him lean on his voice, and find in him a natural leader.

So the man whose life is in tune with the best life of the world is the consolation and the support of those who stand near him. The world may be full of harsh sounds, but his note is clear and true.

Morbidness and gloom may cloud the vision of others, but for him the sun shines clear. There is no fog so dense that his faith does not shine through, no clamor so loud that it drowns the purity of his note.

Such men, like poets, are born, not made. It is a gift, like genius. And yet, as genius is often but another name for a talent for hard work, so this tuneful spirit may be cultivated, where nature has niggardly refused the gift at birth. How may this be done?

The first essential is good health. Nothing so easily puts one out of tune with life as ill health. Every east wind lets down the strings, and every hot breath makes them break with a snap. A sleepless night makes everything flat, and an undigested dinner spoils the harmony of all creation.

But there are men in physical health who are wholly out of touch with the times. Their instincts are not for things noble and high; and to the music of humanity, whether gay or sad, they are deaf. Cynical and contemptuous, they catch only the discords, and make no attempt to resolve them into cheerful harmony. To this class belong some of our modern writers from whose pages one turns away with a hopeless feeling of misery. The dreary part about such people is that they have never discovered their own deficiencies, but are like the man who would raise his voice in the meeting-house, though he could not sing a note, until the law was called in to compel him to keep silence when others were singing.

One must not only keep in tune with the world: one must keep one's self in tune. Jenny Lind, or some other great singer, once said that never but twice in her life did she feel sure that she was in perfect voice, when life and inspiration and opportunity all combined to her highest achievement. But those two occasions furnished the ideal toward which she ever worked. The master violinist, if he breaks a string, may call forth the tones he needs from other strings; but at the first moment possible he makes good the broken one. An instrument designed for five strings must have all in place and all in use, or the best effect is lost. Herein lies the secret of keeping a human soul in tune, developing and using all the faculties with which we are endowed. The physical, the mental, the emotional, the spiritual, must each be wisely adjusted to one another. So only can life be harmonious.

JUDGE HOAR.

The death of Judge Ebenezer Rockwood Hoar is a household sorrow to the people of Massachusetts. For half a century he has been a familiar presence before them,—a striking type of their ideal in public and private life. He stood for what was best in their social, political, and religious standards. He came of the stanchest Massachusetts stock. His line runs back to the soldiers who fought for American independence and to the statesmen who laid our constitutional foundations. To the Puritan's firmness of conviction and fidelity to principle, to his fearless straightforwardness of speech and discharge of duty, he added the liberal spirit and culture of our later New England. His attainments at the bar and on the bench, and his broader service in high legislative and executive function, made his name illustrious in the nation as well as in the Commonwealth. His shrewd wit and pungent humor were a relish not only to the rare spirits sitting with him in the brilliant group that for so many years enlivened the table of the Saturday Club, but to all the people, by and large, with whom he was always in touch. There never was a more democratic citizen. A warm as well as a true heart beat in his breast. While severe and intolerant toward sham or injustice or humbug of whatever sort, his sympathies went out to his fellow-men, not alone in great causes like that of the enfranchisement of the slave, but in sweet charities which many a homely fire-side now recalls. An actor on great fields of debate and magistracy, he was also especially loyal to the associations and memories of that New England rural life in which he was born, and in which he lived and died. He was as earnest in the affairs of the town as in those of the State; as interested and contributory and as enlivening in a gathering of farmers on fair day, or of citizens at a local Middlesex celebration, as in the company of Agassiz and Holmes and Lowell; or as a member of the Joint High Commission which framed the treaty of Washington; or, as so many of us love to recall him, sitting in the councils or presiding at the meetings of our Unitarian organizations.

He was a great American. There are higher public honors he might have had, but none to which he was not equal. It was a full and completed life, the ripe corn in the ear. And, while his death is a public sorrow, it is only the sadness of the falling of restful night at the close of a long and perfect day. Indeed, not the least significant feature in his life is the serenity and fearless trust of its ending. He died, as he lived, in such calmness of faith that he, too, has helped rob death of its terror. It was no indifference of the Stoic, no affectation or bravado, no recklessness of the final account, which for the last few weeks made his bedside the cheerful scene at which not only his own family, but everybody in Massachusetts, went, like neighbors, in and out, and lingered. It was the consciousness of duty done, of a life pure and true, of a conscience void of offence toward God and toward man. J. D. L.

Musings.

I HAVE heard Charles Molé play a solo on the flute so skilfully that the average hearer would suppose that he was playing two parts at once. And I have heard a boy hum an air with a droning accompaniment, a sort of alto to the piece he was singing. Nevertheless, I maintain that it is practically impossible for a man to sing a duet with himself. About the nearest thing to it was when Myron W. Whitney sang a duet with his son in "Israel in Egypt" at the Handel and Hayden concert Sunday evening last. I should like to know how many times Myron Whitney has sung in that hall and with that society, or how many times he has rendered the bass solos in the great oratorios. But I doubt if he ever had more pleasure in a triumph of his own than he had in the triumph of his son last Sunday evening. If Mr. Whitney wanted a chance to hear his own voice free from the prejudice and disadvantage of listening to his own singing, he had it in listening to his son. The Bach family is not the only example of the influence of heredity in music. The younger Whitney had not sung half a dozen measures before every one who had heard his father recognized that the son was a chip of the old block. The voice was a little lighter than the father's, and with a freshness and mellowness more conspicuous than in the first edition of the same voice. More maturity will bring more solidity. His singing of "He layeth the beams" called forth great applause, some of which was from the evident delight of the audience in finding that the young man was so much like the older one. Then came the father's turn; and he sang "Wave from wave" with massive voice, and in the style long familiar to his admirers. But the event of the evening was when father and son sang together the famous duet, "The Lord is a man of war"; and, as an enthusiastic hearer in the audience said, "it was worth in itself the price of the ticket." It is a rare event to find father and son singing together on the same platform in solo parts as professional singers, though in the great chorus of nearly five hundred voices fathers were singing with their daughters, and it may be with their sons.

I GENERALLY take the New England road on my way home. It is but a seven-minutes' ride. It runs through not a very attractive part of Boston. There is a stretch of marsh one side of the road, which, when the tide is out, is black and muddy enough. There are a few acres of ash-heaps, some uninteresting factories with tall chimneys, and then, further off, there are a dome and a few steeples. In the full glare of day one sees the details of this section all too distinctly. It is realistic and prosaic. There is too much mud and ash-heap and brick chimney. But let one come out about five o'clock on the shortest days, just as the sun is setting, and when the tide has covered the marsh with water, and the whole scene is transformed from one of prosaic realism into one of ideal beauty. The sun is gone; but there is a glow of pink in the sky, and a soft, mysterious tinge, which might be called a greenish yellow, if it were not too indefinite and mysterious to be named anything. It is just such light as Turner might have sought for one of his skies, but never succeeded in getting. The water lies calm, the tinge of the sky beautifully reflected from the shallows. If there were the depth of the ocean, it would not seem to hold the sky more fully than does this marshy basin. There is the softness of light and the softness of darkness. The factory has gone; and in its place is a Venetian palace, with electric lights gleaming from every window. The chimney is turned into a Campanile; the little huts have disappeared; but, looming up against the sky, are the dome and the steeples in this softened light. Venice has been annexed to Boston, and this most prosaic mixture of marsh and ash-heap has become a picture that would make the reputation of any artist to paint. Here is a case, I would say, where a little impressionism is just what we want,—not the impressionism of Monet, but that of Millet. The microscopic artist, the realist who is determined to paint every tin can in the ash-heap and every brick in the factory chimney, must go there at noon; but he will not find the same scene, and the picture he paints would not be anything we cared to see. There are just fifteen minutes in a day when the picture is worth painting; and that is when it appeals not only to the eye, but to the imagination. I am one who believes in the full glare of sunlight for the illumination of our knowledge; but I also feel that it is often a rest for the emotions to look at certain scenes in life under the softened twilight, with the sky in the shallow basin, and the dome and the steeple rising in the mysterious background.

Brevities.

The Christian Witness has discovered a new beatitude, "Blessed is the contributor to the newspaper who knows enough to be brief." And all the editors will say, "Amen!"

A Boston clergyman is credited with saying that he belonged to over one hundred and thirty different organizations. It is to be hoped that the annual dues are not heavy, or that the minister's salary is large.

Some one in the Churchman preaches a sermon on the text, "Having done all, stand"; but this is not the advice most needful at the present time, but rather to say unto the children of Israel that they go forward.

The pastoral letter of the Episcopal bishops was signed by six bishops who were authorized by the House of Bishops to issue the letter. It does not commit those who did not sign it; and we suspect that there are at least two or three bishops, as well as not a few clergymen, who would not care to sign it.

One might naturally suppose the Silver Trumpet, which is published in Littleton, Col., to be a journal on the currency; but it turns out to be a small religious paper sold at 20 cents a year. The editor believes that silver represents truth, and in this sense we suppose this diminutive contemporary may be considered an advocate for free coinage.

Correspondents have been discussing in the Glasgow papers what may be the proper title for a lady doctor, in order to distinguish her from one of the opposite sex. "Doctorine" and "physiciene" are among the new terms suggested; but, supposing new words to be necessary, "doctora" for married ladies of the medical profession, and "doctorina" for those unmarried, seem to be the favorites.

The Central Christian Advocate, speaking of patent medicine, says: "How anybody with sense, not to say knowledge, could swallow such stuff as the advertisements of many nostrums contain—to say nothing of swallowing the cheap and nasty preparations themselves—is more than we can tell now in a brief paragraph. What a story of imposture, of credulity, of pitiful human weakness, the druggists could tell, if they would."

In his article on William H. Smith, Rev. A. W. Jackson of Meadville, Pa., stated the fact that Dr. Eliot once said from his pulpit that he knew where he could use $30,000 to good advantage; and in a few days Mr. Smith placed in his hands, in his quiet way, this amount. Mrs. M. R. Noble was a parishioner of Dr. Eliot at the time, and recalls well the words of Dr. Eliot and the generous response of Mr. Smith, and writes in corroboration of this story. It was a remarkable minister who could awaken this confidence, and a remarkable parishioner who could respond to it.

The Worcester Gazette tells a story of Rev. Dr. Bancroft, the father of George Bancroft, the historian, and once pastor of the First Unitarian Church of Worcester. A carpenter was commissioned to make two tablets, on which the Ten Commandments were to be painted. The carpenter made the tablets of knotty boards, perhaps not realizing their use. When Dr. Bancroft directed the painter not to let the knots show, the man, who was a waggish character of the day, painted the Ten Commandments and carefully left spaces where the nots ought to stand. Dr. Bancroft had a sense of humor; and it is believed he laughed, or perhaps smiled, and then told the painter he had misunderstood him, and had better restore the nots.

The New Church Messenger, the organ of Swedenborgianism, is not afraid of natural selection. On the contrary, it commends the work of Darwin in the following sensible words: "Natural selection and the survival of the fittest are divine modes of creating and perfecting the human race and all the lower animals and inanimate objects. In bringing these laws to the notice of scientists, Mr. Darwin was promoting a true knowledge of the visible creation and of the Lord's creative work, and was a promoter of true science and a true theology. And he promoted true theology by showing how untenable are some of the beliefs that obtain in the churches of our time and of the past. That both scientists and churchmen are beginning to see this is occasionally shown by current events."

Pro and Con.

CONVENTION MORALS.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

I should have been surprised at my friend Snyder's exhibition of himself in last week's Register if he hadn't broached the same heresy in his study in St. Louis, where I withstood him to the face. But, as I made no impression then, I dare not hope that I shall make any now. Nor does it seem that any one who holds to his opinion in this year of grace is likely to change it for anything that I can say, or anybody else. This straw has been thrashed so often that more dust than wheat may come from thrashing it again. But, if I were silent, I might be supposed to consent to Mr. Snyder's doctrine; and I would much rather have my friends think that I believed Dr. Talmage to be "the greatest living preacher and the greatest living writer," as he has formally announced himself, than that I believed this. One could believe that, and be only mentally confused; but, to believe this doctrine of Mr. Snyder's, one must be "morally confused," as Mr. Snyder says of Mr. Curtis. I find a better doctrine in Mr. Curtis's own words, written in 1873, when Gen. Butler was doing his best to steal a nomination for the governorship of Massachusetts: "A caucus or a convention is merely a conference of delegates of the party to determine how the organization may, at the particular time and under the existing circumstances, best procure its end. It is the duty of each delegate to spare no effort to influence wisely the action of the party. He cannot rightfully surrender his opportunity to prevent an enormous and fatal party blunder. But no delegate has lost the privilege of doing right because he has tried to persuade others not to do wrong." Substitute Mr. Snyder's doctrine for this, and we should write over the entrance to our convention halls, "No man who acknowledges the absolute sovereignty of his own conscience can be a delegate," or those words which Dante saw over the gate to hell. Our politics tend fast enough to the preference for knaves to honest men, but here is a principle exclusive of all thorough-going honesty. Would the "honorable gentlemen" to whom Mr. Snyder appeals have supported Gen. Butler for the governorship of Massachusetts? Some of them, possibly; but Judge Hoar, I think, would sooner have seen the Republican party "in the deep sea sunk." Last fall we had a similar case in New York. Can Mr. Snyder imagine that the Shepard Democracy in the convention which nominated Hill should have supported him? If they had done so, he would have been made the governor of the State. But they read their duty otherwise, and buried him under a majority of one hundred and fifty thousand votes. Thank God!—and them.

As for Mr. Curtis's particular case, if those who sent him to the Chicago convention believed that he would support Blaine if he was nominated, they had no reason to believe so. He had never concealed his opinions in regard to "the divine right of bolting." I have shown above by a concrete example how unwarrantable is Mr. Snyder's assertion that he had never "protested against this interpretation [the absolute subjection of the individual conscience to the majority vote of a convention] in the columns of the powerful journal of which he had absolute control," and also his assertion that "the whole Republican party had the best of reasons for believing that he recognized the generally received ethics of party action." They had the best of reasons for knowing that he rejected those reasons with unqualified contempt. Again, Mr. Snyder is certainly wrong in saying that Mr. Curtis was sure of Blaine's nomination in advance. If he had been, he would not have gone to the convention. He went hoping to prevent that consummation. That immediately on the nomination of Blaine he should have left the convention is an opinion which Mr. Snyder holds in common with many excellent people, but Mr. Curtis did not agree with these. He had been sent to do what he could for the best interests of the party and the country in the whole course of the convention, and not merely in a part of it. So he conceived, and rightly, as it seems to me. He was not histrionic. If he had been, he would have denounced the nomination then and there, and gone his way. But there was time enough for that.

It is a very little matter whether Mr. Curtis was or was not mistaken in his action at Chicago. That he did what he thought was right no one ever doubted who knew the man. But, if every man who goes to a political convention as a delegate is to surrender his individual conscience at the threshold, the men of conscience will stay at home, and the political parties will be handed over to the custody of the Hills and Platts, and those who are the creatures of their sordid wills. Mr. Snyder's "generally received ethics of party action" are not, I respectfully submit, ethics for honest men.

THE VINELAND EXPERIMENT.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

I have read Rev. William M. Gilbert's letter in regard to my "experiment" with great interest. The writer is my esteemed predecessor, whose judgment is always just and fair, and whose presence in my church on Sundays is to me a great inspiration. His criticism must be right, and is true, I admit, as far as it goes, at any rate; but I wish to state my own impression of the "experiment."

There are at least twelve churches for seven thousand people in Vineland. When I came here a year ago, I noticed that an unfriendly feeling was existing between the Unitarian and other churches, not, probably, more so than in other places; but I do not wish to see it anywhere in the Christian community. Then, again, I met many among the Unitarians who had wrong impressions of the beliefs of the other churches, and also met several among the members of other churches who did not know what their own churches stood for. I thought it best to make an arrangement for a course of Sunday evening discourses on different denominations, and published in two of our daily papers the object of the meetings, in which I said: "The aim is to present to the public clear statements, showing just wherein we all differ and wherein we ought to unite in the Spirit of Christ. Those who take part in it will, undoubtedly, present their beliefs clearly, positively, and frankly, without any attempt to antagonize or to reconcile."

Thus the object was not, as my predecessor has stated, to "advance the cause for which the Unitarian Church stands" in the narrow sense of propagation of our own peculiar beliefs; but it was in the larger sense of bringing about fraternal union in the spirit of Jesus Christ.

The writer complains of the fact that "some of the orthodox doctrines which are most offensively superstitious to the liberal mind were either not mentioned or merely hinted at"; but I did not expect that those ministers would come into our pulpit clothed in the filthy rags of the old doctrines, but would appear in the fashionable suits of up-to-date. This was done beautifully. Would we, if we had a chance to present our doctrines in other churches in the twentieth century, show the cold side of our denomination? Nay, we would rather give the glorious accounts of the meetings we observed at Saratoga last fall. Then, again, it must be remembered, as Mr. Gilbert said, that the question was, "What do they stand for?" and not, "What did they stand for?" And nearly all the speakers followed the literal meaning of the question.

This is the first time I have heard any adverse criticism of the addresses; and, although my predecessor speaks of the harmful effect, I have heard of nothing but the good effects that have come from them, except in two cases, which are almost too childish to consider. And I, at least, am now enjoying friendly intercourse with the ministers of other denominations in the town. When I asked the Baptist minister to present his church doctrines, he said: "I also have an evening service. If you will preach for me, I will do so for you." The minister of the Swedenborgian church kindly exchanged with me. The Seventh Day Baptist asked me to preach for him. And one Sunday evening, as I was called away, I left the whole service in the charge of the Congregational minister. And, when the Evangelical Sunday-School Union met in this town, our church was well represented; and our ladies worked for them just as hard as they would for their own people, and they asked me to lead the praise service in the afternoon. Our church members have repeatedly said, "Why, they are not so bigoted as I thought they were." And I have heard not a few people of other denominations say, "The Unitarians are not so bad as I thought they were." Thus the object of the meetings was accomplished, and these are some of the good effects. There are two sides to a truth, you know. I do not believe we are in a battlefield, "standing by our guns, blazing away," as he has said; but we are in the Father's home, trying to preserve brotherly love.

FOR THE LITTLE BLIND CHILDREN.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

Since the columns of your paper have ever been open to expositions designed to promote the best interests of mankind, I crave a portion of the space thus set apart to the various causes of philanthropy, in which to present an aspect of the work now being done in behalf of the Kindergarten for the Blind.

For some time past grave apprehensions have existed in the minds of its devoted friends on account of the diminishing sources of its revenues; and, as the burden of responsibility became heavier and more heavy, an appeal for annual subscriptions was written and put into circulation by Mr. Anagnos. A copy of this paper fell, as it would seem, by chance, into the hands of one of the business men of the city; and so urgent did the matter appear to him that he at once devised a scheme whereby the sum of $5,000 should be raised by means of $10 subscriptions. This gentleman was personally unknown to Mr. Anagnos; and it was not until the simple but feasible plan was published in the Transcript, and the plea began to meet with cordial responses, that this truly benevolent man was made known to "the friend of little children." My purpose in giving this brief outline of the movement now going on is to add my word of earnest entreaty to your readers to join in the effort now being made to secure such a sum of money as will relieve, at least for the present, the danger of adding to the debt which already encumbers the infant institution. May I not urge that generous contributions be sent to Mr. Anagnos to aid in relieving this anxiety and alarm for the immediate future of a cause which enlists our warmest sympathy and is already dear to the hearts of many in this good Commonwealth? BLENDED SPHERES.

BY GEORGE SHEPARD BURLEIGH.

Between the lines of heaven and earth
There floats a misty veil, so thin
The ripper soul at death's new birth
May know not when he enters in.
He finds no parting of the new
And earlier kindred, but, instead,
A union beautiful and true,
The living and the immortal dead.

He sees, as in a cool gray mist,
The watchers by his pillow stand,
And, bathed in vapory amethyst,
The dwellers of the Eden Land.
Warm hands touch viewless hands above,
As o'er him tenderly they bend,
And parting tears of earthly love
With smiles of heavenly greeting blend.

As one unconsciously may glide
From waking thought to pleasant dream,
The glimmer of his eventide
Melts softly into morning's gleam.
The human loves that held him here,
The heavenly loves that draw him hence,
Bind firmly in one golden sphere
The dual realms of soul and sense.

A moment ere the cord is snapt
That holds the spirit to its clay,
The Passer, into vision rapt,
May sweep the filmy veil away,
And tell by glance, or broken speech,
The glories that we only guess;
So near, yet holden from our reach
By blinding fear and faithlessness.

Since love is portion of the soul,
And life is life by love alone,
He bears to his celestial goal
The heart-ties of this nether zone,—
Not as to something far away,
But near and dear, a larger growth
Of all that hallows earth to-day,
And makes one heavenly sphere of both!

BY REV. WILLIAM R. ALGER.

III.

We should improve our opportunities to gain wisdom as busily as the bees suck flowers. Then, when the time of blossoms has gone by, the honey will take their place.

The sloth of any person reacts on himself, but his industry reacts on every one in the social whole who may be exposed to its influence. Such seems to be the impressive force of the maxim of Goethe: "If I sleep, I sleep for myself. If I work, I know not for whom it may be." Our personal position may be petty, but our human environment is vast; and the radiation from the former into the latter no man knows how to limit.

Coarseness is more obtrusive and noisy than refinement, and so there is always danger that the true quality and rank of a trait or a deed may be misunderstood or even inverted. We all need to be on our guard against fallacies of this kind. Offences in the material order are so much more sharply outlined in ordinary experience than those in the spiritual order that the latter often escape the degree of condemnation due them. Delicate spirits will sympathize with the Oriental poet who says that to deceive a loving heart is worse than to shed blood, this being merely a murder of the body, while that is a murder of the soul.

Genuine self-sufficingness is an imperial trait, grounded only in truth and virtue. And it is a noble safeguard against belittling vices. For the most subtle and fertile cause of deceit in every form is vanity, the desire to draw notice and take effect. The truth expressed by Schiller in the following question and reply is not more epigrammatic than it is deep: "How does nature contrive to join meanness and nobleness in the same man? By placing vanity between them!"

An innocence that wears no veil is the most beautiful of all the natural ornaments of virtue. So the most delightful trait of genius is its naïveté, its unsuspecting frankness.

The man from whom no favor is hoped and no injury feared will not be disturbed in his solitude. No matter how wise, how good, how great he is, to the world he will be as if he did not exist. This is owing, alas! to the rarity of disinterested aspirants eager to avail themselves of every choice means for improvement. We find in their writings such greatly earnest and gifted men as Dante, Leibnitz, Goethe, Wordsworth, Channing, often complain of the bitter solitude in which they were left. As Plato says in the "Laws," "They who desire to become the best to the highest degree and in the shortest time are few."

The condition for the operations of divine grace in us is that we interpose no obstacle. A smaller price could scarcely be asked. Yet how rarely we pay it! When God sees his intentions bearing fruit in our surrendered and happy souls, he is so pleased that he rewards us for what he has himself done. As an old saint said, with charming point, "God puts a crown on his gifts by their own fruition within us." Sua in nobis Deus dona coronat. So a mother loves and applauds her child for doing what she alone has taught him to do, and feels herself unspeakably happy in seeing him do it. What a consoling and encouraging truth it is, what a divinely blissful thought, to know that millions of such instances are in full exemplification all over the world every day!

Men and women have their characteristic distinctions, which are not to be obliterated or overlooked or confused, but to be complementarily co-ordinated, harmonized, and glorified. Men are stronger in grasping facts and reaching ends by reflective deduction. Women are better endowed for direct thinking and feeling with the penetrative accuracy of intuition. No doubt many women scrutinize premises more patiently and deduce logical inferences more accurately than most men. No doubt, also, many men have a more vivid development and practice of the intuitive sentiments than most women. Yet, on the whole, the above-named preponderant distinctions of the masculine and the feminine type of human nature hold good. For such is the testimony of the collective judgment of mankind, the cosmopolitan consensus of history transmitted in literary tradition. Each method has its special power and its proper province. The one attains its results by the patient road of ratiocination, while the other seizes them by instantaneous divination. The desideratum is the union and concordant operation of the two. Then rounded knowledge and perfected sentiment will wear the crown and wield the sceptre for the attunement of a whole humanity and the orderly progression of the world to its destined goal.

The great teachers of the art and science of criticism are the masterpieces of genius, the peerless works historically throned in cosmopolitan glory. But, after all, the supreme teacher and the ultimate standard is immediate vision of the creative archetypes in the mind of God.

JOSEPH MALLORD WILLIAM TURNER.

BY ELBERT HUBBARD,

Author of "Forbes of Harvard," "No Enemy," "Little Journeys," etc.

Turner's father was a barber. His youth was passed in poverty, and his advantages for education were very slight. And all this in the crowded city of London, where merit may knock long, and still not be heard, and in a country where wealth and title are supposed to count for much.

When a boy, barefoot and ragged, he would wander away alone on the banks of the river and dream dreams about wonderful palaces and beautiful scenes; and then he would trace them with a stick in the sands, and endeavor with mud to make plain to the eye the things that his soul saw.

His father and mother were quite sure that no good could come from this vagabondish nature, so they did not spare the rod; for they feared that the desire to scrawl and daub would spoil the child. But he was a stubborn lad, with a pug nose and big, dreamy, wondering eyes and a heavy jaw; and, when parents see that they have such a son, they had better hang up the rod behind the kitchen door and lay aside force and cease scolding. For love is better than a cat-o'-nine-tails, and sympathy saves more souls than threats.

Young Turner did not always wash his father's shop windows well, nor sweep off the sidewalk properly. Like all boys, he would rather work for some one else than "his folks." He used to run errands for an engraver by the name of Smith,—John Raphael Smith. And once, when Smith sent the barber's boy to a certain art gallery with orders to "get the answer and hurry back, mind you!" the boy both forgot to get the answer and to hurry back. Then another boy was despatched after the first, and boy No. 2 found boy No. 1 sitting with staring eyes and open mouth in the art gallery before a painting of Claude Lorraine. When boy No. 1 was at last, half forcibly, dragged away and reached the shop of his master, he got his ears well cuffed for his forgetfulness. But from that day forth he was not the same being that he had been before his eyes fell on that Claude Lorraine.

He was transformed,—as much so as was Lazarus after he had gone beyond the portals of death and had come back to earth. And from that time he thought of Claude Lorraine during the day and dreamed of him at night, and he stole his way into every exhibition where a Claude was to be seen. And now I wish that Claude Lorraine was the subject of this sketch as well as Turner, for his life is a page of sweetest poetry framed in a world of dullest prose.

The eyes of this boy, whom they thought was dreamy, dull, and listless, now shone with a different light. He thirsted to achieve, to do, to become,—yes, to become a greater painter than Claude Lorraine. His employer saw the change, and smiled at it; but he allowed the lad to put in back-ground and add the skies to cheap prints, just because the youngster teased to do it.

Then one day a certain patron of the shop came; and he looked over the shoulder of the Turner boy, and he said, "He has skill,—perhaps talent." And I think that the Recording Angel should give this man a separate page on the Book of Remembrance and write his name in illuminated colors; for he gave young Turner access to his own art collection and to his library, and he never cuffed him nor kicked him nor called him dunces. Thereat the boy was much surprised. But he encouraged the youth to sketch a picture in water colors, and then he bought the picture and paid him ten shillings for it. And the name of this man was Dr. Munro.

The next year, when young Turner was fourteen, Dr. Munro got him admitted to the Royal Academy as a student; and in 1790 he exhibited a water color of the Archbishop's Palace at Lambeth. The picture won no prize, and doubtless was not worthy of one; but from now on Joseph M. W. Turner was an artist, and other hands had to sweep the barber-shop. He worked steadily and studied hard. His reading was wide and varied, chiefly in line of art; but for rest he read mythology and learned languages. He acquired a certain command of French, so he could read the works of French writers in the original, and soon Italian authors as well.

But few bought his pictures. They were not popular. Other artists scorned him,—intuitively fearing him, possibly; for we often scoff when the ghost of genius does not down at our bidding. Then Turner was accounted unsociable. Besides, he was ragged, uncouth, independent, and did not conform to the ways of the artist world. So the select circle cast him out,—more properly speaking, did not let him in. But still he worked, and exhibited at every Academy exhibition. Yet he was often hungry, and the London fog crept cold and damp through his threadbare clothes. But he toiled on, for Claude Lorraine was ever before him.

In 1802, when twenty-seven years of age, he visited France and made a tour through Switzerland, tramping over many long miles with his painting kit on his back; and he brought back rich treasure in way of sketches and quickened imagination. In the years following he made many such trips, and came to know Venice, Rome, Florence, and Paris as perfectly as his own London.

When thirty-three years of age he was still worshipping at the shrine of Claude Lorraine. His pictures painted at this time show it; and his book issued in 1808, "Liber Studiorum," is modelled after the "Liber Veritatis." But the book surpasses Claude's, and Turner knew it; and this may have led him to burst his shackles and cast loose from his idol. For in 1815 we find him working according to his own ideas, showing an originality and audacity in conception and execution that made him the butt of the critics and caused consternation to rage through the studios of competitors. Success came slowly, but his ambition never slackened.

Gradually it dawned upon the purchasing public that things so strongly condemned must have merit; for why should the pack bay so loudly if there was no quarry? So to have a Turner was at least something for your friends to talk about. Then carriages began to stop before the dingy brick building, and broadcloth and satin mounted the creaking stairs to the studio. It happened about this time that Turner's prices began to increase. Like the Sybil of old, if a customer said, "I don't want it," the painter increased the price.

For the first thirty years of his career he sold few pictures, for the simple reason that no one wanted them. And he sold few pictures during the latter years of his life, for the reason that his prices were so high that none but the very rich could buy. First the public scorned Turner. Next Turner scorned the public. It would not buy his pictures at first, and later it could not.

He left to the British nation by his will nineteen thousand pencil and water-color sketches and one hundred large canvases. These pictures are now to be seen in the National Gallery at London, in rooms set apart and sacred to Turner's work. For fear that it may be thought the number of sketches mentioned above is a misprint, let us say that, if he had produced one picture a day for sixty years, it would not equal the number of pieces bestowed by his will on the nation.

This, of course, takes no account of the pictures sold during his lifetime. He left a fortune of £140,000 ($720,000). Hence we may infer that not all of his pictures were bestowed as a legacy at his death; and, as he stole from his father's barber-shop a shaving-brush wherewith to paint his first canvas, we know that this vast fortune was the result of his own labor.

The following passage will be found on page 205, vol. i. of "Modern Painters":—

"I believe that these works [certain canvases of Turner's] are at their first appearing as perfect as those of Phidias and Leonardo; that is to say, incapable of any improvement conceivable by human mind."

Of Turner's many pictures we will mention but two, both of which are to be seen on the walls of the National Gallery. First, "The Fighting Téméraire." This war-ship has been sold out of service, and is being towed away to be broken up. The scene was photographed on Turner's brain, and he immortalized it on canvas. Again we cannot do better than to borrow the words of Mr. Ruskin:—

"Of all pictures not visibly involving human pain, this is the most pathetic ever painted."

"The utmost pensiveness which can ordinarily be given to a landscape depends on adjuncts of ruin, but no ruin was ever so affecting as the gliding of this ship to her grave. This particular ship, crowned in the Trafalgar hour of trial with chief victory,—surely, if ever anything without a soul deserves honor or affection, we owe them here! Surely, some sacred care might have been left in our thoughts for her, some quiet space amid the lapse of English waters! Nay, not so. We have stern keepers to trust her glory to,—the fire and the worm. Nevermore shall sunset lay golden robe upon her, nor starlight tremble on the waves that part at her gliding. Perhaps, where the low gate opens to some cottage garden, the tired traveller may ask idly why the moss grows so green on the rugged wood; and even the sailor's child may not know that the night dew lies deep in the war rents of the old Téméraire."

"The Burial at Sea" brought tears to my eyes. Yet there is no burial. The ship is far away in the gloom of the offing. You cannot make out a single figure on her decks; but you behold her great sails standing out against the leaden blackness of the night, and you feel that there is a certain scene being enacted. And, if you listen closely, you can hear the solemn voice of the captain as he reads the burial service. Then there is a pause; a swift, sliding sound; a splash, and all is over.

Turner never married. Like Plato, Michel Angelo, Sir Isaac Newton, and his own Claude Lorraine, he was wedded to his art. But at sixty-five his genius suddenly burst forth afresh; and his work, Mr. Ruskin says, at that time exceeded in daring and brilliancy and in the rich flowering of imagination anything he had previously done. Mr. Ruskin could give no reason for this sudden change; but rumor says "a woman."

At Chelsea I stood in the little room where he breathed his last that bleak day in 1851. The unlettered but motherly old woman who took care of him in those last days never guessed his greatness. None in the house or neighborhood knew. To them he was only Mr. Booth, an eccentric old man of moderate means, who liked to muse, read, and play with children. He had no callers, no friends. He went to the city every day, and came back at night. He talked but little; he was absent-minded; he smoked and thought and smiled and muttered to himself.

Of art to these strangers he would never speak. Once they urged him to go with them to an exhibition at Kensington; but he smiled feebly as he lit his pipe, and said: "An art exhibition? No, no! A man can show on a canvas so little of what he feels: it is not worth the while."

He seldom went to church. Once a fellow-lodger asked him what he thought of God. "God—God,—what do I know of God? What does any one? He is our life. He is the All. But we need not fear him. All we can do is to do our work and speak the truth. To-morrow we go—where? I do not know, but I am not afraid."

At last he died, passed peacefully away; and his attorney came,—the only man who knew the identity of "Mr. Booth,"—and took charge of his remains.

Many are the hard words that have been flung off by heedless tongues about Turner's thus taking an assumed name and living in obscurity. But, with Victor Hugo, I say, "What you call fault I call accent." Surely, if a great man and world famous desires to escape the flatterers and the silken mesh of so-called society, and live in simplicity, he has a right to do so! Again, Turner was a very rich man in his old age. He did much for struggling artists, and assisted aspiring merit in many ways. So it came about that his mail was burdened with begging letters, and his life made miserable by appeals from impecunious persons, good and bad, and from churches, societies, and associations without number. He decided to flee them all, and he did.

"The Building of Carthage" is one of his finest works. He esteemed it so highly that he requested that, when death came, his body should be buried wrapped in this magnificent canvas. But the wish was disregarded.

His remains rest in the crypt of St. Paul's, beside the dust of Reynolds; his statue, in marble, adorns a niche in the great cathedral; and his fame and name are secure, high on the roll of honor. And, if for no other reason, the name of Chelsea should be deathless as the home of Turner.

THE CHILDREN OF HAMELN.

BY JOHN FRETWELL.

Some years ago I had occasion to attend a convention of the North-west German Protestant Association which met at Hameln, an ancient city on the Weser. A hall in which we met was decorated with curious wall-paintings, the work of some pious village artist of the sixteenth century. One of these paintings, evidently intended to represent the return of the men whom Moses sent to spy out the promised land, had two men clothed in costumes which might have been worn by the companions of Robin Hood and Little John, bearing on a pole an immense bunch of grapes as big as themselves. Another was evidently designed to illustrate the opening verses of the eleventh chapter of the second book of Samuel, but King David was painted as sitting on the roof of a mediæval German castle and smoking a pipe. The pious artist had evidently no knowledge of Jewish costumes, and so had represented the people in those of his own time, no doubt bringing the story more vividly to the minds of his fellow-townsmen than if the scenery and costumes had been historically correct.

This was not the only thing in the old city by the Weser that attracted my attention. On the wall of a house in the town was written in gold letters a German inscription, saying that in 1284, on the day of Saint John and Saint Paul (June 26), one hundred and thirty children had been enticed away from Hameln by a piper wearing a coat of many colors, and had been lost under the Koppenberg.

Many German authorities speak of this event as an historical fact; and so firmly did the people of Hameln believe in it that for many years afterward they dated their public documents from the day when the children were lost. The best known version of the story in our tongue is Robert Browning's "Pied Piper of Hamelin." He tells us how the old town was infested by rats, who ... "fought the dogs and killed the cats, And bit the babies in their cradles, And ate the cheeses out of the vats, And licked the soup from the cook's own ladles."

A man called Bunting, from "Nobody-knows-where," came into the town, and offered to deliver the people for a certain sum of money from the plague of rats. The burghers of Hameln agreed to the bargain, but, when all the rats had been drowned by Bunting, refused to pay the stipulated sum. To revenge himself, on the Feast of Saint Peter and Saint John he came back to Hameln, as Browning tells us, and in like manner led away the little children of the town to where a wondrous portal opened in the mountain side.

"And, when all were in, to the very last, The door in the mountain side shut fast."

There is many a myth with a similar ending. Among the people of my native Yorkshire there is a superstition that, when strange music is heard, some human soul is passing away from the mortal body. A Wesleyan farmer in Yorkshire once accounted for the death of his little servant-girl by a band of music playing in the neighborhood while she lay ill. "When t'music was agate, her soul was forced to be off," he said.

But what especially interested me in Browning's version of the Hameln legend is the conclusion:—

"That in Transylvania there's a tribe Of alien people who ascribe The outlandish ways and dress On which their neighbors lay such stress To their fathers and mothers having risen Out of some subterranean prison Into which they were trepanned, Long time ago, in a mighty band, Out of Hameln Town in Brunswick Land; But how or why they don't understand."

Transylvania, the "land beyond the forests," is the name given by the Romans to the eastern part of Hungary, conquered by the legions of Trajan; and it was long for them what California was for the Argonauts of 1849,—an Eldorado. It is still, for us of modern Europe, a land of myth and memory and mystery; and, if you would see to-day how people lived in North-western Germany some five hundred years ago, you may get some idea of it by visiting the Transylvania of to-day. But you must go soon, or you will be too late.

In the twenty-one years which have elapsed since I first looked from the vine-clad hills of Koloszar on the plains where the brave but undisciplined forces of King Decebalus were finally overcome by the legions of Trajan, many a vestige of the old Roman conquerors, and of the crusaders who at a later date followed in their path, has been swept away by the modern army of road-builders, who are extending the railroads through the Carpathians into Turkey, and so into Asia.

Going up the Aranyos River (the Transylvanian Pactolus) one day I saw a gypsy carefully picking over asheepskin which he had just taken from the water. A companion explained to me that the minute bits of gold brought by the torrents from the gold-bearing hills among which they rise get entangled in the wool, and are thus collected by the gypsies. Might not this habit, observed some twenty centuries ago, have given rise to the Greek fable of the search for the Golden Fleece? A further drive up the rocky bed of this mountain torrent, and a difficult journey across the ridge, between mighty walls of rock, where no outlet seemed visible, led us to the little village of Thoroczko. The people came originally from Styria to work the iron mines, but have become so thoroughly Magyarized that it is difficult now to find any one who speaks German. Their houses are built like those of the Saxons, adorned with rows of jugs round the top of the room, piles of bedding prettily embroidered, and the towels and other linen spun and woven by the peasant girls, and ornamented with red dyes made from the native plants. The dress of the people, mostly the work of the women, is the richest and most handsome in all Hungary. A painter would be enchanted with it. The men are occupied in the iron mines all the week, and I should think that Tubal Cain carried on the working of metals pretty much in the same way as the people of Thoroczko did some twenty years ago. A shed erected beside a brook covers the smelting-furnace, built up of clay and stones. On one side large bellows worked by a primitive water-wheel blow the fire. A hole feeds the furnace, and on the other side another hole permits the molten iron to flow out. Were not the ore the best in the world (containing 60 per cent. of iron), it could hardly be worked by so primitive a process.

When the German settlers first came here to work the iron mines, they were Catholics, and, being shut out from the rest of the world by their almost inaccessible position, remained for a long time unaffected by the Reformation and its conflicts. But one day their priest, going down the Aranyos River into the plains, entered a Unitarian church. He was so much struck by the beauty and simplicity of the service that on the following Sunday he persuaded the men of his congregation to accompany him to the same church, and since that time the people have been Unitarian.

After visiting them, I came to an old Calvinist college, in a building once belonging to the Knights Templars, and found a Latin manuscript written by a Catholic priest in the seventeenth century. This manuscript related the story of the children of Hameln, and said that the Unitarians of Thoroczko were the descendants of the people who had been led away from Hameln by the pied piper; and the story closes with the remark that the piper was no less a personage than Satan himself. The remark may be excused in a pious Catholic who believed every form of Protestantism to be an inspiration of the devil. And a letter is in existence, written by another priest, who acknowledged the high character of the Unitarians, but asked that for this very reason they should be exterminated, because their excellent lives recommended their infamous doctrines. Here we have all the elements for the growth of a mythic legend.

Not one fact related in "The Pied Piper" has any actual basis in the history of the Thoroczko iron workers. They did not come from the banks of the Weser, but from Austrian Styria. The little "land beyond the forests," scarcely larger than Rhode Island, was almost a desert when Frederick Barbarossa wore the imperial crown of Germany, and the descendants of Saint Stephen called in the German immigrants to cultivate and defend the land. Some came from Flanders, some from Cologne, and some from higher up the Rhine. King Andrew II. granted them a charter in 1224, which gave the German immigrants more freedom than they enjoyed in their native land; and for a long time Hungary was for the Rhinelander of those days what America has become for the many-languaged paupers of Europe in ours,—the land of hope and plenty and freedom. For a time they were on the highway to India, and the German town of Klausenburg was one of the chief marts for the caravans which brought the treasures of India and Persia to the markets of Nuremberg and Leipzig. Then Vasco da Gama discovered the route to India round the cape; and Transylvania was for some centuries isolated from the highroads of commercial intercourse, and frequently ravaged by incursions of Turks or Austrians.

Bits of their old history, carried down by tradition, and never committed to writing by the illiterate people, gradually took the form of myths; and so this strange story of the children of Hameln, suggested at first by the history of the early German immigrants, was applied to the Magyarized Styrians whose descendants still work the iron of Thoroczko. Just as that painter of Hameln had represented David and the spies of Moses in the costume and scenery of their own every-day world, so these people allowed the legends of their origin to be affected by the atmosphere of myth in which they lived. They took a natural view of subjects that were dear to them. You may see in one of their paintings of the Virgin Mary's death-bed, surrounded by grieving friends, a couple of little boys playing at whip-top, all unconscious of the sorrow within. In another Saint Mark is writing his Gospel with a pen or pencil in each hand. Other apostles are drawn handling nets, which they made of twine, like the relatives of the painters; and in other pictures, representing "those blessed fields whereon the Saviour trod," you may see German furniture of the seventeenth century through the open house doors, and Dutch clocks ticking on the wall. These painters and their contemporaries lived the lives of the Biblical personages, and brought them nearer to themselves, by the very intensity of their sympathy, than the more accurate historical painters of to-day; and the very reality of the faith evidenced by the pictures gives them an indescribable charm. So it is with the legends about their own origin. These Styrian iron-workers had spent their lives underground in their native land, working the iron mines; and they did the same in Thoroczko. So the popular fancy easily identified them with the children who were supposed to have been led away from Hameln by underground passages. And the story, spite of its historical inaccuracies, symbolizes some truths of our moral experience also.

Browning tells us that one lame child was left behind, and in after years related how the piper sang to them of

"A joyous land Joining the town, and just at hand, Where waters gushed, and fruit-trees grew, And flowers put on a fairer hue, And everything was strange and new," etc.

Is it not our experience that, when we break loose from the leading-strings of our childhood and youth, we look out into the great world with expectations that are mostly disappointed by our later experience, but yet often find something better for us in the stern conflict of the world than what we expected? These Styrians did not come into a joyous land; but, high up among the storm-swept mountains, they dwell in a barren place, where they had to win the means of their existence by mining and smelting the iron from which they made the plough-shares to till the soil and the sword to keep off the invader. But they found one privilege of which they had never dreamed. In the pleasant homes they had left behind every attempt at religious progress was rudely suppressed by a priest-ridden soldiery; while here, up in their mountain fastnesses, they were free to worship God undisturbed in the way that best recommended itself to their conscience.

LONDON LETTER.

England is now fairly launched upon the waves of 1895. They are not the same as those with which we were familiar in the early days of 1894. We are in the midst of different atmospheric and oceanic currents. How many things are changed! Home Rule, which almost monopolized the politics of a year ago, lies far away in the dim distance. "Of course we stand for it, —always must, always shall," say the liberals. But they don't talk about it, are not ardent,—far from passionate. Some admit that it is a relief to be rid of it. The Grand Old Man is no longer at the helm of his party's ship, and the Grand New Man has not yet had time to live himself into entire favor with extreme and passionate partisans. He has entirely changed the party prayer. It asks no more for the freedom of Ireland, but for either the mending or the ending of the House of Lords. Probably there is about the same likelihood of the ending of the House of Lords as there is of the ending of our providential supervision of the Emerald Isle. Without us Irishmen could do nothing; and no true Englishman could dream of anything so cruel as to allow that wild and fantastic race to rush violently down the steep of destruction! Besides, terrible is the spook of Popery!

Speaking of Popery reminds one that Froude, who was on this English earth last year, is no longer seen upon it now. His last book upon Erasmus was one of the fairest he ever wrote. Of course, he could not forgive Erasmus for not breaking with the popes, or for dying in the odor of Roman rather than in that of Lutheran sanctity. No more charming things to come from Stevenson, either! These two, with Walter Pater, are perhaps our greatest literary silences as we go forward. Pater's style was too pure and finished to render the works that follow his entrance into rest as popular as those of Stevenson and Froude. Some of us have read since the year came in the "Autobiography, Diary, and Letters of John Addington Symonds," which contain some memorable and exquisite things, but of which there is too much by half, and especially of morbid introspection and self-consciousness. But everything must be pardoned in a mind of genius inhabiting a body diseased.

I suppose that statistics would show that England never, in this century at least, entered a year with so few paupers on board as now. Yet their number is legion, even if a diminishing legion. They are still the problem, if not the despair, of our social scientists and reformers. The science which would make them men is still a clamor or a twaddle from dreamland,—loud, fluent, and uttered, for the most part, with a motive that discounts it fearfully. Still, many are seriously grappling with the problem of the common life; and the tone of English thought and feeling is far different to-day from what it was twenty-three or four years ago. There is far less belief in and resignation to the inscrutable decrees of Providence in these matters. Christians have a deeper sense of their own responsibility toward the least of their Master's brethren. It has even become a fashion for sects to vie with one another in some show of philanthropy. There is much work carried forward whose whole effect, both direct and indirect, is humanizing.

The Salvation Army must have the credit of bringing many easy-going believers to their Christian senses. So many had literally cast their "deadly doing down," and found it so sensuously sweet to feel that, bathed "in the blood of Jesus," they were being carried forward upon a clever scheme of grace to receive "a glorious crown," that it was scarcely less than a new, as it certainly was a divine, revelation when these Salvationists took this "deadly doing" up, and gave us a practical illustration of what it is to give life as Jesus and the early Christians gave it. On watch night, with two friends, I visited five of the Salvation Shelters in the East End of London. In one we found about three hundred women, or wrecks of women. Not one of them, probably, had a soul, as we generally understand that term,—bodies, empty sepulchres; feelings dead, hope gone; prayers said for them, exhortations to them, hymns moving a normal sensibility even to tears, touching no chord, awakening no emotion. Three hundred "I don't cares." It did seem a thankless, hopeless task for the bright, brave, and buoyant young captain to be giving her very best years to the physical comfort and sustaining of these merely fleshly creatures,—the feeding of their hunger, the housing them on winter nights from the howling winds and biting frost. But she knew in what and in whom she believed. On her spotless white apron was embroidered in red the significant word "Inasmuch." Just so do we care for the incurables in our hospital wards, for the hopelessly ill in our own homes, until the change comes. And what a work of love and grace it is! In another shelter we found three hundred men nearly. In yet another over four hundred. But, of all the sad, poverty-stricken sights I ever beheld, that which greeted us at the Blackfriars' shelter was by far the most abject and depressing. This shelter receives every night between nine hundred and a thousand men. Of these it has sleeping-bunks for only about four hundred and fifty or so. Each man who avails himself of a warm sleeping-place pays his two or three pence. But this is too exorbitant a price for many a poor fellow's pocket. So the shelter allows men to come in upon payment of a ha'penny and sit upon the benches or the floor of the large hall in which the meetings are held. The hall is warmed by steam to a high temperature. At midnight, if any are standing outside without even a ha'penny, they are allowed to come in. Usually, some forty or fifty are found in this plight. When we entered that night, there sat between four and five hundred men, of varying ages, nationalities, colors, types. Most of them were on the seats, a few upon the floor with their backs against the wall. It was enough to make one weep. The utter silence in which they were sitting there, the utter dejection and despair on every face, the absence of everything that looked like hope or comfort. The hell of the public house—the fore-court, doubtless, to this—would have seemed bright, heavenly bright, compared with the picture here. Not a joke or laugh or a chat between any two of these ha'penny disconsolates. He who had entered here had evidently abandoned hope. It seemed heartless to even look upon such men. It seemed terrible that some considerable number of them were whiter and purer of heart and life than some of our men in luxurious and prominent place! Not all have brought just this like a judgment upon themselves,

Some have been unfortunate, neglected, uncared for, inconsiderately used, and then cast aside in the great scramble for "a pile." As I left the room, I said to the young officer who had shown us the various parts of the shelter, "Do you happen to know my good friend, Capt. Ayer?" "God bless him!" was the quick reply. "I was converted under him. He helped make a man of me. I was once a 'dosser' like any of these." Now he is a clean, bright, serviceable, hopeful spirit.

Next month we Unitarians are going to take a concert step in the "forward movement" of religious thought. All our London ministers are going to give, each in his own place, five lectures explanatory of our views on as many subjects. The recent School Board contest, with its vast amount of bugaboism over Unitarianism, seems to make the present a fitting opportunity for a fresh statement of those things most surely believed among us. We are to speak of "The Old and the New Thought of the Bible," "The Old and the New Faith in God," "The Christ of the Gospels Brought Back," "Practical Christianity the Salvation of Society," and of "Heaven and Hell, Here and Hereafter." There is something hopeful, at least, in our hearty co-operation in this endeavor,—something good and pleasant, when Unitarian brethren are minded to work together in unity. On one of our trumpet calls I notice the following sentence, which, while it tells the truth, does not tell the whole truth. It says, "Multitudes hold aloof from all churches, largely because of the irrational doctrines preached as Christianity." To this must be added, "Multitudes hold aloof from all churches, largely because of the formally religious, yet utterly superficial and selfish lives lived as Christian." Where one person stumbles over irrational doctrines, it is probable that ten stumble over forms of godliness without the power thereof. Worldliness and conventionality and the wearisomeness of doubtful disputations are the worst foes of Christian life and grace. One sometimes feels that, if we fail, and where we fail, it is when we present "our views" to the people rather than a more abundant and devoted life. It is possible that a man's views may be all right, and his spirit that from which one, in the degree that he is good and true, must instinctively flee away. One is not quite sure that Jesus did not share many of the views of the scribes and Pharisees, but in his religion was the utmost dread of the leaven of their spirit.

Our winter only came in with the year. Up to Christmas the wall-flowers and chrysanthemums were in bloom in these Richmond Gardens. On January 5 the polyanthus were in full bloom, thousands of them, under the windows at Hampton Court. But to-day, January 9, the frost is out, the ice is treacherously thin, everybody shivers in the dismal fog. S. F.

Spirit of the Press.

The Boston Sunday Herald, in an article on the pastoral letter of the bishops of the Episcopal Church, says:—

The pastoral letter is evidently aimed at this Anglican school of thought, which has developed itself in the last fifty years, and is now stronger than ever. It spoke in the election of Bishop Brooks; it spoke again in the choice of his successor; and it expresses itself in the honest and intelligent convictions of a great number of clergymen and laymen, who have no intention of being disloyal to the standards of the faith, but who are trying to show that Christianity, in its interpretation, can be vitally blended with what is best and most invigorating in modern thought. This document is against the temper of the times, and fails to rightly understand the position of many thoughtful men. There is a wide difference between the toleration which those need who are thinking out the solution of the religious problems of the hour in harmony with the old faith and the liberty which extremists take in pushing their crude opinions to the front; and much of the usefulness of the Episcopal Church has been in the understanding that its clergy are both conservative and progressive, and that they stand for the reconstruction of many religious positions without denying fundamental truth. Since the paralysis of the Andover movement they have been looked to by Christians of all names as in some sense leaders of religious thought, and it is only fair to them that they shall not be accused of disloyalty because in things permissible they think for themselves.

Spiritual Life.

There is one manner of life by which a man ever gets lower and grows meaner, another by which he ever rises and grows nobler: it is for the man to choose. The whole of wisdom consists in finding and following the upward path.—Selected.

There has always been, and there always will be the brave advancing minority, the world's hope, the invincible few,—not a remnant, meaning something left over, but a leadership, keeping in the van of thought, bearing and daring for what they believe to be the truth and right.—John Learned.

Praise God with me for the great moments in which all things seem possible for us, and for the common tasks that we cannot do with steady faithfulness without loving them and being glad in them; and then, besides, that the great moments cannot be utterly forgotten, and that what seemed so easy on the heights of our transfiguration can, somehow, be done, albeit with aching hands and bleeding feet, and hearts that wonder at the name of joy as if she were a stranger.—John Chadwick.

E. ROCKWOOD HOAR.

Judge E. Rockwood Hoar, who for seven weeks past has been lying close to the door of death, passed away Thursday evening, January 31, at his home in Concord. Elsewhere we call attention to the prominent elements of his character; but, as his personal history was largely a part of the history of his time, we give an outline here of the principal events in his career, condensed from a full notice in the Boston Herald:—

In the list of prominent lawyers and distinguished statesmen of Massachusetts the name of Ebenezer Rockwood Hoar was conspicuous. Commencing his life as a lawyer more than fifty years ago, he gained honor, distinction, and wealth. Descended from a long line of progenitors whose names were intimately connected with the history of the country and the State, he has worthily upheld the honor of his ancestral name. He was born at Concord, Mass., Feb. 21, 1816, and was a son of the statesman, Samuel Hoar, who was sent by the legislature of Massachusetts in 1844 to Charleston, S.C., to test the constitutionality of the acts of that State authorizing the imprisonment of free colored persons who should enter it, the result being that he was expelled from the State, the legislature authorizing the expulsion. His grandfather was a captain in the Revolutionary War. His mother was a daughter of Roger Sherman.

He entered Harvard College, was graduated in 1835, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1840, and practised in the courts of Middlesex and Suffolk Counties.

In 1846 he was elected to the State Senate. In 1849 he was appointed judge of the Court of Common Pleas, holding that position for six years. In 1859 he was selected as one of the judges of the Supreme Court of the State, and from March, 1869, until July, 1870, was attorney-general of the United States. In the latter year he was offered the position of Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the State, but declined to accept it. Soon after he was nominated by the President as one of the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, but the nomination was not confirmed by the Senate.

In 1861 the honorary degree of LL.D. was conferred upon Judge Hoar by Williams College; and he also received the same degree from Harvard of the Board of Overseers, of which he was a member.

Judge Hoar was a member of the joint high commission which formed the treaty of Washington with Great Britain in 1871, and served as a representative to Congress from Massachusetts (Seventh District) from Dec. 1, 1873, to March 3, 1875, being elected as a Republican. In the spring of 1874 he was an unsuccessful candidate before the legislature for the seat in the United States Senate made vacant by the death of Charles Sumner. During the year that he held the office of attorney-general he reorganized it, by the authority of Congress, as a distinct department of the government, under the title of the department of justice.

One of Judge Hoar's most important services to the country, and one not generally known, was his influential agency in arranging for a loan to the United States government at a critical period of its history. He was one of a few patriotic citizens who, in connection with Secretary Chase and President Lincoln, successfully negotiated this important financial arrangement with capitalists of Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, instead of seeking foreign aid.

Nov. 1, 1840, he married, at Concord, the daughter of Nathan and Caroline D. Brooks; and on the fiftieth anniversary of that event, in 1890, the husband and wife celebrated their golden wedding at their home at Concord near the spot where the marriage took place, and where they were born. Judge and Mrs. Hoar had seven children: Caroline; Sarah Sherman, deceased; Samuel, who was associated with his father in the legal profession; Charles Emerson; Clara Downes; Elizabeth; and Sherman, the ex-Congressman and present United States district attorney.

United States Senator George F. Hoar is the brother of the late judge.

During his long legal career he had been connected with a vast number of important cases, one of the most notable of which was the famous Andover controversy. Among the well-known men in college with Judge Hoar were Dr. Stephen Salisbury, Prof. Henry W. Torrey, Prof. Joseph Lovering, Dr. Morrill Wyman, Dr. Jeffries Wyman, Thomas Wigglesworth, John Holmes, Dr. Charles T. Barnard, Dr. Henry Lyon, John H. Eliot, Charles W. Storey, and Dr. Charles Vose Bemis.

He was a thorough lawyer, and had a large and lucrative practice during the latter years of his life, his eldest son having been associated with him. As a judge, attorney-general, statesman, and in other important positions, he was incorruptible, faithful, impartial, and just.

He was justly proud of his position, his ancestry, his attainments, and his public services; and he lived and died in the town where he was born, respected, honored, and beloved by all.

Those who knew him are unanimous in the opinion that he was one of the wisest and wittiest sons that old Massachusetts ever had. Unfortunately, few of them are able to recall special instances of his wit, so that the greater part of his bright sayings are lost to the world.

As an advocate, the judge showed himself possessed of an intuitive perception of the inwardness of a case, of marked common sense, and of ability as a pleader before a jury. One who knew him well said he could see further into a case in five minutes than any other man he ever knew.

Judge Hoar took to the bench the qualities which marked him as an advocate, and, in addition, a keen judicial instinct. He was not an impatient judge, as some judges are impatient; but, if a man had a poor case, he was fairly sure to find out Judge Hoar's opinion of it early in the trial. In charging a jury, he had the faculty of making the jury understand the matter in hand; and he never delivered a charge over the heads of the men in the box.

The funeral of Judge Hoar was held at Concord on Monday last, and was conducted by Rev. F. G. Peabody, D.D., of Harvard University, Mass. It was attended by the governor of the State and by a large number of distinguished citizens.

THEODORE D. WELD.

Mr. Theodore D. Weld died this week at the advanced age of ninety-one years and two months. He survived all his antislavery friends, among whom were John Brown, Wendell Phillips, Charles Sumner, and William Lloyd Garrison. He related some interesting reminiscences of his life to a friend lately, and these have been given in the Transcript since his death. He said: "My first knowledge of the abuse of the colored race was when I was six years old, when attending a school in Connecticut, where a little colored boy was made to recite separately, and was slighted and avoided by the others, solely on account of his black skin. My interest in him resulted in my being called 'Nigger Weld.' When I was young, my mother was a slaveholder; and she made me an Abolitionist by telling me the horrible stories of slave-buying."

When at Hamilton College, he assisted in forming an antislavery society, and later lectured on the "burning topic" until his voice failed. For twenty years he was connected with the antislavery office in New York. When the war came, he resumed his lecturing, regardless of opposition. In 1841 Mr. Weld spent several months with Mr. Giddings, an antislavery man in Ohio, and ex-Gov. Slade of Washington, getting up a series of resolutions. It was about this time that John Quincy Adams, a member of the House of Representatives, presented the petition of people in Haverhill that the North and South be divided, and each allowed to go its respective way. It occasioned great excitement at the time; and Mr. Weld and others assisted Mr. Adams in looking up points bearing on the question, and were interested listeners to the subsequent debates.

February 4.

The Sunday School.

The usual Channing Hall "talks" at the Unitarian Building, 25 Beacon Street, will be held next Saturday, February 9. Subject, Lesson XX., "Jesus sending out His Disciples to preach." Primary at 2 P.M., conducted by Miss A. C. Dockham; Intermediate and Advanced at three o'clock, led by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford. All cordially invited.

The regular monthly meeting of the directors of the Sunday School Society was held at 25 Beacon Street Monday, February 4, at 1 P.M. There were present Messrs. Horton, Humphreys, Boyden, Drew, Lewis, and Metcalf, and Mrs. Eddy. The treasurer's statement showed the financial condition of the society to be practically the same as on the corresponding date of last year. Mr. Lewis tendered his resignation as a member of the committee on the new hymn and tune book. His resignation was accepted. The president reported a gratifying circulation of Every Other Sunday. Adjourned at two o'clock. Edwin J. Lewis, Jr., Clerk.

Among the plans to which Rev. E. M. Fairchild of Troy, N.Y., is giving his energy is "A Children's School of Ethics and Religion." An interesting statement of its plans and results appears in the Troy Northern Budget, written by Mr. Fairchild. The scheme is too long for full quotation here; but we gladly refer those who wish full information to Mr. Fairchild, who will be happy to send the statement in a bulletin form. Some copies are also at 25 Beacon Street, in the Sunday-school department, and can be had by any one who wishes. In the midst of the new enthusiasm for improving Sunday-school methods this suggestive plan is well worth the consideration of Sunday-school workers. Even if it is not possible to carry out the idea in completeness as here outlined, there are many features which might well be grafted on to the old Sunday-school system.

The Sunday-school at Elmira, N.Y., in Mr. Beecher's church is a graded school, superintended now by Mr. W. N. Eastabrook. There is a seven-year course of study arranged by Mr. Beecher, and the readings recommended for family use are arranged with reference to the Sunday lesson. Thus both parents and children study the same things at the same time. For thirty-five years the records have been kept of attendance, behavior, and recitations. Promotions, prizes, and diplomas are based upon these records exactly as in a secular school. Although not as large as some, numbering eight hundred or a thousand, there is no more nearly perfect Sunday-school in the United States than this one. It is as methodical as clock-work; and yet, as Mr. Beecher often says with reference to the church, its work and services, it is "as easy as an old shoe." This Sunday-school is Mrs. Beecher's creation, and she has given to it a singularly rare and devoted life.—Christian World.

THE NEW ENGLAND ASSOCIATE ALLIANCE.—The Branch of the Alliance connected with the First Congregational (Unitarian) Society of Jamaica Plain, Mass., extends a cordial invitation to all the New England Branches to meet with them on Wednesday, February 27. Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells will preside. Exercises will begin at 11 A.M. Papers will be read by Mrs. S. C. Beach of Bangor, Me., "The Work of the Alliance in Relation to the Sunday-school"; Rev. Edward A. Horton, president of the Unitarian Sunday School Society, "The Sunday School Idea"; Mr. Ellis Peterson, Supervisor of Boston Public Schools, "Work Common to Sunday and Public Schools"; Rev. Charles F. Dole of Jamaica Plain, "The Main Purpose of Sunday-school Effort." Box lunch at 1 P.M. (the ladies of the Jamaica Plain Alliance providing tea and coffee). The afternoon session will begin at 2.15. A discussion will be opened by Prof. Edward Cummings of Harvard University, "Strikes and their Remedies"; Miss Emily G. Balch of Jamaica Plain, "The Relation of the General Public to Strikes." M. E. Velasco, Secretary.

The expenses of the Unitarian Sunday-School Society will be somewhat increased this year in publishing the New Song and Service Book. The outlay for such a book is quite large; and, as the price of it is to be put very low, in order to meet the needs of all the schools West and East, the deficiency must be made up by donations from the churches in the customary channel. The habit is too prevalent in the denomination to allow this annual contribution to the Unitarian Sunday-School Society to wait until the close of the financial year. We suggest that ministers and superintendents take the appeal of this society in hand at once, and, if possible, increase the sum which they have been giving for the past few years. There are also very many churches and Sunday-schools not yet contributing who receive the benefits of the work done by this organization. Any thoughtful student of our Unitarian movement, or even a sympathetic observer, will readily see how much depends upon the thorough and wide work of the Unitarian Sunday-School Society. Whatever strengthens its hands prospers the denomination and increases the hopes of our denominational future.

Ministers' Monday Club: February 11, 10.30 A.M. Rev. Henry Powers will preside. Rev. J. H. Allen will give the address, on the question, "What do we Really Know about Jesus?"

At the next meeting of the Ministers' League, to be held at Hotel Bellevue, Boston, Monday, February 11, at 12.30 P.M., Rev. Samuel A. Eliot of Brooklyn, N.Y., will speak, upon "The Possibilities of the American Unitarian Association."

Parker Memorial, corner Berkeley and Appleton Streets (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): Sunday evening, February 10, at 7.30, Rev. Thomas Van Ness. Subject, "Social Development: The Future Line of Progress." Music by the Temple Quartette. All seats free.

Rev. Minot J. Savage and Rev. Thomas Van Ness devoted their sermons last Sunday to a consideration of the recent pastoral letter issued by the House of Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church. Mr. Van Ness noted its disregard for all the teachings of modern science, and the intellectual perplexity into which one must be thrown who tried to conceive its statements. He held that it places the Episcopal Church in opposition to those things held most dear by one who loves his country's political traditions and the growing popular feeling of international fraternity and religious toleration. Mr. Savage felt urged to the consideration of this letter by the claim, often made, that the Episcopal Church has grown so liberal in recent years as to render the Unitarian Church unnecessary. He condemned its doctrines of original sin, the moral incapacity of man, and the physical resurrection of the body, and showed how one who desires to be free to study, to find truth, to believe that it is not dangerous to think, and who trusts the living, revealing God of to-day, has no right to bow his head to the offered yoke of the Episcopal House of Bishops.

HARTFORD, CONN.—Unity Church has published a calendar, giving the subjects on which Rev. Joseph Waite will preach for the next two months: February 3, "The Development of the Idea of God"; February 10, "The Idea of God from the Standpoint of Philosophy"; February 17, "Pessimism"; February 24, "To Be, or Not to Be"; March 3, "The Soul of God in Things Evil"; March 10, "Hope"; March 17, "How to Enjoy Life"; March 24, "What Shall we Live for?" March 31, "Lent." The attendance at Unity is large and increasing.

HAVERHILL, MASS.—The First Parish church was filled last Sunday evening to listen to the lecture by Rev. F. A. Gilmore upon the French Revolution and its issues. The address was a closely studied one, and was illustrated by fifty stereopticon views, representing many of the actors in the incidents and scenes of that remarkable time. Haverhill Gazette.

KEENE, N.H.—The Unitarian church of Keene, N.H., whose corner-stone was laid on July 11, 1894, was formally dedicated on Thursday evening, January 24, with interesting and appropriate services. A year ago the old church, for various reasons deemed unsuitable to the needs of the society, was sold for $21,000. With the proceeds a lot was purchased, costing $7,000. The balance of the money was increased by subscriptions from members in the society, and from many no longer residents of Keene; and enough was raised to enable the Building Committee—through its chairman, Mr. W. H. Elliot—to report that the present church, costing about $34,000, is practically paid for and free of debt. Considering the depression in business during the year past, the society feels that it has reason to congratulate itself upon this result. The beautiful church stands on Washington Street, one of the main thoroughfares of the city, not far from the site of the old church, but a little nearer the centre of its church-going population. The lot—a corner one—is graded several feet above the level of the street, and is admirably suited to its purpose. The church, designed by Mr. Edward J. Lewis, Jr., of Boston, and erected under his supervision, follows the type of architecture somewhat familiar to us in the parish churches of England. Its walls are low, the gable ends are filled in with plaster, and a massive square tower lends dignity and strength to the whole. It is built of New Hampshire granite, with the weather face exposed except in portions of the buttresses and tower, which have a hammered face. The interior is finished in Southern pine, stained in harmony with the furniture, which is of oak. Windows in the walls and dormer windows in the roof admit sufficient light to make a warm, pleasant interior. The seating capacity is five hundred and twenty. The parish house adjoining, and on the same level as the church, is divided into a large Sunday-school room 30 x 40 feet in size, a ladies' parlor 16 x 30, and a kitchen and dressing-room for men and women. The finish is Southern pine, unstained. The whole is heated by hot-air furnaces, which thus far seem to give satisfaction. The society feel that their church is both beautiful and well adapted to their special needs, and rejoice to think that so much has been done with a reasonable expenditure of money. The dedication services were attended by over seven hundred people, many being unable to gain admittance. They consisted of an invocation by Rev. A. A. Brooks of Greenfield; Scripture reading by Rev. Albert Walkley of Brighton, a former pastor of the church; the delivery of the keys of the church by Mr. W. H. Elliot; the acceptance of the keys by H. K. Faulkner, M.D.; the responsive service of dedication by the present pastor, Rev. Charles B. Elder; a beautiful and touching dedicatory prayer by Rev. W. O. White, now of Brookline, but once a minister of the church for twenty-seven years; a stirring sermon by Rev. Charles G. Ames; and a hymn read by Rev. E. Bradford Leavitt of Brattleboro. Music was happily rendered by the choir, assisted by Beedle's String Quintette. At the close of the service the audience was invited to inspect the church; and for an hour they remained, expressing their pleasure in the new building, and heartily congratulating the Unitarians upon the results achieved and the future that opens to them.

NEWBURYPORT, MASS.—Unitarianism is at work here as in other places. Besides the Sunday morning services, the pastor, Rev. Mr. Beane, holds four o'clock vesper services from October to March. The monthly meetings of the Unitarian Club are attractive, and are attended by large numbers. Rev. C. H. Puffer of the Salem Universalist church, and others, are to speak at the February meeting, on "The Miracles of Christ as Viewed from a Modern Standpoint." The Young People's Guild holds its meetings every other Sunday evening, and the attendance is larger than last year. Recently Benjamin F. Trueblood, secretary of the American Peace Society, gave an interesting address before the Band of Mercy.

NORFOLK CONFERENCE.—The winter meeting of the Norfolk Conference will be held with the Unitarian society at Neponset, Thursday, February 21. Rev. Eugene R. Shippen of Dorchester will lead the devotional service. The principal address of the morning will be given by Rev. George Batchelor of Lowell, and of the afternoon by Rev. Ellery C. Butler of Quincy. A very interesting meeting is promised. Further details will appear in next week's Register.

POMONA, CAL.—Six new members were received into the Unitarian church here December 6. The morning services have been well attended; and a course of illustrated astronomical lectures given on Sunday evenings has drawn large audiences, despite unfavorable weather and union revival meetings in another church.

Does this mean you?—There are still in these days of social slavishness some few spirits who rightly value unconventional art. It requires no little courage for a firm like Paine Furniture Company to bring out such a sideboard as that which is shown in an engraving in another column of this paper. Where is the bold critic who, appreciating the beauty of its unconventional lines, is sufficiently sure of his artistic judgment to buy this delightful sideboard at the low price at which it is offered?

EXTERNALS.

BY HOWARD FREMONT STRATTON.

My life is like the ocean closed about
 By shores that give it feature. Without them
 It were a floating garment, without hem
 Or girdle to give form; or voice to shout
 Its joy with, when some long-sought, hidden gem
 Is set, like a fair lily on the stem,
 Upon its brow or bosom. All my doubt
 Is whispered in these dim and winding caves;
 My tempests, as the larger ocean's waves,
 O'erwhelm the lowlands lying at my feet,
 Dash themselves unto death in rocky graves,
 And sometimes, as the barred impulse raves,
 Lo! in some harbor's safe, unknown retreat,
 Surprised, yet soothed, sink into slumber sweet.

The Pulpit.

THE POWER OF THE PULPIT.

BY PAUL REVERE FROTHINGHAM.

It is often said that the influence of the pulpit is declining, and that its usefulness is well-nigh, if not completely, spent. Nor is there, I suppose, the shadow of a doubt in anybody's mind that the pulpit to-day is not what it used to be. Books are written to explain "The Decay of Modern Preaching," lectures are delivered to suggest "Reforms needed in the Pulpit." A modern newspaper—so I have read—declared not long ago that to compare the pulpit with the press was like comparing "the faint glimmer of the glow-worm with the brilliancy of the meridian sun." And these words, though loaded with true newspaper self-assertiveness, express fitly enough a certain Philistine view of the matter which is not at all uncommon. The claim is not simply that other institutions have grown up around and finally overshadowed the pulpit, but that the pulpit itself has gradually declined in power; that the day of great preachers has gone by; and that the ministry, as a profession, will never recover the vast amount of influence it has lost.

Certainly, there is on the surface a great deal of truth in these claims. If we look back into the past for an instant, we find the pulpit wielding an influence such as seems almost incomprehensible to-day. Look at the Middle Ages, for instance. What power the preacher in those days possessed! Take, for example, the monk, Bernard of Clairvaux, who preached the Second Crusade. What tales history relates of his influence! He addressed parliaments and mass-meetings from a lofty pulpit. Such was his eloquence and fervid enthusiasm for his cause that multitudes followed him, ready to do his slightest bidding. He raised armies and depopulated cities, "so that the only people left in them were widows and orphans whose husbands and fathers were still living."

The case of Anthony of Padua is still more to the point. The stories told of him seem almost incredible. His rare powers as a preacher caused him to be sent on continuous missions throughout Italy. Whenever he was to preach, the church was crowded before daybreak, and whole multitudes were unable to gain entrance: shops were closed, thoroughfares deserted, all pleasures and duties given up; and so great did the throng often become that the preacher was obliged to leave the church and hold his meeting in the open air. "Nor," it is said, "were the effects less striking,—Italian hatreds reconciled; men that had prepared the stiletto for an enemy hurrying into his embrace, a forgiving and forgiving friend; women laying off their ornaments and selling them for the benefit of the poor; old, hardened sinners brought to immediate confession."

All this was at a time when the power of the Church of Rome was unquestioned. Then came the Reformation. But the Reformation tended, if anything, to increase the activity and power of the pulpit. Certainly, it made preaching more prominent than it had been. The prophet came into the foreground, as the functions of the priest were neglected. We all know what influence Luther himself had over the populace as a preacher. Many of the best minds of Germany, in those and later days, uttered their soul-lifting thoughts from the pulpit. Schleiermacher, the world-celebrated philosopher, did; and so did Fichte and Herder, not to mention many another. But we need not go back so far as this even, for a standard of comparison, in order to measure the insignificance of the modern pulpit. Consider how things stood among our Puritan ancestors here in New England. Even so recently as at the beginning of our own century we find the pulpit the centre of the learning and enlightenment of the community. The best minds sought it, and crowned it with their varied genius. Its word was law in matters social, political, religious. The minister was the learned man. People sought him not only for advice and consolation, but for information on all erudite matters. We feel ready to smile when we recollect all this, and reflect how little inclined we should be to-day to refer in the same way to the modern successor of the Puritan divine. Some faint suggestions of this singular deference to the pulpit remain; but they are such, we are told, as to do little more than throw into relief its present insignificance against the background of its former supremacy over all things.

Now, while I think that there is a good deal of exaggeration about this matter, I yet want you to consider with me what some of the causes are of this marked and sudden decay,—to see whether they are such as to have permanently affected its usefulness, and, if not, to measure its worth as a modern instrument of reform. I shall try to look at the matter as far as possible from the outside and impartially.

Doubtless, every one will give as an explanation of the comparative insignificance of the pulpit nowadays the fact that, far from any longer having a monopoly of the best minds, it does not even have its fair share of intellectual power. The ablest men at present find a more congenial field for their talents in the practice of law or of medicine. Science, too, and literature in one form or another, attract them. The new discoveries in the line of electricity alone have opened a vast field where men can not only earn for themselves a living, but at the same time exercise, and find worthy employment for, their mental faculties. The press, too, is absorbing many of our able men. Those who once would have gone to the pulpit as a sort of introduction into the realm of letters now give themselves to journalism.

Still more significant is the fact that men who want to do just the sort of work that the pulpit has always considered a chief part of its duties turn by preference to other mediums of influence. I refer to the work of philanthropy and general social reform, which is becoming almost a profession in itself. It is not an unusual thing to see men who were studying for the ministry turn aside from this intention, in order to throw themselves as lay-workers into practical work among the people. And we have even seen able and well-established ministers deliberately give up their calling, presumably because they felt their influence in political and social reform would be greater as writers and teachers than as ministers.

Thus in all directions we see ability and learning, and even moral enthusiasm, going out into the world to work, and sometimes even to preach, while the pulpit is forced to take unto itself men of inferior and second or third-rate ability. Herein, it is said, lies the explanation for the decline in influence of the pulpit.

Now, while this is, on the face of it, true, it is far from satisfying. It simply refers us to the previous question; and we ask, Why is this? What is the reason that men of genius no longer find a congenial field for the exercise of their abilities in the pulpit? And, especially, why is it that men who are bent on the eminently religious aim of uplifting and purifying humanity should work by preference outside the official centres of religion?

And here we touch upon the second, which is the real and underlying reason for the waning power of the pulpit,—the prevalence of the spirit of scepticism. The ablest men to-day, the men who are the deepest thinkers, are tortured by doubts. And these doubts torment them most just at that age when the incubus rests upon them of deciding for themselves what to do in life. How can they enter a profession where faith in certain fundamental beliefs is not so much demanded as presupposed? Has not belief in these dogmas, if not discredited, at least been made difficult by science? Does not philosophy find them hard to prove? And even the champions of religion itself, by their frank statements of unbelief in certain things once deemed essential,—have they not helped to undermine their own influence?

For, mark you, this spirit of scepticism works in two ways to detract from the pulpit's powers. Not only does it act as a barrier, frightening away those whose sentiments predispose them to its work, but it stands like a great impenetrable wall in front of those who have felt within themselves faith enough to enter upon this work. The scepticism which is too weak for lack of faith to mount the pulpit steps often sits complacently in the pews beneath. Consciously or unconsciously, the modern religious congregation is critical, and finds itself dissenting from the utterance of the preacher. Or, if not actual dissent, there is questioning doubt. All this the pulpit has to take account of and meet. And, in doing this, it signs in a sense its own death warrant. For the preacher who cannot speak with authority, who cannot assert without fear of contradiction, who cannot plant his feet upon certain fundamental faiths and feel secure, who cannot utter his ringing "Thus saith the Lord," lacks the first element that should give him power. The founts that feed enthusiasm are not sending their life-streams through him. He finds himself apologizing when he ought to dictate, and arguing when he ought to uplift. Not thus did the preacher formerly wield his gigantic influence. He came as from another sphere, with the seal of authority stamped upon his brow. He spoke that which he knew, and "testified of that he had seen." He was recognized as one who lived in another realm of thought, and had spiritualized himself by dwelling amid higher and purer influences. Hence his authority. He was commissioned from on high, and spoke, it was felt, with the divine sanction. It is said of Jesus that the people heard him gladly, and were astonished at his teaching, "because he taught them as one having authority." The pulpit, therefore, has lost much of its power because, in a sceptical, doubting age, it fears to assume and assert certain things as true; and, if it does so assert, it is accused of being blindly dogmatic, uneducated, and unacquainted with modern doubt. Nor is there any much greater disgrace nowadays than to be "behind the times."

Attention might be called to other causes which are weakening the pulpit. One significant and wide-reaching cause is the meagreness and sterility of its message. It does not utter the truth first hand, but gives worn-out restatements of it. The early heralds of Christianity had a gospel that was new, startling, and adapted to the needs of the time. The Church to-day is still harping, not on the same gospel, but more often on some insignificant by-words of that gospel. The custom of taking texts from the Bible is carried so far that the most artificial meanings are extracted from trivial and senseless expressions. And so it happens that the message of the Church to-day is too seldom adapted to the needs of the day. It deals with dead, not living subjects, and tries to palm off the worn-out thought of the first century on the intelligence of the nineteenth. The pulpit, in many instances, is afraid openly to attack living evils, and considers it oftentimes impolitic to treat in a frank and determined spirit vital political and social abuses. In more than one of our theological seminaries the students are warned against bringing politics into the pulpit. Thus does the pulpit confess its own weakness, and acknowledge its undeniable decay.

But it is time for us to turn to the more important side of our subject. Are these causes which have led to the decline of the pulpit such as have permanently and fatally affected it, or has it a definite and important function still, which will keep it a necessary and absolutely indispensable institution in society?

Now I think we can best understand the real power and usefulness of the pulpit as a modern institution by considering how ephemeral the causes are which have contributed to its decline. Take the spirit of scepticism, which has seemed to us the underlying reason for the present weakness of the pulpit. No one, I suppose, would think that a permanent condition of things. He must read history blindfolded who does not know that ages of doubt are succeeded by ages of faith, and ever have been since the world began. Nay, it is out of these very world-moods of doubt that the glories of faith have been born. And I think that even now we can see the first signs of a coming day when faith shall once again sustain men's souls. We are wearying of questioning; and, after all our questions, we are beginning to see that certain ideas remain as deep-rooted in the hearts and consciences of humanity as they ever were.

Yet, even without any return to so-called religious faith, it appears to me that the pulpit can easily maintain itself, and continue to wield a power in society. The authority which it must have and the enthusiasm to inspire it are born not of religious, but of moral faith. On the fundamental facts of the moral life the preacher can plant himself, and he will thus have beneath his feet the foothold that he needs and the support he requires. For, whatever else is assailed, the great landmarks of the moral life rise high above all theological disputes and philosophic doubts. They are unassailed. The reasons for leading a moral life may be argued about, and the old-fashioned terrors for enforcing it may be discarded; but the fact of the beauty of such a life,—the beauty of holiness, no one can doubt. Neither can the laws which enforce justice and honesty and purity be denied. If a man's own conscience does not tell him of these laws, then the conscience of the community, as it is embodied in its officials, forcibly reminds him that there is such a thing as right and wrong. Here, then, on the basis of morality the modern pulpit can establish itself, and, resting secure, regain something of the authority and the influence it has lost. The greatest pulpit orators of every age have been the men who preached pure morality. The old Hebrew prophets were preachers of righteousness. Amos came up to the pleasure-drunken city of Samaria from his home in the country almost three thousand years ago, and assailed the luxury, the frivolity and idleness, the vice and treachery and deceit, that he found revelling in the palace there. And his whole message was contained in the injunction, Repent and mend your ways; for in this world—ay, here, in this very life—iniquity is punished and viciousness is judged. Isaiah,—both Isaiahs preached the same moral message. So did Jeremiah and Hosea and Jonah, and, to a great extent, Jesus also. The message of Jesus was in large degree a purely moral one. His stinging rebukes were not against unbelief, but against hypocrisy and pride and selfishness. And look at how it is in our days also. Take, for instance, that little body of men who, in the name of Ethical Culture pure and simple, are exerting such an influence. They are led by a man who is, perhaps, the greatest of modern preachers, and who transfigures the platform till it becomes more than many a pulpit. Wherein lies the power and whence comes the authority of these men but from the fact that they have planted themselves, one and all, on the bed-rock of the moral life? And that they do speak with authority—with far greater authority than many men who have behind them the weight of dogmas and of churchly influence—we all know.

Here, then, in an age of scepticism is the authority to be found which the pulpit needs. And, having this, can it not—nay, does it not—rest secure? It alone, of all the institutions that exist, stands in the midst of wavering and weak, sinful and suffering men and women, for the eternalness of right and for the power of what is good.

And, when the pulpit comes—as there are signs that it soon will come—to rest openly upon this moral basis, the two other causes which have contributed to its partial decay will be swept aside. The fact that a man has doubts upon certain dogmatical points will no longer prevent his entering the ranks of the preacher. The simple fact of his moral earnestness, and his desire to inspire others with a longing for the higher life, coupled with ability for this work, will sufficiently ordain him. Intellect, then, will no longer feel repelled, and confess itself obliged, for conscientious reasons, to work elsewhere. This very conscientiousness shall be the confession of faith. We may look confidently for the time, therefore, when the pulpit shall once more attract genius and culture and manly courage to itself.

And so, too, will that other shameful weakness of the modern pulpit be done away which consists in a threadbare gospel. It will have a message full of life, and adapted to the present needs. It will overturn once more the tables of the money-changers in the great temple of civilization, and will drive out the human cattle who are bought and sold for gold, saying, "Make not this world of God's a mere place of merchandise, where the passions of the beast are to be indulged!" It will raise its voice above the loud disputes of employer and employed, declaring that justice must be done and humanity made to prevail. There is injustice abroad,—treachery, high-handedness, base operations carried on for gold, that enrich one class while they drive the other on the brink of starvation into riotous acts. It is unnecessary to go outside of Massachusetts to find rich corporations that covertly reduce wages by increase of work, and deliberately try to evade the acts of the legislature that have been passed to prevent such methods. It is for the pulpit to speak out in no uncertain tone against such things, and to declare in the very name of the Eternal that righteousness must exalt the nation and the business of the nation. Thus it will help establish a new social science in place of the old, which, though so long accepted, "is nothing but the science of making money for the upper classes."

But it has other functions, peculiar to itself, which render it forever and intrinsically powerful. It deals, for instance, with mystery; and mystery is ever-abiding. There is, first of all, the great world mystery, out of which we are born, in which we live, and into which we shall return. "This ultimate mystery," says John Fiske,—"and all science bows assent,—we shall never be able to comprehend. Here Science must ever pause, acknowledging herself baffled; and here Religion must ever hold sway."

"We cannot learn the cipher
That's writ upon our cell.
Stars taunt us by a mystery
Which we could never spell."

Yet this mystery is not far off, and so of no practical interest. It touches us at every turn in daily life. Birth, death, even the constant workings of the brain that we call thought, are but other names for it. Suffering, too, and the moral graces, are all born out of it. Thus on all sides, whichever way we turn, the mysterious taunts and tantalizes us. Nor are we content to sit down as upon the edge of some vast sea, and let the waves roll up along the beach. Strangely enough, the roar of the surf tempts us to embark. There is no one of us here so timid as a mariner that he has not time and time again launched his little ship of thought on this vast sea of mystery, and tried to find soundings or make observations that shall tell him where he is.

The pulpit is supposed to be peculiarly acquainted with these attempts, and to aid the natural longing of the soul to find its bearings and be at peace. It would interpret all life's mysteries from the highest point of view; it would offer explanations, solutions,—if you call them that,—not necessarily its own, but such as suffering and sorrow-worn human beings have found consolation in for ages upon ages. Its function is the perfectly legitimate and unquestionably useful one of offering helpful and rational interpretations of things which, being forever shadowed in mystery, no one can fully understand. Nor can it be doubted that people will always feel the need of an institution that will do this.

But, again, a still more important prerogative peculiarly the pulpit's is to uplift. And I say uplift rather than instruct, for there is a great deal of misconception upon just this point. Many people claim that the pulpit is becoming obsolete, and that its work is no longer needed, because knowledge is spread abroad so generously by newspapers and periodicals and books. The Sunday newspaper is left upon the doorstep, and many people feel that they find within its closely printed score and more of pages a fit substitute for hymns and prayers and not over-brilliant sermons. There is more information, it is said, stowed away in one such paper than you would find in ten times as many average sermons. And the statement is, doubtless, true. But the fact does nothing to detract from the dignity and value of the pulpit, which aims to impart not knowledge, but the consciousness of how little we know; not information so much as inspiration. Not long ago I heard of a man remarking that he no longer went to church because the minister (an unusually profound thinker, by the way) had nothing more to teach him. He had sat under him for many years, and knew just what he thought on all the most important subjects. Now that man had a wholly perverted notion of what he should go to church for. Why, you do not go to church—none of you go, primarily—to learn something. There are few of you who could not take down more than one book from your shelves on a Sunday morning in which you would find deeper thoughts, and thoughts showing wider learning, than any average sermon is likely to contain. And that is true even of those who go to hear the very greatest of living preachers. But you come to be uplifted; and the church, with its very atmosphere and associations, uplifts as no book read in an easy-chair at home can hope to do. Here, inevitably, we touch upon that mystery of which I spoke just a moment ago. In that touch merely there is exaltation. I know not how it is with you; but, for myself, I know that the mere recognition of this eternal mystery awes and uplifts me, and makes me feel more deeply the dignity of life and its solemn duties. Even if at that moment I cannot find any very firm faith to cling to in the midst of it all, still just the thought of what a helpless child one is amid the great play of cosmic forces makes me love more deeply, makes me more unselfish with those I do love, more conscientious and scrupulously just in all of life's relationships, and more eager to do in every respect my share in the great work of the world.

Because, therefore, the pulpit is founded on the undying truth of the moral life, because its peculiar province is the mystery of mysteries that ever baffles yet attracts us, because it aims definitely and earnestly to uplift men in a world where there is so much to drag them down, it supplies a need that is clearly felt, and that no other institution can supply. The power of the press may increase a thousand-fold; other centres for reform may be multiplied indefinitely; yet they cannot, in the very nature of things, do the work or take the place of the pulpit, which is still supreme in its own especial field. Nor was Cowper far from right when he declared,—

"The pulpit (in the sober use Of its legitimate, peculiar powers)
Must stand acknowledged, whilst the world shall stand,
The most important and effectual guard,
Support, and ornament of virtue's cause."

THE CHRISTIAN UNITARIAN POSITION, DOCTRINAL.

BY JOHN HAMILTON THOM.

"Is Christ divided?"—1 COR. I. 13.

Our Christian belief is that there was one man whom, through the entirety of his being, God filled with his Spirit, and who, because there is no spiritual element in the Father that has not its representative in him, exhausting the power of our earthly humanity to receive and convey the divine likeness, is the son and the image of God. And our Christian doctrine is that, so believing, we are bound to accept this as the normal condition of human nature, as the law of the spirit of life for each one of us. Salvation is to be in a state of spiritual health or wholeness. The Saviour who makes us whole is he who has shown us what that spiritual completeness is. This is, in its essence, the whole Christian religion,—to see in the person of Christ all that in this world human eyes can see, human obedience can embody, of the harmonized image of God; to see in the person of Christ the end of God in mortal humanity, the type of being he is seeking here to develop in every child he has. This is to exhaust the meaning of the two great titles which define his relations on the divine and the human side of his being,—Son of God, as showing all of the Father's spirit that human nature when most filial is here capable of receiving; Son of man, as the normal result and product, the spiritual development of "what is in man." God has no spiritual glory that is not imaged in "his holy Child": humanity has no spiritual germ that is not developed in its Saviour, in him who made it whole.

It is usual to have it ascribed to us that ours is a negative Christianity. They who speak thus speak in rashness and in ignorance. Is God manifest in the flesh a negative confession of Christian faith? Is the Word made flesh and dwelling among us recognized as the normal condition of human nature, a negative profession of Christian duty?

Christ is the Head of the Church because we see in him the fulness of God in man, which by his attraction and help each soul is striving to draw within itself,—the aim at which every Christian heart is gazing. And, again, the Church is the body of Christ, because, each of us being imperfect, no one of us being more than, as it were, a single member—an eye, an arm, a hand—of that spiritual body, only the united graces and action of the whole can represent the separate elements of the fulness that dwelt in him.

Our Christian profession, then,—the end and aim of our faith in Christ,—is to grow in the likeness of God through the aid and attraction of that Son of his in whom, by the gift of his grace, we have the fulness of his image in human nature. According to the Scriptures, to look on Christ as "the Image of the invisible God"; and to look upon humanity as "complete in Christ,"—this is our Christian doctrine. To strive after this in the single and solitary life of our spirits, to co-operate in this as children of one Father,—this is our Christian life.

I shall be told that this is the end and aim of all Christian churches,—that this is no peculiarity of ours, that never did a Christian church exist that would not define and find its central life in the purpose to develop in human nature the image of God given to us in the Man Christ Jesus. This is so. Christ is not divided. This is the common ground of Christian union. All Christendom agrees in this, that God reveals his Son in us in order that in each soul of man the same image of the Father may come into full lineament and life. This is no peculiarity of ours: in this we are differenced from no other Christian church, and no other Christian church is differenced from us. What, then, is our peculiarity? This simply: that we take this, this ground on which we do not differ from the rest of Christendom, for the whole of the Christian peculiarity; that we suffer nothing more than this to enter into the definition of Christianity, or into the constitution of a Christian church. Our peculiarity is this: that, taking it as our aim to grow in the likeness of God after the image of himself he has given us in the Man Christ Jesus, we pursue that aim under the conditions of absolute liberty as to the views of God and of his providence that may individually commend themselves to us, and by means of simple allegiance to our own convictions of truth as God may show it to us,—our object, the image of God, to have Christ formed within us; the conditions, freedom to receive fresh help and light from the Source of all grace and knowledge; the means, personal fidelity to the measure of light given to each of us. Now, all Christian churches agree with us in our object, the reproduction in each of the image of God as Christ has shown it to us; and all real members of those churches agree with us as to the means,—personal fidelity to truth, to our best conceptions of God and of his relations to human nature. But we stand alone as to the individual mental conditions under which this aim is to be pursued, these means employed,—absolute liberty; a liberty never shortened, never bound, never closed, to receive whatever fresh light God may give us, and to expect new light forever upon his Being, his providence, his grace, his methods of applying that grace, his personal relations to the human spirit, the mysteries of his infinite nature. Upon these subjects we dare make no articles of religion: in these directions we dare not define the manifold immensity of God. To believe that God is the Father of every human spirit, and that Jesus Christ is the pattern of our divine destiny up to the entrance on heavenly life,—we dare make nothing else essential to our Christianity. Other churches, recognizing the same object, employing the same means, may grow in the Christian life, though in all other respects their views of the theory of religion are different from ours; but, if they grow, it is because they do employ the same means,—fidelity of confession and of life to their own perceptions of God. The only soul that is cut off from God is one that does not live in its own truth, that disguises or conceals its own discernments. You can have no personal vision through another man's eyes. You can have no living communication with God through a faith that is not your own. You may close the organs of sight, and live upon testimony as to the glories of the skies, and the richness of color, and the wonders of the earth; but in so far you cease to be an independent witness: you have no testimony of your own to give. The only soul that is disabled from witnessing to the manifold grace of God, that is disabled for bearing its part in the Church by reflecting its own ray of the infinite light, is the soul that conceals or disguises the revelation of God made to itself,—that hides the portion given to it of the illimitable glory of the Father, by substituting or outwardly accepting formulas of men not true to inward insight for the living communication of the individual soul with the eternal Spirit. We are all of us imperfect mirrors of the Father's brightness: the fulness of his presence in Christ is caught by none of us. Therefore, as the self-same Spirit divides to every man

At first sight this seems like an ordinary Sideboard. But wait a little.

Never before have we designed a Board with oval ends. Never before have we employed the swelling, or bombe, base. Never before have we introduced the deep drawer, which was an interesting feature in the Colonial Dressers of one hundred and fifty years ago.

severally as he will, no soul has a right to distort itself, to defraud the Church, to hide the glory of God, to mar the countenance of the Lord, by bearing no witness, or by bearing false witness to its own "manifestation of the Spirit."

Personal fidelity, in profession and in practice, to our existing perceptions of truth, and an ever open door for God to come in,—these, recognized as the privilege and the duty of every soul that has personal relations with an infinite Spirit, are all that could be required to keep Christ from being "divided," to unite the whole Christian Church in a helpful and converging progress toward that one end and goal which, according to the apostle, the Father hath predestined for us all,—“to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the first born among many brethren.”

NEW YORK LETTER.

Simultaneously with the obituary notices of Mr. Ward McAllister, appeared the annual report of the University Settlement Society of New York. The former gave an account of the life of a man who had made a business of pleasure, and who had lived to establish what Thackeray liked to call "the diabolical invention of gentility." The latter was a record of the voluntary abnegation by educated and refined men and women of many of the things that Mr. McAllister most prized, in order that they might help the poor to have a chance to make their lives more enjoyable and their environment more elevating. Far apart as are these aims, no one seems to have exclaimed, "Who can be patient in such extremes!" Appreciative words have been said of the self-assumed function of New York's famous society leader, who, according to all his kindly critics, was a modest, retiring, kind-hearted gentleman, of infinite tact, who gossiped brilliantly, but never maliciously; while the report of the University Settlement has received the editorial commendation of our best newspapers, all of which have urged a more generous financial support to enable the society to carry on its noble work.

One of the most significant remarks in the report above referred to is made in its introduction by the president of the society, Hon. Seth Low. It is to the effect that the laboring man and the educated rich man know very little about each other, and that out of this mutual ignorance is bred a mutual suspicion and distrust. In this unsympathetic attitude toward each other is to be found one of the chief causes of labor difficulties,—one that will be removed only by an actual acquaintance of the two classes with each other, such as the University Settlement makes possible. The work of the Settlements has demonstrated the great practical value of a larger force of workers among the masses who are thoroughly trained in political economy and sociology. In this kind of training Columbia College, since Prof. Giddings has filled the chair of sociology, is taking a leading part; and now, within a few days, the dean of Barnard, the only college for women in this city, has announced to its board of trustees that an unnamed friend has made a munificent proposal to extend the advantages of the studies in political and social science.

Barnard has a helpful friend and supporter in the club which bears its name, and which has other distinguishing qualities. Its membership is open to men and women, and husband and wife pay but one initiation fee and one annual due between them. So that, literally, in the membership of the club, "the twain are one." The meetings of the club are social rather than literary, and constitute a kind of "clearing-house" where busy people can see many friends at one time, thus saving themselves the trouble of house-to-house calls. Tea only is served. The club has just taken possession of its new quarters in Carnegie Music Hall Building; and they consist of a library, tea, and committee rooms. The decorations and furnishings of these apartments are largely the handiwork of the members; for, so generous have been the gifts of the club to its protégé, the college, that funds were lacking for the purpose of fitting up its new home. The aim and the simplicity of the Barnard Club are equally unique and praiseworthy.

Pleasure-loving New Yorkers are just now enjoying the versatility of Mr. Beerbohm Tree, the English actor, who, with his gifted wife, is at Abbey's Theatre. Mr. Tree has unusual power in rôles so widely differing in character and make-up that one cannot believe, without looking at the programme, that both have been taken by the same person. This means, of course, that the mannerisms which always betray Mr. Henry Irving in every rôle he acts are lacking in Mr. Tree. To be within the hour the ballad-monger, Gringoire,—a fair-haired, long, lean, tattered, starved, restless "somebody or odd-body," to use the words of the play,—and then the portly, white-haired, magenta-faced, suspicious, crafty, scheming Russian Chief of Police, was a remarkable triumph in mental and physical metamorphosis. The ease with which Mr. Tree performed this feat was enthusiastically recognized by his large audience. How irresistible the theatre seems to be to all classes of Americans! A dozen years ago Matthew Arnold owned that this was true of Englishmen in their own country. Then London had forty play-houses. New York has to-day forty-two theatres and opera-houses, besides her ten music-halls; and all are nearly always thronged at every performance.

But throngs of people gather as well in New York churches. Dr. Parkhurst's congregations cannot be seated in his church. Men and women stand patiently through a service which frequently, if not always, lasts one hour and three-quarters. Dr. Parkhurst's strong individuality, which has made him so great a power in the reform work that he is doing, is plainly seen also in his pulpit utterances. In a recent sermon he instructed his hearers that the fundamental doctrines of religion do not depend upon the portions of Scripture which have been disproved by the revelations of science. He used the book of Genesis as an illustration of his remark.

The beloved and venerated Dr. Furness of Philadelphia preached to a large congregation last Sunday in All Souls' Church. Friends from Yonkers, Brooklyn, and the other New York Unitarian churches were present to greet him. They were rewarded by hearing one of Dr. Furness's most characteristic and instructive sermons on "The Jesus of the Gospels." It was delivered with perfect clearness and with marked vigor. In the evening All Souls' was again open for one of a series of musical services which have been in progress during the winter, and which have proved successful and enjoyable. The attendance at them has increased from twenty to about two hundred at the last service. Midway in the programme a short address is given, either by Rev. Theodore C. Williams or by his assistant, Rev. Frederick J. Gauld.

The Lenox Avenue Church recently held its annual meeting; and, of the reports rendered by the secretaries of its many activities,—which include a Choral Club, a Working-girls' Club, an Emerson Club, a Men's Club, a King's Daughter Society, a Gymnasium Association, a Branch Alliance, and a Ladies' Aid Society,—none told of greater success than that of the Ladies' Aid Society. Its thirty-eight members have given an annual society dinner, a dramatic entertainment, a June festival, and a November fair. They raised, including a small balance from last year, $1,744.43, of which sum they contributed $200 toward the church debt and $1,200 toward the church expenses.

On Friday, February 1, the New York League of Unitarian Women met at the First Unitarian Church in Brooklyn. Since its last meeting there a year ago the church edifice has been beautified by some fine stained-glass memorial windows. Five are now in place, and a sixth is soon to be added. "Storied windows, richly dight," have the same charm to many as the "monastic aisles" to Emerson in his famous poem. What enjoyment must be theirs who sit Sunday after Sunday in the mellowed light which now streams into the Church of the Saviour!

The programme of the League consisted of three papers on "The Training of Children," by Mrs. Katherine S. B. Dunn, Mrs. G. W. Winterburn, Miss Marie A. Jadwin, respectively. The topics were arranged as follows: (1) "How shall we encourage a High Standard of Moral and Mental Integrity?" (2) "Influence of City and Country Life," (3) "College Life for Boys and Girls." For this admirable arrangement of the subject the League was indebted to the late Mrs. James D. Smillie, one of its officers, and one of its most earnest workers and trusted counsellors, whose death had occurred suddenly on the Sunday preceding the meeting. This tragic event gave a deeply pathetic interest to the proceedings of the day, for Mrs. Smillie was herself to have given one of the papers. Every member of the League was her friend, and there was heartfelt assent to the resolutions tributary to her memory read by Miss Emma C. Low. They are as follows:

Resolved, That in the death of Mrs. James D. Smillie the New York League of Unitarian Women has lost one of its most valued members, who had served in its Executive Board for five years.

Resolved, That her clear mind, her practical qualities, the courage, strength, and repose of her character, made her a most helpful worker and a safe leader.

Resolved, That her absolute integrity and her sincerity of purpose made her counsel a power wherever she was known, and that our League will greatly miss her gentle dignity and beautiful presence.

Resolved, That a minute of these resolutions be made in the League record, and a copy of them sent to her bereaved husband.

MAXIMILIAN AND CARLOTTA.*

No two figures in the history of modern royalty are surrounded with a more tender, pathetic, and tragic interest than those of Maximilian and Carlotta. It has been the good fortune of the United States to be separated from the continent of Europe by the vast ocean, which has helped to keep it aloof from the political embroilments of the Old World; and it had been fortunate for the ill-fated Maximilian if he had never crossed that ocean to mingle in the controversies which threatened the existence of this republic. At the outbreak of the war both England and France engaged to maintain strict neutrality. This declaration was soon compromised by the treaty providing for the intervention in Mexico. Formally and legally, this was not overt. It was simply a side-thrust to accomplish by indirection what could not have been done without involving the United States in a war with England and France. The apologists of Napoleon have seriously assumed the benevolent intentions of that unfortunate monarch. It was wholly a benevolent enterprise for the regeneration of Mexico. Napoleon believed, and the government of England also, in the final success of the South. Otherwise Napoleon would not have been insane enough to attempt the innovation. Maximilian was a tool in his hands. But Mr. Taylor contends that, not without his own impressions, and not without ample warning of the probable consequences of his enterprise, he from first to last acted with full knowledge of the problems and risk his acceptance would involve. The story of the entrance of Maximilian and Carlotta into Mexico, their part in the government, is told with an interest which hardly fails of being sympathetic, though one can discern in Mr. Taylor's narrative the shadow of tragic events; for Sherman had begun his historical march to the sea when the emperor and empress were welcomed to the ancient city. Thrice the emperor's hand refused to sign the "Black Decree" which treated the republican troops of Mexico as outlaws, and sentenced them to die as highwaymen. It was this wicked decree which reacted upon Maximilian himself, and excluded him finally from all mercy.

Mr. Seward had not failed to inform the French government of the objection of this government to intervention. The United States could not do more at that time, but immediately after the close of the war the subject was taken up by Mr. Seward. The emperor of France was invited to relieve the situation without delay. The United States refused to recognize any government in Mexico but the ancient republic; and Mr. Seward stated with a distinctness altogether void of ambiguity that the presence of armies in Mexico, maintaining a foreign prince with ample troops sent against our will, was deemed dangerous, not alone to the United States, but also to all the independent and southern republican States found on the American continent and its adjacent islands. Napoleon agreed to withdraw the troops; and, to make it easier for him to do so, it was agreed that they should be withdrawn in detachments. His attempt to postpone the departure of the first detachment of French in November, 1866, until the next spring brought forth a peremptory demand from Mr. Seward, which Mr. Taylor describes as the words of a soldier rather than those of a diplomat. These words are so memorable that we quote them in full:—

"The emperor's decision to modify the existing arrangement without any understanding with the United States, so as to leave the whole French army in Mexico for the present instead of withdrawing one detachment in November current, as promised, is now found in every way inconvenient and exceptionable. We cannot acquiesce: first, because the term 'next spring,' as appointed for the entire evacuation, is indefinite and vague; and, second, because we have no authority for stating to Congress and to the American people that we have now a better guarantee for the withdrawal of the whole expeditionary force in the spring than we have heretofore had for the withdrawal of a part in November; third, in full reliance upon at least a literal performance of the emperor's existing agreement, we have taken measures, while facilitating the anticipated French evacuation, to co-operate with the republican government of Mexico for promoting the pacification of that country, and for the early and complete restoration of the proper constitutional authority of that government. The President sincerely hopes and expects that the evacuation of Mexico will be carried into effect with such conformity to the existing agreement as the inopportune complication which calls for this despatch shall allow. Instructions will be issued to the United States military forces of observation to await in every case special directions from the President. This will be done with a confident expectation that the telegraph or the mail may seasonably bring us a satisfactory resolution from the emperor in reply to this note."

The pitiful appeals of Carlotta to Napoleon were useless. He was sane enough to know that further support of Maximilian would be insane. That hero was doomed. The closing events in his tragic career form a pathetic recital. But through it all Maximilian stands out as a heroic figure, in sad contrast to the man in France whose victim he became.

Mr. Taylor has performed a difficult task with wisdom and justice. He has saluted the qualities of humanity, courage, and

RECLAIMED FROM DEATH.

The Terror of Man Thwarted.

In the Grasp of that Dread Disease, Consumption.—Life Given Back.—Almost Miraculous.

Fortunately, perhaps, the Consumptive does not realize his own condition. His is a disease of continual waste until he meets a death that is in reality one of starvation.

It is now generally conceded that this disease is incurable,—that is, by any known medicine. Change of climate, or some life-infusing food that will give new flesh, blood, and strength, and induce the various organs of the body to assume their normal functions,—this is the only hope.

The only way to do this effectually is to give the patient Bovinine, that great raw food product, the greatest concentration of the life-giving elements of raw beef known to modern science. In this connection the results obtained by Dr. J. H. Head of Atlanta, Ga., in the treatment of a case of consumption, are interesting.

Dr. Head relates briefly how a man about thirty-five years of age came to him for treatment. He had lost forty pounds in weight in six months; he suffered with a bad cough and experienced severe night sweats; he was unable to do any work; most of his family had died of consumption, and on examination his right lung was found to be seriously affected, and as the doctor remarked, "He was in a good way to have an early funeral."

But note what happened. He was given Bovinine. In two weeks he had gained seven pounds, his appetite had returned, he was able to do a good day's work, and most of the distressing symptoms had vanished; and at the time of writing the doctor felt sure of a complete cure.

This is but one of many similar cases. Bovinine will give new life and strength, make new blood and flesh, stop waste, ward off disease, and turn the current of life's river again into its natural channel. Give it one trial while there is yet hope.

virtue in the royal lives of Maximilian and Carlotta; and he has told the story of the momentous events in the history of this country and Mexico with discriminate candor and dramatic warmth.

CHURCH HYMNAL. Revised and enlarged by Rev. Charles L. Hutchins. Boston: The Parish Choir. — Rev. Charles L. Hutchins has won the appreciation and gratitude of lovers of church music, not only in the Episcopal Church, but in other communions. For, when one does good work in this direction, his influence is sure to be felt throughout the Christian household. Fortunately, there are no creedal lines which shut out hymns and tunes from any room in that household. Guided by fine musical tastes, ample knowledge, and also a respect for the traditions of church music, Mr. Hutchins prepared in 1892-94 a "Church Hymnal," being the collection of hymns set forth by the General Convention of the Episcopal Church in 1892, with music edited by Rev. Charles L. Hutchins, assisted by Mr. Horatio Parker, Professor of Music in Yale University; Mr. Warren Locke, organist of Harvard University; and Mr. Arthur Whiting of Boston. It has been accepted as the musical hymnal of that church. In grateful appreciation of the reception the book has had, this organ edition is issued. It is believed to be the only organ edition of a hymnal ever published in this country. The few books devoted to the Canticles in the smaller book are omitted in this, as the editor hopes to publish an organ edition of his new "Chant and Service Book," which included what is here omitted. The large, clear type is a pleasure to the eye; and this large and beautiful volume will be a welcome friend to the organist.

Miscellaneous.

The "Sixteenth Annual Report of the State Board of Lunacy and Charity" contains much information regarding the various institutions in Massachusetts as well as statistics touching pauperism, insanity, immigration, etc. The summary of recommendations presents a dozen needs which require legislative action.

Dr. Spencer Trotter, Professor of Biology in Swarthmore College, publishes a little book entitled "Lessons in the New Geography." He writes from a realization of the truth that, to give a child ideas of real things, it is necessary to appeal to the imagination. In proportion as a study stimulates the imaginative faculty does it create availing interest.

Ferdinand A. Wyman of the Suffolk County (Massachusetts) bar has put together a little book, "United States Income Tax Law," intended to be useful to business men. All the information one needs in regard to the requirements, exemptions, and penalties of the law, as well as the history of income tax in different countries, is here simplified and easily found.

"Vick's Floral Guide for 1895" is almost as attractive as the magazines. The colored plates, especially the one on the cover, are charming; and the long illustrated lists of floral and vegetable possibilities make one long for springtime and garden experiments. It will be good to see again the tender lettuce, the crisp radishes, the brilliant nasturtiums, and the delightful sweet-peas of last summer raised from Vick's seeds. In addition to the usual varieties, there are many new chrysanthemums, dahlias, carnations, and asters, as well as foliage and show plants. The vegetable catalogue suggests a country fair.

The Magazines.

The Philadelphia Society for Ethical Culture has undertaken the publication of the Cause, a little monthly paper dedicated to moral progress and the interests of the society. The first number contains interesting notes and announcements bearing on the general work; a report of an ethical movement just started in Kensington, a manufacturing district; and notes from the societies in New York, Chicago, St. Louis, London, and Berlin.

The New World.—The following committee has been appointed by Hon. George F. Hoar, president of the National Conference, on the endowment and current support of the New World. The committee was appointed by authority of the Conference, and had the power to add to their number: Mr. Edwin B. Haskell, Newton, Mass.; Prof. James B. Thayer, Cambridge, Mass.; Mr. Francis C. Lowell, Boston, Mass.; Mr. George O. Shattuck, Boston, Mass.; Mr. John Mason Little, Boston, Mass.; Rev. William H. Lyon, Boston, Mass.; Mrs. Sarah E. Hooper, Boston, Mass.; Miss Helen Collamore, Boston, Mass.; Miss Annette P. Rogers, Boston, Mass.; Mrs. M. L. Clarke, Cambridge, Mass.; Rev. John P. Forbes, Taunton, Mass.; Mr. Alfred Stone, Providence, R.I.; Rev. A. S. Garver, Worcester, Mass.; Rev. S. A. Eliot, Brooklyn, N.Y.; Mr. Enoch Lewis, Philadelphia, Pa.; Mr. Enoch Pratt, Baltimore, Md.; Rev. T. R. Slicer, Buffalo, N.Y.; Rev. John Snyder, St. Louis, Mo.; Prof. C. C. Everett, Cambridge, Mass.; Rev. N. P. Gilman, Boston, Mass.

Literary Notes.

Rev. Samuel J. Barrows, the editor of the Christian Register, contributes a paper to the February Arena on "Penology in Europe and America." This paper is the result of a year's travel in Europe, completed in the winter of 1893, during which he visited all the representative prisons of England, France, Germany, Italy, Hungary, and Greece. And so it embodies the latest European data on the subject as well as that which is obtainable from American reports.

Hall Caine is a Manxman himself, and hence, probably, the great success of his novel bearing that name. He is about forty-five years old. Photographs indicate that he looks like Shakspeare, and in the forehead this resemblance is striking. He is nervous; and, as he does some of his best work after midnight, it tells on his health. His present ambition is to write a life of Christ. "The Manxman" has broken the record for this year in England. The sale of the book in one month amounted to twenty-five thousand copies. This has never been equalled by any novel since "Lothair."

In Love with Love.

Four Life-Studies. By JAMES H. WEST, Author of "The Complete Life," "Uplifts of Heart and Will," etc. pp. 109.

Contents: 1. Transfigurations; 2. Serenity; 3. True Greatness; 4. Our Other Selves.

[JOHN W. CHADWICK, in the Christian Register.]

There is something singularly fresh and strong in Mr. West's way of putting things. Any one of these studies read at night would sweeten a man's slumber, and waken him in the morning to some better sense of his great opportunity.

[LILIAN WHITING, author of "The World Beautiful," in the Boston Budget.]

"In Love with Love" is a book which must be read to be appreciated. It is one of those gems of spiritual richness, the sufficient value of which the reviewer is powerless to name. It can only be said, in the most abstract manner, that this little volume, by James H. West, author of "The Complete Life," "Uplifts of Heart and Will," and "Visions of Good," as well as numerous poems, is a very little minister carrying very big truths. It is a book which every one should own, for it cannot but make a disciple wherever it finds a reader. Its theme is life, and its animus is love.

PHILIP AND HIS WIFE.

By Mrs. DELAND, author of "John Ward, Preacher," "Sidney," "The Old Garden," "Little Tommy Dove," "The Story of a Child." Fourth Edition. 16mo, $1.25.

"An interesting and absorbing romance. . . Margaret Deland is not only a thoughtful and philosophical student of life; it is not her sole gift to be able to understand character and paint it before our eyes; but she has the power of literary phrase, and her novel is one of those rare creations in our slipshod era of a story as well written as it is interesting."—London Telegraph.

"A book of genuine originality and power."—New York Tribune.

THE STORY OF LAWRENCE GARTHE.

By Mrs. KIRK, author of "The Story of Margaret Kent," "Ciphers," etc. 16mo, $1.25.

"I have had a delightful feast, charming and absorbing from beginning to end. . . It is all fascinating, and the plot is managed so admirably throughout. To say that the conversations were brilliant is mere trite commonplace. Not a word of them can be skipped."—Horace Howard Furness, LL.D.

CŒUR D'ALENE.

A dramatic account of riots in the Cœur d'Alene mines in 1892, with an engaging love-story. By MARY HALLOCK FOOTE, author of "John Bodewin's Testimony," "The Led-Horse Claim," "In Exile," etc. 16mo, $1.25.

"Mrs. Foote ranges through the whole gamut of Rocky Mountain life, and every scene she pictures is drawn with startling vividness; yet still, with the artist's instinct, she idealizes all she touches. Her minuteness of observation and remarkable fidelity to nature, combined with a rare dramatic power and a luminous beauty of style, place Mrs. Foote among the very few of our leading female writers of fiction. . . The movement of the story is rapid, the interest most intense, and the event almost tragic; but the narrative is interspersed with many a scene sparkling with humor and brilliant dialogue."—Books (Denver).

DANVIS FOLKS.

By ROWLAND E. ROBINSON, author of "Vermont," in the American Commonwealth Series. 16mo, $1.25.

"There is a prejudice against dialect stories, because so many have been written for the mere literary effect and in the desire of quaintness through the use of perverted spelling. But when, as in this case, they are the result of a close and loving study of the local peculiarities of a region, they belong to an order of fiction of the best sort. . . As a specimen of the New England dialect of the past, this story is admirable. . . Very pleasant and entertaining reading."—The Churchman (New York).

THE WHITE CROWN, and Other Stories.

By HERBERT D. WARD. 16mo, $1.25.

"Mr. Ward's stories, every one, have the supreme merit of being interesting."—The Churchman (New York).

SWEET CLOVER: A Romance of the White City.

A charming love-story, inwoven with phases of the Great Fair. By CLARA LOUISE BURNHAM, author of "Next Door," "Dr. Latimer," "Miss Bagg's Secretary," etc. Sixth Edition. 16mo, $1.25.

"Mrs. Burnham has laid the scenes of her pleasant, pure-toned romance among the glories of the White City. It is delightful to have them reanimated in such a vivid manner, for their significance and their art are treated with a moral perspective that is not destroyed by too much effusion. . . 'Sweet Clover' is one of the most agreeable tone stories which has appeared for a long time."—Literary World (Boston).

"The sights, sounds, and sentiment of the Columbian Exposition are reproduced here as if by magic."—Public Ledger (Philadelphia).

THE GREAT REFUSAL:

Letters from a Dreamer in Gotham. By PAUL E. MORE. 16mo, $1.00.

"It is in the form of letters, in which the supreme themes of love and religion are dealt with by an inquirer. It will take some study, perhaps, to rightly catch the spirit of these letters, abounding in poetry of the highest quality; but this spirit once caught there is in them a fascination and a charm which will hold the attention of the reader."—Boston Advertiser.

THE CHASE OF SAINT CASTIN, and Other Tales.

By Mrs. CATHERWOOD, author of "The Lady of Fort St. John," "Old Kaskaskia," etc. 16mo, $1.25.

"The special field of Mrs. Catherwood's labors lies far back of the reach of recollection, but she is one of the few writers who can really project themselves into the remote past, and whose sympathies can find in the mustiest of records the palpitating life that most of us can find only in the memory of what we have personally known. To praise her new volume of seven stories, headed by 'The Chase of Saint Castin,' is but to repeat what we have said upon many earlier occasions, for the touch is still delicate and firm, the charm unfailing."—The Dial (Chicago).

THE BELL-RINGER OF ANGEL'S, and Other Stories.

By BRET HARTE. 16mo, $1.25.

"There is something in the writing of Mr. Bret Harte which we find in the writing of no other American author, and no English author either, except Charles Dickens; and that is the power of holding his readers in spite of themselves. . . 'The Bell-ringer of Angel's' exercises the old charm over us."—Mail and Express (New York).

A SWEET SOUL.

BY HELEN BOSTWICK BIRD.

'Tis an old tale of one o'er-faithful heart,
One life's devotion and fond sacrifice,—
The story of a woman early wed,
Loving and well-beloved, who yet had found
No happiness, since on the life she loved
Had fallen a strange and dire fatality.
Whether inheritance from unhappy sires
Or sad remain of fever or remorse,
None knew, but, ever as sleep came to him,
Grim nightmares seized him and distracting dreams
Robbed him of rest, and torture made of night.
Vain all medicinal art, and worse than vain
The victim's striving with o'er-mastering fate.
Flesh failed, and strength, till Death seemed hovering near.

Then to the wife an eager longing came
To fight this evil on its own dark ground;
And so each night, beside him, yielding sleep,
Her lips, bent softly to the slumberer's ear,
Would whisper words of tenderest sympathy,
Phrases of buoyant hope or cheery rhymes
(Shreds from the web some favorite poet wove).
Sometimes she lured him with her gentle voice
To haunts of beauty and to distant lands
 Oft visited in fancy, guiding him,
And visioning to his brain all fairest scenes.

"Love, this is merrie England's sky you see;
Here are the hedge-rows; here are violets;
These green lime-arches where the sparrows build.
Hark, do you hear them scolding,—'Twit and twit';
Now this is Florence,—will you come with me?
See, yonder flows the Arno,—let us watch
Its dimpling silver 'twixt the moonlit banks.
Now the Eternal City! see—the Dome!"

Venice, perchance, came next, or Grecian Isles,
The Golden Horn, Damascus, Ispahan,
Fair Cashmere with its roses, dusky Ind.
So, banished all the horrors of the past,
Fresh would the sleeper wake from restful dreams
(Unconscious all of her dear watchfulness),
And kiss the tired lips, wondering at their white.

But ever as he stronger grew, and moved
Among his peers a man self-poised and proud,
She paled and faded, keeping still her post,
Until at last, one perfumed summer morn,—
"Twas just before the dawning,—her lips failed,
The loving eyes half closed, then brighter grew.
"Why this—why this—dear heart, do you not see?
Love, this is heaven," she murmured, and passed out,
Her face all radiant with its glad surprise,
Into the dawning of the brighter day.

MY FIRST STORE DOLL.

GRANDMOTHER'S STORY.

"When the corn is all cut, if nothing happens to prevent, I shall go to the city for a visit." When my mother said these words, she stood in the front door of the farm-house, bidding my father's cousin good-by. To me she was a very fine lady; and I knew my mother regarded her as above the generality of people, or she would not have opened the best room every day for her to sit in. I opened my eyes in wonder; for my mother was a stay-at-home body, and had never spent a night away from home since I was born, and I was nearly eight years old.

After our guest had gone, I asked mother if she were really going to the city; for I had begun already to have a sinking feeling in my heart at the thought of parting with her. She quieted my fears by saying, "You need not begin to think about it now, dear; for it will be nearly three months before the corn will be ready to cut, and nobody knows what may happen before that time. But, if I go, I will bring you a store doll."

Although I dreaded being left at home without mother, I could not help hoping that nothing would happen to prevent her going to the city; for a store doll was something I had never even dared to wish for.
My mother had often made me a doll out of a pillow, by tying her blue checked apron around it; but I always associated it with a fat girl who went to our school, and for whom I had quite a dislike. But the dolls of a smaller size made out of a roll of cloth, with a smaller roll fastened on the back for arms, were very dear to me. I got my older brother to make marks with ink where the eyes and nose and mouth ought to be, and then I rubbed the quill pen filled with ink over the back of the head for hair.

My mother had a hard summer that year.
Our farm was a large one, and there were no labor-saving machines to make the work easier. Consequently, my father had a number of hired men. I well remember the two tables my mother was obliged to put together to make room for them all, and the large loaves of rye bread she cut up for every meal. Being a dairy farm, my mother had a great deal of butter and cheese to make. I was very proud to think that a rich, prominent family in Albany always had a jar of her June butter packed to be sent to them in the fall.

The days were long days in childhood, and the summer seemed to linger later than ever. But the time came when the corn was all cut, the extra help was sent away, and Sally Sage was engaged to come and keep house for my mother for two weeks.

It is seventy years ago this autumn that she made that visit; but I remember perfectly how she looked when she was ready to go, and the choking sensation in my throat when she stooped down, and put aside her long black lace veil to kiss me good-by.

I could really see that she felt sorry to part with me, for I discovered a tear in the corner of her eye. She was not a demonstrative woman. People were not as much so in those days as they are now, and that tear made a great impression on my childish heart. My father carried the small haircloth trunk, studded with brass nails, out to the gate; and soon the stage coach came rattling up, and the trunk was strapped on behind. I think I never have seen such a look of love-light on any face as there was on my mother's as she turned to look after us out of the stage-coach window, when the driver started up his horses.
Albany was only thirty-six miles away from our home; but there were no railroads then,
and it seemed a long distance off.

I was the only girl in the family; and my five brothers were very fond of me, and told me not to cry. Was I not to have a store doll when mother came home?

But it was such a gray, chilly morning that I could not help feeling desolate enough; and I went up to my room under the sloping roof, and kneeled down by the high post bedstead, and, burying my face in the feather bed, I gave full vent to my tears, and I prayed to God to keep my dear mother from danger and bring her safely home again. Before I could bathe my eyes Sally Sage called from the kitchen, in a loud shrill voice, "Mandy, hain't you going to come and wash up the breakfast dishes?" I ran down the back stairs in a hurry, for I stood in awe of Sally Sage.
She was the one woman in town who went about doing work wherever and whenever she could,—"filling gaps for folks," as she expressed it. She was very prim and precise in her ways, and a person who never seemed to be in sympathy with children. She sat in a pew in front of us at church, and often went to sleep; and her large turkey-feather fan would move more and more slowly until it would fall down into her lap. Then she would rouse herself, and sit up straight and trim as if nothing had happened. At such times she bit off a bit of ginger root or a bunch of caraway seeds which she carried in her hand.

Sally instantly saw that I had been crying; and she said, "Well, well, I never see the beat,—crying 'cause your ma's gone out to Albany for a little spell. What would you do if your mother should die, I wonder? I hain't had no mother sence I was a baby. Such a great gal as you be, going up chamber to cry!"

No wonder Sally Sage was so unfeeling.
She hadn't had any mother. My heart was full of pity for her then, and I was very careful to tell my brothers what she had told me, and to beg them not to track mud over her clean floor; for Sally was a person who never had a mother to love her.

Sally Sage spun a lot of yarn for our stockings, and wove a rag carpet for the sitting-room while mother was gone. She was a great worker, and people could always rely upon her doing her very best.
She prided herself on not being "an eye-servant."

The two weeks mother was gone seemed almost as long as the whole summer to me; and, when the afternoon came for her to come home, I kept watch at the west window until I saw the horses' heads peering through the thick trees that lined the mountain road. Then I ran down and told Sally; and she put the tea-kettle on, and prepared the supper as quickly as she could.
Mother said she was never so happy in her life as she was when she got home. She told father to open the trunk at once, so she could get out the store doll.

I have had many fine gifts since then, but never one that could compare with that doll, as far as my happiness and pride were concerned. My father's cousin had dressed it in a piece that had been left of her brown and gold changeable silk dress. I can remember the expression of that doll's face now. It had flaxen curls hanging down at the side, blue eyes and pink cheeks. It was a wax doll. Of course, it was too fine for me to play with except at stated times; but I kept it in the top drawer of the bureau in the spare room, and I was allowed to look at it every day, and to hold it for a short time.
On special days when we had company I was told that I could play with it.

I named it Miss Arabella Cogswell, after the pretty young lady in the city whose father and mother thought so much of our June butter.

After a time my mother let me have the doll to play with every day; but girls at that time were expected to outgrow their affection for dolls at an early age, and, when I was ten years old, I was ashamed to be seen holding a doll, and so I used to go up in the garret and "take comfort" with Miss Arabella Cogswell all alone by myself, long after the family thought I was done with dolls forever.

When I was eleven years old, the ladies in our town filled a box to send to a missionary in Turkey. My mother told me about the little girl there who lived with heathen children, and who had no privileges such as I had in my favored country, and hoped, now that I was such a great girl, that I would send the doll to her. So, after many struggles with what Sally Sage called my "depraved nature," I put the doll in the missionary box.

It took a long time then to hear from those far-off countries; and it was a year before I received the letter from that little girl's mother, telling of the doll's safe arrival and the delight of the child at receiving such a beautiful gift. I have that letter now, and shall keep it as long as I live; for, somehow, I still have a great affection for the store doll of my childhood, the giving up of which made me feel for a time much as I thought then that Mrs. Deacon Fairchild felt when she gave up her only daughter for the cause of Foreign Missions.

K. W. BROWN.

She was a very important member of the Brown family, was K. W. Brown. When she was only five months old, she ran all over the house, which is more than any other of the little Browns did at that tender age. When Dick and Marjorie came home from the country one summer, Sister May carried a queer-looking bundle, which looked very much like a blue gingham clothes-bag. And that is just what it was.
There had been a great discussion as to whether or not the pet cat, Cherry,—a great, glossy creature,—should be left behind; and, finally, after all the pros and cons had been gravely considered, the family council adjourned after deciding that Cherry should not be subjected to the temptations of city life. So May resolutely packed a lot of medicine bottles into the basket which was to have served for a travelling coach for her black pet, and every one thought that Cherry's fate was sealed.
At last every one was ready. All of the baggage, excepting grandma's trunk, had been sent off by the early train; and, if that one trunk had not been left to hold the "last things," which always multiply in a mysterious way, I doubt if I could have ever told you about K. W. Brown. It was about ten o'clock; and the children were standing at the window watching for the carriage which was coming to take them to the station, when Mrs. Brown, going out to the kitchen to make sure that Bridget had not left the water running, and had fastened all the windows, and had made sure that the fire was out, and had left nothing out of place, found May giving Cherry a last drink of milk in the cover of a tin kettle.
If Dick had been there, he would have been dumfounded to see his sister; for he didn't suppose "grown-ups" ever cried.

"What is the matter?" asked mamma.
"Cherry!" was the mournful answer;
and May couldn't help laughing through her tears, for it did seem ridiculous for her to be crying over a cat. At this point Cherry, having finished her milk, seated herself in the sunlight at the door and began washing her face, as all neat cats do when they finish eating.

"I had no idea that you really cared so much, May," said mamma. "We will take her with us, for I'd rather have Cherry than any other cat." And she picked up the great black beauty and carried her into the house, while May fastened the kitchen door.

Now who can say whether Cherry would have made the trip after all, simply for want of "ways and means," if grandma had not remembered a blue gingham clothes-bag which was in the top tray of her trunk, and which seemed the only available article which was large enough for the purpose.
This was found, the trunk locked and re-strapped; Cherry was bagged, and had not time to object to her quarters before the carriage came; and in a few minutes they were on their way to the train.

When Mr. Brown met them at the city, he didn't have to ask the contents of the bag; for Cherry's eyes were as large as saucers peering around at everything and everybody, and her black ears were on the alert for every strange sound, as she sat in May's arms, the bag gathered up around her neck. For she had seriously objected to being in the dark, and didn't hesitate to say so, as well as she could; but she had been perfectly contented when May let her have her head out, so that she could see what was going on.

Cherry seemed to have no trouble in accommodating herself to her new surroundings, and soon felt quite at home. Every one admired her, and she grew very vain.
Like some people, this vanity lasted long after her beauty was gone; for, as the weeks passed by, family cares fell to the lot of Mrs. Cherry; and she grew into a grave, concerned, consumptive mother, who would sit anxiously watching her three frolicsome kittens as they romped and tumbled and fell over each other in the big box of excelsior which was their bed. When the kittens were old enough to lap milk from a saucer with their cunning little pink tongues, their mother one evening disappeared. Marjorie and Dick used to watch for her to come back, but for some reason Sister May seemed to feel sure that they would never see her again.

One kitten was gray and white, one black like Cherry, and one all gray except a little white spot on her chest, which the children called her necktie; and this last kitten was
K. W. Brown, otherwise known as Kitty Winks Brown, nicknamed Winks, Win-kitty, Pussy-kit, Kitty-puss, and Winkums, but oftenest Kitten. Nig, the black kitten, was given away; and K. W. Brown and Furry were left to play with each other in the long grass, which seemed to them like a perfect forest. And grand times they had playing tag and hide-and-seek, and running after each other's tails. But one sad day a dog caught Furry, and hurt her so badly that she had to be chloroformed; and then K. W. had only her own tail to run after.

From the beginning she was a wonderful kitten. For a long time she seemed to have no intention of growing; and, when she sat demurely on the top step of the veranda and watched the passers-by, they would look at the little gray scrap, and exclaim, "Oh, what a cute kitten!" She would race up and down the veranda after a ball or a piece of paper tied to a string. But one summer evening she found a still better plaything. There was a little toad that always took an airing on the walk near the front steps every evening when it began to grow dark, and Kitten used to watch for him. She would crouch down and tremble all over; and then, gathering herself for a spring, she would fly up in the air, and come down a few inches away from Mr. Toad. Then she would walk around him sideways, like a crab, with her back raised and tail waving like a banner. Finally, she would prance around and give the cold little visitor a soft pat with her velvet paw. Then around to the other side for a pat there. Perhaps by this time the toad would give one or two hops, which would send Kitten flying to the other side of the yard, only to come back and repeat the performance the next minute. This was kept up until the toad went home, when Kitten would come up and sit down with the family on the veranda, and wink very knowingly at each one.

One day Kitten had a visitor. There were two boys who lived very near by, who had a dog and a camera. And one day they all came over. At that time Tip—that was the dog's name—was not very much larger than Kitten, but was not so old, and had never made the acquaintance of a kitten. He was buff and white; and his hair was long and soft, and just a wee bit curly. He was so fat that he couldn't walk very straight; and, when he tried to run very fast, he was apt to tumble down. When Kitten saw Tip, she must have thought that he was some relation to the dog that hurt her sister; for she put up her back as high as it would go, and her tail, which was twice its natural size, stuck straight out. Then she sang a little song, somewhere down in her throat. And Tip's tail wagged slower and slower, till finally it stopped altogether. And Tip began to sing, too. Then Kitten turned and ran to the picket fence, and, jumping through, turned her head back to look at her company. With the pickets between them, Tip's bravery returned, and he made for the fence. Then Kitten climbed up higher, and sat on the post, looking down at her pursuer.

By and by the boys put Tip and Kitten in a big rocking-chair, and took their pictures. In one picture the two were glaring at each other, in the next Kitten was boxing Tip's ears. Tip didn't approve of this at all, so that was the end of the photography; and the boys and the dog and the camera went home.

Kitten had a fashion of winning a way for herself into the heart of every one. Papa Brown suggested once that she had a cough, and that she was probably unhealthy, and might be giving consumption to the children if she was kept; but, by the time a plan was suggested for ending the small life, Papa Brown's heart-strings had come untied, and Kitten had crept right into his heart. And so the plan was never carried out.

Dick used to carry K. W. around upside down; but she didn't seem to mind it, though she expected the rest of the family to know better.

She preferred running around on her own four feet; and it was funny to see her dodging around under chairs and tables when she thought that Dick was after her.

She had to sleep out of doors; for, when May tried letting her sleep in the house, she found that Kitten only slept till about four o'clock in the morning, and then persisted in going around to visit the different members of the family, evidently thinking that they, too, should be stirring. She was always on hand when Bridget came down in the morning, and expected to have a door or window opened immediately for her to come in. Up she would go to May's room, and take a little nap until May was ready to wake up. Then for a romp, for she was never so playful or affectionate as she was in the early morning.

She was the first to answer the bell for meals; and she didn't believe in waiting to be helped till the family had finished: she wanted to eat when they did. She liked to get up in May's lap, for then she was sure to get many a little scrap during the meal; but, if this were not allowed, she would jump on the lounge, which was near the table, and begin clawing at the back. Then she would turn around, and, putting her little head on one side, and wrapping her tail around her feet (she had a very long tail), would look at May expectantly, as much as to say: "I know that is forbidden, but I knew it would make you look at me. I'm hungry!"

She was very fond of peanuts, and always recognized the sound of the cracking shells. She would push her little cold nose into May's hand, and have the nut almost before it was out of its shell. She also enjoyed music; and, when May sat down at the piano to play or sing, Kitten would come and jump up into her lap, and lie there contentedly napping as long as the music lasted.

Kitten liked chocolate caramels almost as well as peanuts, only she wanted them softened before she took them into her small mouth. And, after a caramel, how busy her tiny pink tongue was cleaning house; for, as Dick said, "it did get stuck all over the lid of her mouth." Sometimes she had to use her claws for a toothpick, and that was very funny.

Kitten's favorite amusement was to sit on May's table and stir around the things in the work-basket with one paw. Dick said that she was "making pudding"; and perhaps you would have thought so if you had seen the work-basket after one of these visits. For the stirring around was only half the fun. After that the tiny claws pulled out the emery; and K. W. frolicked with it all over the bed, lying down and kicking it with all four feet, then lifting it high over her head with her two front paws, then rolling it along and springing after it, till she, tired of that, went back to the basket for the needle-book and several spools. The spools rolled better on the floor, and the family were constantly finding spools in queer corners all over the house.

Now, if K. W. were a story-book kitten, I should have to tell you next, I suppose, that she died one day; but she isn't one bit dead. She has just been taking a drink out of May's pitcher, resting her two front paws on the rim and her two back feet on the edge of the basin, in great danger of losing her balance; and, having had a good drink, she has jumped up on the high footboard of the bed, and sits there blinking and looking very wise, and planning new mischief, I haven't a doubt. So, perhaps, some day I shall be able to tell you something more about K. W. Brown.—Christian Intelligencer.

WHERE TOM FOUND HIS MANNERS.

Tom's father was a rich man, and Tom lived in a large house in the country. He had a pony and many other pets, and wore fine clothes. Tom was very proud of all the fine things his father's money bought. He began to think that being rich was better than being good. He grew very rude, and was cross to the servants. Once he kicked Towser; but the dog growled, and Tom was afraid to kick him again.

One day, when Tom was playing in the yard, he saw a boy standing by the gate. He was ragged and dirty, his hat was torn, and his feet were bare; but he had a pleasant face. In one hand he carried a pail half full of blackberries.

"Go away from here," said Tom, running to the gate. "We are rich, and we do not want any ragged boys around."

"Please give me a drink," said the boy. "If you are so rich, you can spare me a dipper of water."

"We can't spare you anything," said Tom. "If you don't go away, I will set the dogs on you."

The boy laughed, and walked away, swinging the tin pail in his hand.

"I think I will get some blackberries, too," said Tom to himself. He went out of the gate into the lane leading to a meadow where there were plenty of berries.

Tom saw some fine large ones growing just over a ditch. He thought he could leap over it very easily. He gave a run, and a very big jump. The ditch was wider than he had thought; and, instead of going over it, he came down in the middle of it.

The mud was very thick and soft, and Tom sank down in it to his waist. He was very much frightened, and began to scream for help. But he had not much hope that help would come, for he was a long way from any house.

He screamed until he was tired. He began to think he would have to spend the night in the ditch, when he heard steps on the grass. Looking up, he saw the ragged boy he had driven from the gate a short time before.

"Please help me out," said Tom, crying. "I will give you a dollar."

"I don't want the dollar," said the other boy. Lying down flat on the grass, he held out both of his hands to Tom, and drew him out of the ditch.

Tom was covered with mud, his hat was gone, and one shoe was lost in the ditch. He looked very miserable.

"Who is dirty now?" asked the boy. "I am," said poor Tom; "but I thank you very much for helping me out of the mire, and I am sorry I sent you away from the gate."

"The next time I come, perhaps you will treat me better," said the boy. "I am not rich; but I am stronger than you are, and I think I have better manners."

"I think so, too," said Tom.

The next day, when Tom saw the boy going by the gate, he called him in, showed him his rabbits, doves, and ducks, and gave him a ride on his pony.

"You have better manners now," said the boy.

"Yes," said Tom: "I found them in the ditch."—Florence V. Halliwell, in the Sunday School Visitor.

MARY HEMENWAY.

In an account of the Old South work reprinted in pamphlet form from the Journal of Education, Mr. Edwin D. Mead pays the following tribute to Mrs. Hemenway:—

The extent of the obligation of Boston and of America to Mrs. Hemenway for her devotion to the historical and political education of our young people during this long period is something which we only now begin to properly appreciate, when she has left us and we view her work as a whole. I do not think it is too much to say that she has done more than any other single individual in the same time to promote popular interest in American history, and to promote intelligent patriotism.

Mary Hemenway was a woman whose interests and sympathies were as broad as the world; but she was a great patriot, and she was pre-eminently that. She was an enthusiastic lover of freedom and of democracy, and there was not a day of her life that she did not think of the great price with which our own heritage of freedom had been purchased. Her patriotism was loyalty. She had a deep feeling of personal gratitude to the founders of New England and the fathers of the republic. She had a reverent pride in our position of leadership in the history and movement of modern democracy; and she had a consuming zeal to keep the nation strong and pure and worthy of its best traditions, and to kindle this zeal among the young people of the nation. With all her great enthusiasms, she was an amazingly practical and definite woman. She wasted no time nor strength in vague generalities, either of speech or action. Others might long for the time when the kingdom of God should cover the earth as the waters cover the sea, and she longed for it; but, while others longed, she devoted herself to doing what she could to bring that corner of God's world in which she was set into conformity with the laws of God; and this by every means in her power,—by teaching poor girls how to make better clothes, and cook better dinners, and make better homes; by teaching people to value health and respect and train their bodies; by inciting people to read better books and love better music and better pictures, and be interested in more important things. Others might long for the parliament of man and the federation of the world, and so did she; but, while others longed, she devoted herself to doing what she could to make this nation, for which she was particularly responsible, fitter for the federation when it comes. The good patriot, to her thinking, was not the worse cosmopolite. The good State for which she worked was a good Massachusetts; and her chief interest, while others talked municipal reform, was to make a better Boston.

American history, people used to say, is not interesting. And they read about Ivy and Marathon and Zama; about Pym and Pepin and Pericles, the ephors, the tribunes, and the House of Lords. American history, said Mrs. Hemenway, is to us the most interesting and the most important history in the world, if we would only open our eyes to it and look at it in the right way; and I will help people to look at it in the right way. Our very archaeology, she said, is of the highest interest; and, through the researches of Mr. Cushing and Dr. Fewkes and others among the Zuni and the Moquis, sustained by her at the cost of thousands of dollars, she did an immense work to make interest in it general. Boston, the Puritan city,—how proud she was of its great line of heroic men, from Winthrop and Cotton and Eliot and Harvard to Sumner and Garrison and Parker and Phillips! How proud she was that Harry Vane once trod its soil, and here felt himself at home! How she loved Hancock and Otis and Warren and Revere and the great men of the Boston town meetings,—above all, Samuel Adams, the very mention of whose name always thrilled her, and whose portrait was the only one, save Washington's, which hung on the oaken walls of her great dining-room! The Boston historians, Prescott, Motley, Parkman; the Boston poets, Longfellow, Lowell, Emerson,—each word of every one she treasured. She would have enjoyed and would have understood as few others that recent declaration of Charles Francis Adams that the founding of Boston was fraught with consequences hardly less important than those of the founding of Rome. All other Boston men and women must see Boston as she saw it,—that was her high resolve: they must know and take to heart that they were citizens of no mean city; they must be roused to the sacredness of their inheritance, that so they might be roused to the nobility of their citizenship and the greatness of their duty. It was with this aim and with this spirit, not with the spirit of the mere antiquarian, that Mrs. Hemenway inaugurated the Old South work. History with her was for use,—the history of Boston, the history of New England, the history of America.

In the first place, she saved the Old South Meeting-house. She contributed $100,000 toward the fund necessary to prevent its destruction. It is hard for us to realize, so much deeper is the reverence for historic places which the great anniversaries of these late years have done so much to beget, that in our very centennial year, 1876, the Old South Meeting-house, the most sacred and historic structure in Boston, was in danger of destruction. The old Hancock house, for which, could it be restored, Boston would to-day pour out unlimited treasure, had gone, with but feeble protest, only a dozen years before; and but for Mrs. Hemenway the Old South Meeting-house would have gone in 1876. She saved it; and, having saved it, she determined that it should not stand an idle monument, the tomb of the great ghosts, but a living temple of patriotism. She knew the didactic power of great associations; and every one who in these fifteen years has been in the habit of going to the lectures and celebrations at the Old South knows with what added force many a lesson has been taught within the walls which heard the tread of Washington, and which still echo the words of Samuel Adams and James Otis and Joseph Warren.

Here and There.

The wettest place in the world is Chera-pungi, in Assam, where the average rainfall for fifteen years has been 493 inches. In 1861 it was 905.

A process for making artificial cotton is reported from France. It is made from the wood of pine, spruce, or larch, which, having been converted by chemicals, first into a pure cellulose, and then into a paste, is passed through a perforated plate. The result is a thread which can be woven into a strong fabric.

A novel industry has been started in the San Joaquin valley by Chicago tanners, who selected California for climatic and other natural reasons for their extensive operations. It means the employment of large forces of workmen and the expenditure of large sums of money. The tanners are to cultivate a weed, from the roots of which they tan better leather than from anything else.—Journal of Commerce.

February, 1866, is referred to by astronomers as "the month without a full moon." January and March of that year had each two full moons, while the intermediate month did not have one. Says a writer in an astronomical journal, referring to this fact: "Do you realize what a rare thing in nature it was? It has not happened before since the beginning of the Christian era, or probably since the creation of the world. It will not occur again, according to the computations of the astronomer royal of England, for—how long do you think? Not until after 2,500,000 years from 1866!"

It is rather singular that at a time when the venerable Jeanne d'Arc is occupying so large a share of public attention that a medal struck in her honor should have been discovered at Torcy, in the Ardennes, by the religious of Saint Chrétienne. It is the only example known to be in existence. It is in very good preservation, for the lettering upon it is quite legible. These are the words and dates: "Jeanne d'Arc, 1409-1431; Orleans, 1429; Reims, 1429; Rouen, 1431." On each face is a representation of the heroine on horseback and in full armor. In the opinion of archaeologists this medal is of the sixteenth century. It is certainly not in the style of the fifteenth century.—Sacred Heart Review.

THE UNITARIAN PATRIARCH.

The Boston Herald, referring to Dr. Furness, says: "Quite recently Dr. Furness, who is the patriarch of the Unitarian denomination, celebrated the seventieth anniversary of his ministry in Philadelphia. His position in that city has been in some respects like that of the venerable Bishop White, who was the pastor of Washington. He has been identified with that community through a whole lifetime, and is one of its most honored citizens. He commands the respect, not only of the New England people, but of the Quaker people also; and his independence and integrity in standing by his convictions, whether they were accepted or not, has won for him to a rare degree the confidence and the love of his fellow-men. Still in the active ministry, though too old and feeble to do much more than sit in his place in the sanctuary, there is to-day no clergyman in America whose name commands more veneration and respect."

A PHENOMENAL WORKER.

The Springfield Republican, in referring to a Scotch minister who has left the pulpit to write novels, instances Edward Everett Hale as a clergyman who "has long found it possible to do his duty by his congregation, to have a part in a score or several scores of philanthropic measures and social reforms, and yet year after year to write novels and poems, and every one of them worth while." We are inclined to believe that Scotland furnishes few men like Mr. Hale. He is pretty nearly phenomenal in the extent to which he spreads his efforts outside the pulpit into literature, philanthropy and social science. We doubt if his parallel in this way can be found in either hemisphere. James Freeman Clarke did a good deal of public work outside his profession, and, besides, wrote poetry and one novel. Henry Ward Beecher lectured and addressed public gatherings, and wrote one novel, also. But for continuous, persistent, and widely extended mental effort there is no generation in which has appeared a man who has compassed such productions as has Edward Everett Hale.—Boston Herald.

Charities and Reforms.

The pamphlet entitled "A Tour of Observation among Indians and Indian Schools," and published by the Indian Rights Association, gives the impressions received by Charles F. Meserve, president of Shaw University, among the tribes in the South-west. He urges the importance of a system of irrigation in Arizona and New Mexico, and thinks there would then be no question but the Navajos would cease to be nomadic. He was gratified at the progress being made in the education of Indian youth, but saw the need of additional schools on the reservation,—especially an industrial training school. Whiskey is still the worst enemy of the Indian. He gives a graphic account of a religious or Pawnee dance of the Indians, and the entire report is interesting and suggestive.

The Elmira Reformatory was the first institution of its kind in the world, built on the principle, "punishment for reformation only." This reformatory is carrying on a moral sanitation work on a large scale, and is one of the best things in the United States. There are from fifteen hundred to eighteen hundred inmates on indeterminate sentences, their behavior and general progress having much to do with the time of their release. There is a vast educational and disciplinary machinery; and the prisoners (who are, however, not known by that name) receive a good education before they leave. Each boy knows that Mr. Brockway is trying to make a man of him, and that he will aid him in every way to get on in life as long as he behaves himself. Eighty-seven per cent. of the "graduates" have proven, so far, exemplary citizens, there being, of course, some incorrigibles.—Christian World.

The Children's Protective Act of Ontario provides stringent provisions against cruelty and neglect, and for the removal of children who are in danger of moral contamination; it accords official or State recognition to any organized Children's Aid Society; it recognizes the family home system, and forbids the placing of homeless children in institutions; it provides for the appointment of visiting committees to aid the societies in finding homes, and to promote the welfare of children placed out; it requires each municipality to pay the actual expenses of placing its homeless children, and requires cities of ten thousand or over to provide a Children's Temporary Shelter; it empowers cities, towns, or villages to adopt the curfew law, prohibiting children under fourteen being on the streets after 9 P.M., unless accompanied by guardians or friends; it places the general working of the act under supervision of a State Superintendent of Neglected and Dependent Children, and requires him to submit an annual report of his work to Parliament. The expenses of the general supervision are borne by government. Necessary expenses in boarding out children fall on the municipality in which the child last resided a year. Other expenses are defrayed by contributions.

Personals.

Among the most interesting Oriental thinkers and scholars drawn to this country by the Parliament of Religions was Virchand R. Gandhi of Bombay, India. He represented the Jain Association of India, and was the only one from that country who was elected by the people as their delegate. He is now in Boston, and his lectures will doubtless be heard with interest. He may be addressed at 80 West Newton Street.

At the recent conference of friends of the Indian in Washington the following was passed:—

"Resolved, That in the recent and sudden death of President Rhoads, and of Rev. Charles C. Painter, a member of the Board of Indian Commissioners, both officers of the Indian Rights Association, the cause of Indian civilization and elevation has lost helpers of exceptional ability, of great wisdom, and of unusual knowledge of the work in hand, and of many years of ardent devotion to the best interests of Indians; and that, while we sorrow for the loss of these most valued friends and associates in work, we shall ever be inspired by the memory of their courage, fidelity, high patriotism, and consecrated Christian character."

Education.

The review of the Old South work by Mr. Edwin D. Mead has been reprinted in pamphlet form from the Journal of Education. It is a summary of most interesting and valuable work. The Old South lectures, the leaflets, bringing students into first-hand instead of second-hand touch with history, the annual prizes offered to graduates of the Boston high schools for the best essays on subjects in American history, have all done much to promote intelligent patriotism, and this not alone in our own city.

Pleasantries.

A Dakota court is struggling with a prisoner named Szczyz. We don't know what he is charged with; but, from his name, we suspect it is soda-water.—Chicago Dispatch.

"If my employer does not retract what he said to me this morning, I shall leave his store." "Why, what did he say?" "He told me to look for another place."—Harlem Life.

"I suppose," observed the tramp, bitterly, "you would like to have me get off the earth. But I cannot." "Have you tried soft soap?" asked the woman in the blue gingham dress, dispassionately.—Puck.

A lady had been looking for a friend for a long time without success. Finally, she came upon her in an unexpected place. "Well," she exclaimed, "I've been on a perfect wild-goose chase all day long; but, thank goodness, I've found you at last."

One day in a class in Old Testament history a Hampton boy announced that Adam was more to blame than Eve, and, when the surprised teacher asked him why he thought so, explained, "The serpent had to talk to Eve a long time, but Adam he eat it right up."

A gentleman writes to the Publisher's Circular: "While staying at a well-known seaside town, and inquiring at a book-shop there for 'The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table,' I was told they had not it, the vender being quite sure, as all the cookery books were kept together!"—Critic.

"I see," said Senator Sorghum, "that they are still harping on that little sugar deal." "I'm afraid they are," replied his private secretary. "It simply goes to show," the senator went on, with a sigh of resignation, "how often a profit may be without honor."—Washington Star.

Mrs. Penfield: "My husband has found a way by which he says I am of the greatest help to him in his literary work." Mrs. Hillaire: "How nice that must be for you, my dear! But how are you able to do it?" "As soon as I see him at his desk, I go into another room, and keep perfectly quiet until he has finished."—Puck.

"Yes," said Miss Beaconhill, "for five generations my ancestors have lived and died there; and I, too, was born and brought up under the shadow of the old State-house." "Poor thing!" replied Miss Lakeside, sympathetically. "How awfully unhealthy that must have been! And I suppose that is the reason you never really got thawed out."—Life.

Some time ago a man went to visit a friend who was an inmate of a lunatic asylum. After a prolonged chat in a humorous, if not very edifying vein, the visitor thought it about time to go. "Is that clock right, Jock?" he asked of the inmate. Jock gazed at him for a minute or so in speechless amazement, then, laying his hand compassionately on his shoulder, said, "Man, dae ye think it wid be here if it was right?"—Household Words.

A visitor at Gray Gables last summer found Ruth Cleveland, the bright little daughter of the President, lying flat on her back in the nursery, crying silently and refusing to be comforted. "What is the matter?" asked the guest. "Toothache." "But why do you not get up, my child? Don't lie there." "The toothache is too heavy," sobbed Ruth. "I can't carry it about." Job himself in the first ages of the world found no better way to describe his mighty grief.—Youth's Companion.

I went into a little stationer's near the Uxbridge Road Station in London one day during the summer just passed, bought two or three magazines, and then asked, "Do you keep mucilage?" The woman threw a hasty glance over her counter, and replied, with just a touch of acerbity in her voice: "No, I don't. There are so many new papers coming out nowadays that it's impossible to keep them all." I was told afterward by an English friend that I should have asked for "gum," which, I think, is after all much the better word, because it is the simpler. I went back to the shop the next day, asked for gum, and got it.—Critic.

A BRAVE SOLDIER.

Little Mary, the tiniest child in the kindergarten, had been given some clay, and was directed, to make as straight a line of soldiers as she could by sticking a number of wooden toothpicks upright in the clay. When the teacher came to examine the little girl's work, she found the picks in quite a straight row; but one of them stood up considerably higher than the others. She pointed this out to Mary, and was about to push it down to its proper place, when the little tot vigorously objected, and exclaimed earnestly: "Oh, but you mustn't. That soldier saw a little mouse, and he jumped right up."

Editorial.

It is the privilege and the temptation of every historical church to appeal to its history. This is constantly done by the Roman Church, by the Episcopal Church, and by the Congregational. Each one of these churches has elements in its history to which it may recur with pride, and which may kindle inspiration. But this privilege of appeal to the past is a danger as well as an opportunity. No church can justify its existence to-day simply because it was established some time in the past when its services were needed. If it has no real mission to-day, if it is not fitting itself to the life that now is, and supplying fundamental wants of people who live now and here, its history will be nothing but its tomb. The bread of life and the milk of the word must have in them a vital principle.

It is possible and probable that the leader of a party may overestimate its influence and power, and so Herr Liebknecht, in his article in the Forum for February, on "The Programme of German Socialism," may have exaggerated the importance of his party; but there is not the slightest doubt that it is easier, perhaps, to underestimate the strength and influence of the Social Democrats as factors in German politics. Liebknecht is their leader in the Reichstag. It is clear that the determined, uncompromising spirit of himself and his followers cannot be suppressed by a gagging law. The figures show that, while in 1871 there were 124,655 socialist votes, there were in 1893 1,786,738. This remarkable growth under persecution shows that social democracy is a force that must be reckoned with. Bismarck by his blunders helped the cause, and the Social Democrats are more than grateful for the result. Germany is passing through a social crisis, but also a political one; and Liebknecht declares it the double mission of the Social Democrats "to fight for democratic institutions as well as for social emancipation."

DR. PARKHURST has turned aside from his crusade on good government to coin a new word. It is "andromania," which is represented as the craze of some women to ape men. It needs to be balanced by another word, "gynomania," the craze of some men to ape women. Curious cases of gynomania have been recognized and described in medical journals. There is not much to choose as objects of admiration between women who are masculine and men who are effeminate. One is as unnatural as the other. But, fortunately, there is not any large prevalence of either disease. Nature takes care of that pretty well. Arbitrary, unnatural, unjust, illogical, and foolish lines of demarcation between the sexes have been and will be further removed, but neither sex endangered thereby. But, avoiding the perversion suggested by these terms, the most manly man is the man who takes after his mother, as the most womanly woman is the woman who takes after her father. Each sex needs in some measure some elements which are most prominent in the other sex. The woman who is sweet may still be strong, and the man who is strong may still be tender.

THE Baptists and other Protestant denominations may properly ask whether the Forum has been converted into a denominational organ of the Episcopal Church. That review is without editorial opinions or comments, but it seems to have adopted the habit of studying Christian communities too much through one pair of glasses. Some months ago it printed an article on the religious condition of Middleboro, Mass., by Rev. William B. Hale, which served as an advertisement for the Episcopal church in that community. The article was seen to be one-sided and partial; and now the Forum in its February number publishes an article by the same writer, on "A Religious Study of a Baptist Town," which is marked by a similar partial and advertising spirit. Mr. Hale shows the social and religious anomalies which arise from the presence of three sects of Baptists in the same town, and especially from the fact that three of these Baptist churches keep Saturday and three of them keep Sunday. The Seventh Day Baptist receives most criticism, and the inconsistency by which a Christian sect insists on keeping a Hebrew festival is the subject of natural comment. The result is, while there are two Sundays in Westerly, many of the people keep neither. Undoubtedly, the peculiarities of these Baptist sects are as unaccountable to an Episcopalian minister as the peculiarities of the Episcopalian sect are to the Baptist minister. Mr. Hale appears as the critic of one and the apologist of the other. He would like to leave the impression that these different sects of Baptists represent a part of a church, while the Episcopal church represents the whole; but neither in theology nor anywhere else can the doctrine that the part is equal to the whole be soberly received, and the author's efforts to promote church union on this line will scarcely be successful. At present any suggestion of the Episcopal church swallowing the Baptist is like that of a cod swallowing a whale. It could only be done in very small bites, and very likely some bone would stick in the smaller fish's throat.

SO LONG as Mr. Hale attempts to describe the inconveniences of dissent, he can make a pretty strong case; but, when he attempts to be historic, and, putting on his eyeglasses, asks, "Who are these people?" he loses the historic spirit, and looks only at the narrowest and most limited aspects of Baptist history. It is remarkable that no acknowledgment of the great service which Baptists have rendered to civil and religious liberty, whose blessings the Episcopalians enjoy to-day, should not have been made. That Episcopal tyranny is not more absolute is largely owing to the modifying effect of Baptist Congregationalism. That we have in this country none of the evils of an established church, such as fetter the religious sentiment in England, is largely owing to the same Baptist determination to keep the church of Christ free from entangling alliances. The author overlooks also the service to Christianity which the Baptists have rendered in protesting against the doctrine of baptismal regeneration which the Church of England has clearly taught in her baptismal formulas. It was these Anabaptists of whom Mr. Hale speaks rather scornfully who had the courage to declare that infants can be saved without baptism. For this they brought upon themselves the condemnation of the Augsburg Confession. Nor is any tribute paid to the service that Baptists have rendered in discarding formal written creeds and the decrees of councils, synods, and bishops in matters of Christian doctrine. In short, this article is one-sided and imperfect; and it reveals more of the state of mind of the author than of the subject it treats.

SUPPOSE some Baptist minister had been detailed to make a study of an English town where the Established Church was in the ascendancy, and suppose that the minister should content himself with describing only the wrongs and abuses which the English Church has inflicted upon dissenters,—the fact that they had been shut out from the great universities of England because they could not subscribe to the church articles, that the validity of the congregational ordination has not been recognized, that Baptist ministers are not allowed to preach in English Church pulpits, that dissenters could not be buried in churchyards by any other service than that of the Church of England, and other offences against religious freedom, including the payment of tithes by dissenters for the support of a church in which they had no interest. It would not be difficult to pick out in England a parish in which the worst tendencies of Anglicanism have been aggravated by intolerant rectors. But such a paper would not do justice to the real contribution which the Church of England has made to the history and life of the nation, and which, after all deductions are made, must be acknowledged to be of large value. In this light the method of the Forum is not good journalism, nor is it very good history.

MR. MOZOOMDAR'S MISSION.

Protap Chunder Mozoomdar has twice visited this country, and each time with the flaming tongue of the prophet he has brought a message from the East. So quickening and inspiring were his words that wherever they fell they kindled spiritual flame. Indeed there were many who felt that it would be a promise of a Pentecostal blessing if this prophet of India could remain in this country for a year or two, until his message had been fully heard.

But a man of Mr. Mozoomdar's prophetic gifts is wanted everywhere. If he is needed in America, he is needed, too, in his native India. So strong has been his consciousness of his opportunity and duty at home that he could not sacrifice it for calls which came from abroad. What a great work needs to be done in India for the education, development, and spiritual enfranchisement of the people was powerfully set forth in Mr. Mozoomdar's lectures and addresses in this country. How earnestly he is addressing himself to this work at home, and with what great success and encouragement, may be seen from the very interesting account we have given on another page of his work in India during the last year. His ministrations, resumed with a glad welcome at Calcutta, have been extended over a wide section of country. The graphic account of his tour in upper India, of the throngs that flocked to hear him, and the power with which, in spite of the constant physical strain, he delivered his message, is furnished by one of the members of the Brahmo-Somaj who accompanied him on this tour. It is a new chapter in the Acts of the Apostles.

In addition to his spoken word, Mr. Mozoomdar's message is conveyed in his monthly journal, the Interpreter, and also in the books he has written. The volumes written and published in this country, entitled "Heart-beats" and "The Spirit of God," have been received with great eagerness in India.

Shall not this apostle be sustained? and will not the people in this country do their part in sustaining him? We know of no foreign missionary enterprise which deserves a warmer support than this. Here is a man called by the divine spirit to the work of proclaiming the gospel of love and truth and righteousness, who can carry the best that Christianity has to offer to the people of his own race and country as he can bring to Western Christians the spiritual message of the Oriental Christ. With remarkable personal self-sacrifice and untiring devotion and deep spiritual consecration he is carrying on his work. It is a work not without difficulty and opposition. The least that the friends of Mr. Mozoomdar in this country can do is to give him their blessing and encouragement. Let this not only take the form of words, but of some substantial yearly offering. To the liberal Christians of this country, of whatever denomination, this is a grand opportunity, which ought not to be neglected. Here is a man who does not speak in the broken accents of a foreigner, but who goes to his people clothed in their costumes and familiar with their thought, speaking their language with eloquence and power, and yet who can give to India the result of his own contact with European life and thought. It is a rare opportunity. There is no intervening machinery to be supported. The money raised to support Mr. Mozoomdar goes directly to him and his work. During the last year the Mozoomdar Mission Fund Committee have secured about eight hundred dollars. They have now entered upon the second year of their work, and a thousand dollars ought to be promptly raised for this object.

Contributions may be sent to Mrs. William Howell Reed, 37 Commonwealth Avenue, Boston, Mass.

AFTER DRIFTING, WHAT NEXT?

The nineteenth century bids fair to close with a crisis of theological disturbance which, while not generally foreseen, might have been expected. A process of drifting set in on a notable scale soon after the acceptance of the doctrine of evolution by the leading scientific men of all nations. All other causes at work previous to that time to make exclusive ecclesiastical claims seem irrational were lifted up and made more effective by the absolute reversal of opinion made necessary by the surrender of the traditional beliefs held almost universally in the Christian Church concerning the creation of the world and what has followed it. When the drift toward liberalism was first noticed, while many feared and resisted, many others fondly hoped that the drifting would go on until, under sunny skies of Divine Providence, in the warm gulf streams of human sympathy, every iceberg of bigotry would be dissolved. Although it has been stoutly denied by exponents of orthodoxy in every denomination, there has been no part of the Christian Church in which the drift toward liberalism on the part of many members, lay and clerical, has not been notable. It may have easily happened that the change was most apparent to liberals, toward whom "thawing bigots," as Dr. Holmes called them, would naturally look for sympathy and assistance.

Within the last five years the drift has become much more marked and so decisive in its tendencies that any orthodox navigator must have been blind to deny it. The process, although opposed now and then in an acute case of heresy, has been allowed to go on in a vague and general hope that the almighty Lord of heaven and earth would reveal his new truth after such an orthodox fashion as to leave the old ways well defined as the only course open, with eternal salvation at the end.

Within the last two years a sharp change is to be noted by those who read the signs of the times. Wise and well-instructed orthodox leaders who have not drifted, and who do not intend to drift, now see and say that the only possible issue of the process is liberalism. They see and begin to say that for them silence means the taking of responsibility for a drifting out of orthodoxy into a liberalism with which they can have no sympathy. The word is now going along the lines of every denomination, "Stop drifting, or henceforth drift at your peril." The letter issuing from the House of Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church is a notable sign of the times. The meaning of it is so plain that the way-faring Episcopalian, although a fool, cannot mistake it. If he be a liberal, denying what many Episcopalians do most certainly deny, he must refuse to accept the authority of the bishops, stop drifting, and go back to the old beliefs or drift outside. What has happened in this case with variations is happening everywhere. In a neighboring city, where ministers of all persuasions were becoming more humane in charitable organizations and social fellowship, where ecclesiastical lines were forgotten on important occasions, where now and then an orthodox believer dared to believe in Darwin, and say so, suddenly all is changed. The liberal churches are given to understand in no doubtful terms that they are not regarded as "evangelical." For a little while the interdict will stand; but, when it comes to be understood that all the cultivated men and women of that community, all lovers of modern science, and those who read the best literature of all nations, have no home left to them in the self-styled evangelical churches, then the drift will again set in. The result of it all must be a drifting apart of intolerance and liberality, of those who stand and those who move.

For any liberal church—we speak only for our own—this state of things presents a crisis of new fortunes. The Unitarian Church to-day must of necessity advance along the whole line, in order to follow where duty and opportunity call. We are coming to a crisis which is full of hope and to a responsibility which must cause anxiety. There are many ministers in all the churches who have their faces set toward our gospel of liberty and love. It is easy for orthodox managers to call them "traitors" if they harbor doubts and do not immediately "go to their own place." But many a man is staying where he is in the hope that he and others like him may make the spot on which they stand "holy ground." If we had two hundred self-supporting Unitarian churches without ministers, the indications are that invitations to them would draw enough able men from the orthodox churches to man them in six months. But we have no such number of vacant churches where we can give a newcomer a free pulpit and a livelihood. We must wait, therefore, a little until the next thing happens. Ministers naturally drift faster than the average layman brought up in orthodoxy; and, while there are many congregations who prefer to hear liberal preachers of their own kind, there are few congregations wholly prepared to go with their minister to the logical conclusion. But, if the prohibition be sharp enough and enforced with sufficient rigor (all liberal preachers having been driven out from orthodox congregations), then the congregations must choose either to listen to preaching which they no longer like or to go where they find what they want.

The Unitarian Church, because of its new assertion of religious catholicity and because of the reorganization of the forces of reaction now beginning, stands, as we said, at the crisis of its new fortunes. No moral certainty is greater than this: if movement in our direction stops in three-fourths of the Christian Church, it will only be increased elsewhere. At the end of sixty years Methodism had not so many churches as we now have, and in the nature of things there is no reason why early in the twentieth century we should not count our churches by thousands instead of hundreds. We can count, for large accessions, only upon those who believe at the same time in liberty and religion. The liberal body that is most religious will become the nucleus for the new fellowship of those who love God and their fellow-men. The liberal bodies which do not meet the demand of the religious nature must decrease. Those that do meet it, and with cordiality, intelligence, and enthusiasm show themselves prepared to do the work, will increase. The tremendous power of orthodoxy will generate a momentum not to be easily withstood. The future years of the nineteenth century will give to our youth an opportunity to test their bravery, their hope, their enthusiasm, their willingness to do something for the principles they love, and, it may be, to suffer for them.

JUDGE HOAR'S UNITARIANISM.

At the Unitarian Festival in 1876 Judge Hoar presided; and, after a witty and felicitous opening address, he concluded by giving in a paragraph his idea of what constitutes a liberal Christian:—

"What constitutes a liberal Christian? I don't know, but I might venture to state my idea of it; and such a statement, perhaps, might not be inappropriate on this occasion. I suppose it to be to believe that this is God's world, and not the devil's; and that he has put us in it to be followers of his son and coworkers with him in making it a better and happier world for our living in it. [Applause.] In coming together, friends, as liberal Christians on this occasion, we do not forget that our body is but a small part of the Church Universal, and that of the religious activities and charities of our time they can do but a small part. Thank God if there are other denominations who can do them better than we can. It was as noble a sentiment as I remember ever to have read or heard, and I like it the more that it was uttered by an old lady of my own native town: 'My delight in the superiority of others I regard as my best gift from God.' [Applause.]

"But, my friends, Cicero said a great while ago that the strongest bond of friendship was to think alike of the republic; and there cannot be a stronger bond of friendship than unison of sentiment and purpose concerning the objects of life. And, while we recognize and extend our hands in sympathy to Christians of all denominations, there is a certain warmth and friendliness which we must all feel toward our own household of faith. Jeanie Deans put on her plaid when she went to visit the Duke of Argyle, because she said that she thought his Grace's heart as a Scotchman would warm to the tartan. And the reply was, 'MacCallum More's heart will be as cold as death can make it when it does not warm to the tartan.' And I always come into this festival of those of our own household of faith with that same feeling of personal affection and regard. We meet here, undoubtedly, with some of this feeling of clanship and affection."

WAS HE AN ATHEIST?

With this title a correspondent in Keokuk, Ia., sends us the following communication, upon which an opinion is solicited:

One of Keokuk's good citizens recently passed into the unseen world, who requested before he died that at his funeral there should be no religious services. A musical society of which he was a member were to take charge of his burial. He directs also in his will that on his monument there shall be inscribed the following [it is a translation of the German]: "By Nature's Force was I created. To Nature's Eternal Force shall I return. There is no death in nature." Now the question naturally forces itself upon our thoughts, Was this man an atheist? He was a manly man, a man of strict integrity. He believed in justice and goodness; he was self-reliant; he loved the truth; he did his duty to his fellows, was industrious, had good habits, and made a wise disposition of his moderate fortune.

Now "Nature's Force" to him was his Creator. Beyond or above this Force there was nothing. It was to him the All-in-all. He did not pray to it, or worship it. He did not invest it with a personality. It was simply an infinite mystery to him, defying all comprehension; and yet he knew as much as those who use other names to designate the Power which has made them and which works for righteousness. Again I ask, Was this man an atheist?

It is not difficult to tell what would be the answer of the majority of Christian believers. But what should be the answer in the light of modern thought? Please give your readers your own views.

R. HASSALE.

Perhaps this man should be called a Ben Adhemite, and the recording angel may assign him such position as was assigned to the man who loved his fellow-men. Evidently, in his practical philosophy, his duty to his fellow-men had the highest place; and he lived under the inspiration of ethics, if not of religion. In these days such a man is classed rather as an agnostic than as an atheist, and the question of his future destiny is one which only superstitious and pessimistic Christians need debate.

But, on the other hand, we hold that a materialistic philosophy such as Büchner's, expressed simply in terms of force, is shallow and cold and insufficient; and a man is unfortunate who accepts it instead of something more vital and inspiring. The question of our belief in God depends not so much on the terms we use to describe him as on what they mean to us. It is a question of more or less. To most people the substitution of the word "Force" for God would mean distinctly less. Our theism depends not merely upon the sum of our knowledge, but upon the state of our feeling toward the Infinite. If we are to employ any other word than God, let it be something that means more, not less. When the writer of John's epistles wanted the largest word for God, he chose "Love"; and probably this departed friend would have recognized love as one of the great forces of the universe. If we cannot describe God in terms of personality, it is because he is infinitely more, not infinitely less. And we repeat that our relation to the Infinite is not alone one of abstract thought: it is one of sentiment. And we believe that one who fails to bow and worship before the infinite mystery and the infinite revelation, and who does not find inspiration, joy, hope, and faith in the grand conceptions of religion, misses as much as the blind man who must grope his way in the darkness, or the deaf who are shut out from the audible world. Such a man is not to be abused, but to be compassionated; but we might hesitate about taking a blind man for our guide, lest, as Jesus warned, we should both fall into some ditch of materialism together.

THE CHILDREN OF NORTH CAROLINA.

There came to the office of the Christian Register the other day a letter which at once arrested the attention. The sealed envelope bore the words in large print, "Please read." The enclosure was headed "An Appeal in Behalf of the Children of North Carolina." To further secure attention, a note stood at the head of the page, begging earnestly any one into whose hands the circular might fall "to exert all his influence" to secure the boon asked for in the appeal. Furthermore, "to make assurance double sure," two lines in a man's handwriting read as follows: "Dear Editor of the Christian Register,—Please aid me in my effort to correct the evil mentioned herein. Respectfully, T. W. Patton, Mayor of the city of Asheville." He would be an indifferent person indeed who could fail to respond to this trio of requests.

What was the occasion of the "Appeal"? What could the Northern editor do for the little ones of the Southern State? Sectional distinctions were happily forgotten in asking for his aid; and the very substance of the appeal was another welcome proof that we are one country, and that in the best work for humanity there is no North and there is no South.

"In the city of Asheville," the Appeal runs, "there are employed children eight years of age, who are required to be at their places of work at the early hour of half-past five o'clock each morning, and, with an intermission of forty minutes for dinner, to continue work until near seven o'clock in the evening. . . . Hundreds of little ones are forced from their sleep of fatigue long before the break of day, fed like so many little animals with a breakfast, alas! only too scant, then, still while it is dark, taking their places beside the whirring machine, of which for many long hours each becomes merely a part. What can we expect of development in that child's soul? What can it know of the Father's love, which passeth knowledge? Has it ever experienced anything like love from those who claim that they are made in the image of that Father?"

The remedy suggested is the passage of a law which, while protecting the rights of the employer, shall forbid any child to be employed at hard labor under thirteen years of age, and any child or woman to be kept at work between the hours of ten at night and six in the morning. The act as prepared by the citizens of Asheville and signed by the mayor is modelled after the Massachusetts law, and the object of the appeal is to create such a public opinion as shall secure its enactment.

One would think that the mere statement of facts would compel legislators to pass such a law. It may be said that many a boy has been put through such a hard experience in his youth, and, when he has had determination, has made a man of himself in spite of it; but those are the rare exceptions, and probably they always have to pay the penalty of an inferior physical organization in their own lives. Certainly, their children will show physical degeneracy. Such a manifest breaking of nature's laws cannot go unpunished.

Then what wretched ignorance, what low morals, what absence of spiritual life it all means! What kind of a community will exist fifty years from now if this sort of thing is not stopped? For it is not alone in Asheville, but in other cities, that this great wrong is done. Every earnest man and woman, certainly every father and mother who in each child of misery see their own child, ought to quickly stand by this mayor, who so honorably magnifies his civic office by designing large things for the State.

But, if the people are going to copy Massachusetts law in this respect, let them go still farther. Almost better let the little lives be flung away over the busy whirring machines than be left to consume away in ignorance and idleness. By all means give them as much sleep as tired nature demands. Let them have food sufficient for them. But copy the Massachusetts laws which provide good public schools, and compel the children to attend. And for them and their parents let another Massachusetts provision be followed, the fostering of public libraries in every community of any size. Maps have been prepared, marking each town in Massachusetts which has a free public library; and the towns so marked stand like soldiers in a regiment. It is these provisions for education and intelligence that have made it possible for Massachusetts to pass factory laws ahead of some other parts of the country. It is another illustration of the old truth, "To him that hath shall be given, and he shall have more abundantly." North Carolina, with her vast material resources, her benevolent and enterprising people, so far in advance of any other Southern State as to have had a board of State charities even before the war, and which, resuscitated a few years ago, is still the only board of State charities in the South, should be a leader in this work of reform, and in educational affairs as well.

Musings.

THE first time I heard Judge Hoar speak in public was marked by a most impressive incident. It was on the occasion of the Unitarian festival in 1875, when Judge Hoar presided. His opening address was full of wit, and set the audience in a happy frame of mind. The festival was largely attended; and of course every Unitarian clergyman within a few hundred miles of Boston, and some from distances more remote, was present with wife or daughter, and the platform was filled with speakers and celebrities. The addresses were inspiring. It was one of the occasions when the festival was up to the high-water mark. As usually, it ended with a hymn. When the hymn was finished, heads were bowed for the benediction. There were ministerial saints and patriarchs on the platform; but this was a festival offered to the clergy by the laymen, and Judge Hoar thought it ought to have a layman's benediction. I never heard the benediction when it seemed to me more significant or more impressive than when the judge raised his hands, and, using one of the apostolic forms, pronounced the blessing. To me the event was doubly significant and suggestive. It was touching and beautiful that a representative of the laity should thus bestow the benediction on the ministry; and then it was an illustration of the congregational principle, which we need well to bear in mind. The pronouncing of a benediction is commonly regarded as a priestly function; and I presume it would have been an unprecedented act if in a Roman Catholic, an Episcopalian, or a Methodist gathering, a layman had pronounced the benediction in the presence of a large concourse of the clergy. Even in a denomination so independent and unecclesiastical as the Baptists I have known a theological student supplying a Baptist church to dismiss the audience each Sunday after the sermon without the benediction, because he had the theory that a benediction could only be pronounced by an ordained minister. This theory was not at all palatable, however, to one of the old deacons, who suggested that he might at least have read one of the benedictions of Saint Paul in the Bible. I am not sure but there are Unitarians even who have lived so much under the influence of prelatical traditions that they assume that a benediction is purely a function of the ordained minister. Against such un-congregational views I must offer my protest. The act of Judge Hoar, so dignified, impressive, and beautiful, was in itself a personal tribute to the ministry, and also an illustration of the congregational principle that the functions of the ministry may also be performed by the laity, whose high calling is equally of God.

As a student of scientific charity, I am somewhat puzzled occasionally to know what to do in the case of wandering minstrels and the deformed woman who sits on the Common and turns the crank of an organ all day. I am uncertain whether to classify these musicians as strolling mendicants, or whether to regard them as among the producing classes. Undoubtedly, they produce music of a certain order; but whether this is a benefit to society or not is sometimes a difficult question to answer. When I see an organ-grinder in the street and a row of children standing around, or some of them waltzing on the pavement, I feel that the organ-grinder is an adjunct to the nursery, and that he deserves to be paid for entertaining these children. As for the German bands that occasionally serenade me, I vibrate between appreciation and exasperation, and have occasionally asked them if they wouldn't be kind enough to go to Neponset and serenade Hosmer instead of devoting so much time to me. There is one strolling musician in Boston for whom I have a professional sympathy. He is a blind flute-player. He does not stroll very much, and usually may be found on Washington Street, near Jordan & Marsh's, persistently playing the same tune on his flute. I have never heard him play but one tune. It may be because I have passed him at a particular time of the program. It is the "Spanish Cavalier." Last week, as I passed by, he was playing the same tune. I had attained such an impetus in my stride that I passed right by without dropping anything into his tin box; but, when I got on the next block, I found myself humming "The Spanish Cavalier," and I had taken the key from his flute. I found, too, that a young man who was following me was humming rather loudly the same tune. Immediately it occurred to me that one might be pauperized by free music as well as by free soup, and that I was the pauper. This piper had succeeded in introducing the "Spanish Cavalier" into my ear, and he was now galloping through my brain. Yet I had not paid a cent for this entertainment, and the young man who was humming the tune behind me was in the same condition! Was not that piper a producer? Did he not produce some effect on my mind and on the mind of the general public, and ought he not to be paid for his production? If he had influenced the public frame of mind, and set it moving in melodious pathways of suggestion, should he not be paid, just as we pay for being transported in a more physical sense? Any one who makes the world sing and then makes it more cheerful is a producer of the highest order. So the next time I meet the blind piper I shall pay him what I owe him.

Brevities.

If the minister uses the sword of the spirit, the blade will be bright, and it will not have a dull edge.

A great weight is taken from many hearts on both continents by the safe arrival of "La Gascogne."

Whatever we may think of the national treasury, there is no silver man who would not personally like to have a gold reserve.

The pope is not infallible in all his habits. He is said to take snuff, but the Protestant ministers who smoke must not criticise him.

Speaking of Dr. Furness, the Outlook says, "His mere presence, even if he takes no part in the exercises, is a benediction alike to speakers and the audience."

At the ripe age of ninety-one Theodore Weld has passed away. His name is written on the noble roll of prophets and martyrs who summoned the nation to truth and righteousness in the antislavery struggle.

The "Point of View" in Scribner's Magazine attempts to reassure those who have been disquieted by certain reports regarding the habit of cigarette-smoking among ladies. The writer is inclined to trust still "the forces that make for essentially sound and wholesome womanhood in America."

A minister has published a book entitled "From the Ball-room to Hell." The author was a dancing-master, but has been converted to "evangelical religion." A copy of his book ought to be sent to the dancing dervishes, with whom religion and dancing are inseparable.

Mr. Chadwick tells us that in the Divinity School, for making chocolate, Rev. William C. Gannett was then as apt as now he is in making parables in prose and verse. We hope Mr. Gannett's skill has not deserted him; and, if he will come to our office some time to lunch, we will give him a chance to show it.

There is a fine article in the New England Magazine for February on "The Harvard Divinity School." It is abundantly illustrated with excellent pictures of Divinity Hall, the Divinity School library, the faculty, and with likenesses of former professors. When we say that the article is written by John W. Chadwick, it is a warrant not only for its facts, but for the literary style.

The education of man goes on. It is a slow process. It has taken untold centuries to bring him upon the stage of action; and, then, it is taking many centuries more to teach him what he is here for and what he is to achieve. He has had to battle with the rude forces of the world. He has had to help finish the world in which he is placed, and adapt it to human life. He has had to learn how to master himself, and how to live in brotherhood and helpfulness and peace with others. It is a long lesson. Individuals have won their diploma; but, as a race, we are still at school.

Pro and Con.

BOOKS FOR FARGO.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

In the only way available I want to express my thanks for a barrel of well-selected reading-matter which came to me "from Boston" last week.

Some of it has been gladly welcomed at the hospital in Fargo, particularly two of the picture-books by a little four-year-old boy. Some has gone to make the time seem shorter to the inmates of an infirmary near Detroit, Minn. A tired mother has drawn rest and refreshment from others of the pages, and all will find helpful place in time. The whole contents gave forcible illustration to a sermon on "Unity in Variety"; for unity of purpose and spirit evidently bound the variety of thought into this comparatively small package, fastening it with the spirit of love, and, in the sending, drawing brothers and sisters of the household of God closer together with links of that chain stronger than iron or silk.

We know not the names of the donors, but we do know their spirit; and, in the name of the recipients, I thank each and all.

CONFERENCE OF GUILDS.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

Having promised to speak at the Conference of Guilds, etc., on the subject of parish papers, I should be obliged to any of our ministers who would send me copies of the papers published in their parishes.

LAW BOOKS TO LEND OR GIVE.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

A young man, colored, who has worked his way so far as to have graduated at Wayland Seminary, is anxious to enter the law department of Howard University, Washington. He hopes to support himself by outside work, but it will be difficult to earn extra money for his law books. The following books will be needed the first year. Can any lawyer or law student lend or give them to this young man? Sharswood's Blackstone's Commentary, Vols. I. and II.; Schouler on Domestic Relations; Tiedeman on Real Property; Tiedeman on Commercial Paper; Bishop on Contracts; Bouvier's Law Dictionaries, Vols. I. and II. Address C. M. THE PROBLEM OF THE UNEMPLOYED A MATTER OF CLERGY.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

I read with great interest your valuable suggestions on the waste of power every Sunday when any of the ministers are unemployed.

Will you print the enclosed letter from a correspondent of mine whose suggestions are of great value? He has found time to write it in the midst of most efficient duty; for, of all people who are to be called "unemployed," he would be the last to be mentioned.

It seems to me that the view which he expresses is very just. I send you the letter, in the hope that your correspondents in different parts of New England may be able to notify our central office at 25 Beacon Street of such churches as are closed for want of preachers. I do not mean Unitarian churches alone. I mean rather to speak of those localities where, from one discouragement or another, all church service has been suspended. I am disposed to believe that yesterday as many as two hundred churches were closed in different parts of Massachusetts. I know of one town in New England where four or five meeting-houses were not occupied yesterday.

EDWARD E. HALE.

The social problems at present uppermost in the public mind are those which concern the depression in business and the rapidly increasing number of those who, through no fault of their own, find themselves out of work and quite unable to procure employment.

The learned Professor of Christian Morals at Cambridge has within a few weeks most ably dealt with the matter in a lecture which all ought to read and ponder. He speaks not merely as a critic, but a philanthropist, as a student and pioneer; and therefore his findings and suggestions cannot fail to be of great practical helpfulness to those who are really seeking for a solution to this most distressing problem. The vast multitude of whom he speaks he puts into the following categories, — out-of-works, can't-works, don't-want-to-works, — asks what shall we do, and then proceeds to tell us some of the things that might be done to remedy this most appalling situation.

Surely, at this latter end of the nineteenth century of Christianity and of the civilization which accompanies it, we are justified in deciding that there must be something radically wrong with the social and industrial systems which not only permit, but produce, such conditions as these, in which unnumbered multitudes eager for employment, and fully equipped for it, are yet unable to get anything to do.

But what shall we say, what have we to say, when we find that almost identically the same condition of things exists in the ecclesiastical world? I speak now of the state of things in our own beloved Church, although the same conditions to a greater or less extent prevail in other churches.

During a recent visit to the city the writer learned that there were thirty-eight ministers of our Church in Boston and its vicinity out of work. Think of it! Men of ability and character, who had served their long apprenticeship at school and college and divinity school, and, some of them, many years in the larger university of practical experience, qualified and equipped for the noblest vocation a man is ever called to, and yet unable to get work, with the exception of an occasional opportunity to preach on Sunday. And the thing is growing worse. One man who used to find a place to preach, on an average, three Sundays out of four, is now preaching on one out of six. So he himself told me.

And this in full view of the great work needing to be done, the vast neglected, uncultivated vineyard, and the foxes spoiling the pleasant vines, and the Master waiting for laborers; and here were these thirty-eight men standing almost, some of them quite, all the day idle in the market-place, and saying, "Because no man hath hired us."

Surely, again, there is something wrong. Let us try to find out what it is. The writer will not presume to say what it is. Perhaps he does not know. At any rate, he will leave it for older and abler and wiser heads than his to announce to a perplexed and waiting Church.

One thing, however, he would claim as his privilege; and that is to suggest for consideration a plan by which some, at least, of our out-of-work brothers might be given a chance to exercise their ministry. Every now and then we hear of the moral decadence and spiritual destitution that mark some of our rural communities which lie remote from the larger and richer life of the towns and cities. And no one really knows what that means as does he who lives either in its midst or in close range or touch with it. Why should not some of our unemployed ministers unite in companies of threes or fives, or any adequate numbers, and go out and preach to and serve these neglected regions? Take, for instance, the hamlets and villages among the Berkshire hills. Let the men bind themselves together, not, of course, by any monastic vows, but some simple fraternal agreement, which will unite them as associates in a common work. They should be of our ablest and best-picked men, who, to use a Western phrase, can easily "shoot without a rest," who without the aid of a manuscript can stand up and say what is in their heart and mind concerning God and man and truth and duty. And then let them go and say it, preaching everywhere, in public halls and cottages, in barns and under trees, or in any place that offers. One minister might live in one village, another in another. There would be frequent exchanges and meetings for mutual conference and good fellowship, and the consequent stirring up of the thought and feeling of the people to better life, and no end of good accomplished.

But the query comes, Where is the money to do this? Lack of money to many seems the one respect that makes calamity, such calamity, of so long life. But it is not. It is a great obstacle, but not insurmountable. One cannot, of course, ignore the straitened financial conditions of the time; nor does he desire to forget that the authorities at headquarters are doing nobly all that lies in their power to provide such places as are available for our unattached ministers. But let what can be done. Under present conditions, as all know, there are not vacant parishes enough to provide permanent work for more than a few; and the state of the Association's treasury, we are told, is such as will not warrant the undertaking of any new ventures. Despite, however, the hard times in business, in spite of a depleted Association treasury, one still believes that there are enough rich and generous members of our Church who, if the opportunity were only given them, would gladly contribute the necessary funds to give this plan, with the right men ready to carry it out, a trial for at least a year. It is a matter of only a few thousand dollars,—say a thousand a year for each man in the work.

One of our church clubs could easily take such a matter as this in hand. The Unitarian Club, which scattered so generously the "Unitarian Annual" broadcast over the Church last year, might avail itself of the opportunity of sending in some such way the message by the living voices this year.

Perhaps the rich and young merchants and professional men of the Channing Club would find this an attractive object to their enthusiastic spirits, and among themselves provide the means to rise to this occasion, and so signalize their devotion to the truths and ideals which our Church stands pledged to propagate.

One thing is clear. In whatever aspect we regard this matter, whether as a question of unemployed ministers or of loyalty in that great cause to which last September we gave ourselves anew, the problem which confronts us is of the gravest and most serious importance. Something must be done. The situation must be realized and met. In view of the tremendous issues involved, it is altogether too deplorable to be borne much longer with any sort of credit to the Church.

SUSAN FENIMORE COOPER.

BY MRS. MARY JOHNSON.

With reverent hand we bind and on her casket lay
The sheaf of ripened wheat, meet emblem for to-day.

The gifted daughter of a gifted sire,
Her books gave dear delight by lamp and fire.
When threescore years crowned her with silver hair,
She did not say, "Now let me rest: I've done."
Her broad, protecting love drew little children in,
And built a fair, bright home to save from want and sin.

Now "INASMUCH" is shining on her brow,
A greater glory than her pen has won!
A sweet good-night, for long life nobly given:
God's silent angel kissed her, and she slept.
But who shall paint the rapture for her kept,
When she awoke to the New Year of heaven!

EVERY-DAY PHILOSOPHY.

BY WILLIAM ROUNSEVILLE ALGER.

IV.

Who should be first among men? He who sets the highest original example.

Men of genius, often visited by inspiration, almost always suffer two great griefs. The first is that they cannot hold themselves constantly at the elevation of their noblest insights; and the second is the want of companions competent to receive the messages they long to communicate.

How shall we define the Best? The Best is that which cannot be thought not to be, and better than which nothing can be thought. The Best, therefore, is really God.

When does man become most truly great, admirable, and happy? Then only when, in his harmonized and illuminated personality, sense, intelligence, affection, will, and conscience, all work simultaneously together without jar or friction. In other words, the perfection of human nature consists in the co-operative unity of all its powers at the same time that their distinctions are sharply preserved.

By means of language each one can give to all every new good he achieves in the spiritual order, and the whole can give itself unimpaired to every one. In our material civilization the parts and the whole must be taught to combine and separate, play in and out, with the same melodious spontaneity, the same freedom from collisions and discords, which the mental world exhibits. In knowledge and virtue there is no monopoly or hostility, but whatever one has all can have at the same time. Some day this exuberance of disinterestedness must set the pattern and give the law in the political order, too. The only way in which our universal human life can be a successful symphony is by each man occupying his appropriate place, playing his own part, sounding his proper notes. When co-operation is perfected, in some not remote future, the life of society will move as harmoniously as the astronomic orbs already do.

THE EXPOSURE OF A FALLACY.

Much of the prevalent unbelief of the sublimest doctrines of religion springs from the ordinary predominance of the imagination, which thinks in sensuous images alone, over the speculative reason, which deals with pure ideas. The intellect when properly trained, as we see exemplified both in metaphysical science and mathematical science, easily and distinctly grasps the concept of the infinite in all its varieties, and makes valid dialectic use of it. But fancy can never possibly present any material figure of the infinite in any domain of its activity. The notions of free spirit, eternity, immortality, God, therefore necessarily baffle those whose thinking sticks fast to the figurate species. Gross fallacies often arise thus and hold fatal sway in persons who have not attained the mastery of immaterial intellection. Speculative reason conceives the idea of an omnipresent being with perfect distinctness, but it is obvious that the imagination is utterly impotent to make a picture of omnipresence. A failure of faith in an immortal life, for man, generated by this sophism of putting fancy in the place of reason, is seen in the following example, quoted from the confessions of a recent eminent writer: "Myself a grain of clay upon this tiniest of little worlds, when I think of the chaos of greater universes and the irrevocable circles of eternity, I fold the wings of aspiration and discontent, and wait in patience till the chemistry of the years resolves me into my elements." So wrote the gifted John Addington Symonds with his deep tinge of melancholy and eloquence. But is not the complete sophistry of this crushing contrast of the dread impression of material bulks with the hidden mystery of the spirit, clearly exposed in a moment when we notice the facility with which our spaceless thought takes up and transcends the most tremendous extensions of matter and time? The secret essence of human nature, in its thinking power, in its insatiable demands forever growing by what they feed on, in its indissoluble union with the creative energy of God, is immeasurably greater than any material immensity. And, when once aroused to the ideal consciousness of its prerogatives, it faces the phantom of annihilation only to annihilate it with a smile of disdain.

JESUS AS SAVER.

BY E. P. POWELL.

What a pity that the dear good words "save" and "right" should be swallowed up in the theological phraseology savior and righteousness. The simplest meaning of saving seems rarely to get into the minds of worshippers, and rightness seems somehow to them very unlike righteousness. But the only practical as well as historically correct view of Jesus is as the one who wished to save us by means of rightness. Right and righteous and righteousness are of the same sort, and no one can justly make anything of righteousness but being right. The charm of the word is not lessened, and its meaning is made doubly sure, when we find it one of the oldest ever invented. Ritu in Sanskrit is the mother of right and righteousness as well as rites, and it meant straightforward. The crooked man and the crooked way were as clearly evil to primitive man as to the most advanced Christian. To go straightforward as the stars go and the sun goes, this, says Müller, became the first ideal of human goodness. There seems to have been some such original root for good and God, but we have lost it. To save was originally used as an economic term, and opposed to waste. There was no crime, after crookedness, that outranked wastefulness. This idea of saving, passed over to a human being, meant to save all his power and his faculties. Salvation is, when rightly used, no more nor less than to make the most of ourselves. Originally and accurately, it had nothing more to do with the next life than with this life. A savior is nothing but a saver, and with this interpretation we greatly magnify the calling. "Jesus Christ, Savior of the world," is Jesus Christ entering into such relation with us as to save us from losing our manhood, our powers for eternal living, our abilities, intellectually and morally. And this sort of salvation is, I take it, what in the future Jesus will more remarkably do than he has in the past. Unfortunately, the world for ages has been trying to be saved from a future hell, from punishment for damnableness rather than from the real damnable soul conditions. I once learned a sore lesson in my Sunday-school of five hundred boys and girls. "Which," I said, "is the worst, to steal or be caught and sent to prison?" A big shout went up that to be sent to prison was worst. Allowing a good deal for the more practical relation of physical affairs to childhood, I felt sure that in our average Christian bringing up there was a good deal more purpose to sneak out of punishment than to back out of sin; and, if one studies the theological curriculum, he will see that our creeds have for their burden being saved, not from waste, but from the deserts of wastefulness. So we go on till we are one-third, one-half, one-tenth lost hopelessly, irrevocably, and call it salvation if the meagre remnant be not thrust into some future torment place. The whole notion is nonsensical. Carlyle says the main thing is not whether we shall be preserved hereafter, "but whether our contemptible little souls will be worth saving." On the whole, had not a perverted flossam of a soul, better go out than be kept through eternity in a museum of salvation? I do not mean to speak lightly of this matter, but I wish to get into a clear strong light the need of a complete readjustment of our religious culture. What I wish my boy to understand is that he is made up of faculties and powers at which nature has worked for millions of years, and with which she has endowed him. I am anxious that he shall not be one iota less than he can be. What I wish to see saved is the wholeness of that personality which passes as my boy Bayard. This it has come to seem to me to be the gospel of Jesus. It rings from end to end with the idea of saving. He fairly passes among all men of genius as the savor.

This kind of salvage evidently cannot be brought about by any mercantile means, nor by substitution of a sound soul and a whole soul for my diseased and half-wasted soul. So we are compelled to give up the notion of atonement, in the creed sense, altogether; and the doctrine of the divine nature of Jesus will not help us at all. The at-one-ment of the Saxon seems nearer what we want. The secret of Jesus' ability to save was his recognition of our need of being saved and our capacity for it. It was a glorious hope for man that rung out in Judea in those days. Strike out that development from history, and we should be rioting in hopelessness. "On earth peace good will to men." The key is, however, in the charge, "Work out your own salvation because God works in you." No snarl of logic in that. Jesus broke up the mist of scepticism that had settled over the world, and he filled the people with hope. Paul summed up his notion of Christianity as faith, hope, and love. This was not the spirit of the world. This we know well, if we study all the contemporary workers of that age and of the ages preceding. Jesus restored the Father to the family. Do you work now to save yourself "because God is in you." This idea grew, "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God?" And it must grow still. Every advance in the process of saving, really saving, from soul and body loss must take place in connection with a new conception of our oneness with God. We are the children of God.

Jesus was killed when about thirty, Socrates when over eighty. Jesus has left us the religion of perennial youth, Socrates the religion of speculation and doubt. How fortunate for the world that Jesus died early! He had not outlived the dreams of the good. His ideals were just in the forming. Every word he has left us is vital, warm, life-full. If you want the fountain of youth, go to the life and words and works of the boy Savior. I do not speak it irreverently, for there is nothing more divine than youth. Not a sentiment smells of weariness, not an opinion comes of feebleness, not a view is born of decay. It is all life, pure life, in its fresh flow from God. Had Jesus lived to be an old man, would his discouragements and disappointments have formed a later chapter to his gospel? As it is, whatever pessimism has come into Christianity has not come from its founder. He is the beautiful youth in the full flush of Apollo strength, with a virtuous heredity, a wholesome desire, a perfect digestion, and a marvellously vital atmosphere. Go, thou dyspeptic, sleepless, scolding, word-sharpening Carlyle to this sunrise, and tell us frankly that, compared with such straightforward joyousness, your afternoon indigested philosophy is worthless. It is the man first of all, the youth. The Greeks succeeded only in painting an Apollo, the Jews surpassed the world in living one. It is to him we go rather than to the books about him, and we find God in the flesh rather than in the marble. Thanks to the Greeks, more thanks to the Jews.

CHURCHLY RELIGION.

BY REV. S. FLETCHER WILLIAMS.

There prevail to-day conceptions of Christianity which stand in vivid contrast to the New Testament representation. Perhaps the most fashionable notion is that of "a church." It is to a corporate organization that people look for a manifestation of religious power. Churchly observances are expected to supply the vitalizing energy that should advance Christian civilization. It matters little what form the notion takes: the substance is always the same. The force that will regenerate the earth is vested in an infallible church, or it is communicated by the touch of fingers which claim a priestly virtue derived in unbroken succession from Saint Peter, or it inheres in a particular mode of baptism, or in reverencing and obeying the priest as the sole medium by whom grace and truth come from God to mankind, and by whom pardon is conveyed to sinners; for in something like a five-minute ceremony the newly ordained priest receives the Holy Spirit, and is endowed with the power both to forgive sins and to retain them. The late Cardinal Manning told us that we should not be able to deal with the great evils of mankind until we yielded to the priesthood as a body of men chosen by "our Lord," illuminated, trained, and conformed to himself, to be the guardians and transmitters of the truths he reveals to them and of the laws he gives into their custody. Cardinal Manning is not alone in claiming power and pre-eminence for an organized hierarchy. As well as Roman Catholic and Episcopal High Churchmen, there are Baptist, Methodist, Congregational, and Unitarian High Churchmen,—men in every communion who, in one way or another, put the church before the individual, the machinery before the life, the letter before the spirit. It was against this enslaving error that Wiclif, Tyndale, Latimer, and Luther consecrated their energies; and the spirit of the great reformers is needed now as vitally as ever, for the doctrine is being persistently, stealthily, inwoven into the fibres of our religious life, until by multitudes of the English people Christianity is identified with a sacramental religion, with forms, rites, creeds, exhibitions of millinery, apocryphal successions from the apostles, powers of unearthly origin and yet not of heavenly descent, mystical and cabalistic virtues, and sacred enclosures, where spiritual vitality is manufactured and imported by machinery. Are these revivals of the Middle Ages likely to advance religion? Are these figments of the centuries of old the true representations of Christ's Christianity, the simple but potent Christianity, fair as the moon, bright as the sun, mighty as an army with banners? What are they doing now but deluding thousands by teaching them that they cannot come face to face with God, cannot commune with him heart to heart, but only through the medium of church or priest or form? What are they doing but arrogating pretensions intolerant and dangerous,—pretensions hostile to the liberties which the Reformation secured, inimical to the exercise of man's highest faculty, the reason, antagonistic to the play of that personal power which is essential to the purest, noblest, and most robust Christianity? What are they doing but letting in the monstrous idea of the supernatural power of the priesthood, and thus opening the door for whatever claims they may presumptuously put forth? "All this clamor about church," said Dr. Arnold, "is only a clamor about priest"; and it really means that there is no divine power in Christianity apart from the priest.

The New Testament idea is of a different type. To-day Christianity is often interpreted as meaning a church; and, when we speak of it, people think of it as the church, the book, the ministry, the organization, rarely as a personal moral quality. Then Christianity meant a divine individuality. That is a vast, a fundamental distinction. The one is an external corporation, the other an inward excellence. The one is an article of machinery, the other a spiritual power in the individual soul. The one preaches dependence upon the forms and sacraments of the church, the other the indispensableness of cultivating a divine manhood in each human being. The one teaches that the power of the spirit of God in the souls of men is communicated only through the priest: the other teaches that it consists in a living holiness, which flows, not through priestly pedigree, but in a direct line from God to man, and which will pour itself into every one who surrenders to the heavenly will. The one, in short, builds religion on the outside, and strives mainly for such a material kingdom of God on earth as can be represented in aggregate organizations of Christianity: the other builds religion within the individual man, and strives mainly for such a kingdom of God as can be seen, not in the cathedral, the temple, the synagogue, the church, the organizations, the denominations, but in the living force of holy women and great-souled men.

It is this power of the interior life of a man that is wanted to-day especially to be brought to the front. Why is it that Christianity has made so little progress in the world? Partly because its professors have devoted their activities to analyzing and defining it rather than living it, because they have given themselves to formulating creeds about it,—and creeds that have fostered a malign element as a moral force, creeds that have presented a Being that never will subdue the world, and never ought to subdue it, because they have been less bent on cultivating the soul of piety than on forming churches, with outward unity and powerful hierarchies. Why, organized Christianity, as far as it has yet been seen, has been the bane of religion. Religion has not been saved by the priesthood, but by radiant, attractive individual lives here and there, which have been the salt of the earth. The vast corporations of the religious world have been the oppressors of the spiritual life; and they have generated such dreadful discords, such bitter quarrels, such outrageous cruelties, such immeasurable evils, that one almost wonders there has been any beneficence at all in religion. And there would not have been but for individuals giving forth the blessing of their sweet and glorious natures. And now, as of old, the real enemy of Christianity is to be found neither in theological speculation nor in science, but in those efforts in which powerful parties in the Christian world are now busily at work,—those efforts to spread and exalt Christianity, as they think, but really, alas! to limit and degrade it, by constructing outward organizations, by establishing spiritual despotisms. It is Christianity made known to the world as a personal moral quality that is wanted. It is the grandeur of the kingdom of God in the individual life that is the imperative need of the present age. The enormous and pompous organization of churches has been tried through whole ages, and Christianity does not yet reign even in Christendom. Christianity will not attain supremacy until for reverence for churches there has been substituted and made dominant the culture of the living power of the individual as the true aim of all Christian teaching and effort.

DISFRANCHISEMENT FOR ELECTION FRAUDS.

BY REV. LYMAN CLARK.

Now that the tide of patriotic condemnation is rising, which, it is to be hoped, will overwhelm all who engage in the corruption of the ballot, it is a good time to obey that injunction of our constitutions which commands a frequent recurrence to the fundamental principles of truth, justice, and civil right. Let the inquiry be, What is the proper punishment for election frauds? The most elementary principle that we may apply to all violations of a public trust is that the person who violates a trust, whatever other penalties he may suffer, should be deprived of the trust. This is the first natural consequence of the wrong. Good common business sense forbids continuing a man in the exercise of a trust which he uses corruptly for private advantage and public injury.

The highest trust which any one can assume is that of the government of the country. If the king, the president, or the governor, sells the public service for personal gain, he deserves to be removed from office. He is corruptly exercising his trust, and is unworthy to exercise it longer. In the United States the people are sovereign. Every voter is a fractional king. A voter who may be bribed is not fit to be a voter. The person who bribes a voter is not fit to be a voter. Both should be deprived of a trust which they use corruptly. They should be disfranchised.

The writer is not aware (but is willing to be informed, if such is the fact) that disfranchisement has been applied as the penalty for election frauds in the United States. In England it is applied, not only in case of the single voter, but of the community. In case of great prevalence of bribery the borough may be disfranchised as a political constituency. This compels the community to take an interest in the purity of the ballot-box, else it may lose the franchise entirely. Now, whatever other devices of legislation may be adopted for the purpose of preserving the purity of the ballot, as disqualification for office on the part of candidates who bribe in their own behalf, or requiring a report of receipts and expenses of political committees, I submit the reasonableness of the penalty of disfranchisement as the proper punishment for election frauds. It may reasonably be supposed that the law would be more likely to be enforced with this penalty than with others. Its reasonableness would be generally admitted. In case of duelling, this penalty was established for the purpose of making the crime disreputable. It was thought with good reason that men would not wish lightly to imperil their right to the common privileges of citizenship. Bribery is a disreputable crime. Those who bribe look with contempt upon the "floater," although the common tendency of legislation has been to treat the man who bribes as the greater criminal and justly so, for the reason that he is usually a man of good position. Those of whom we should like to think as our best people for public spirit in other respects sometimes engage in election frauds. It is to be hoped that, if the penalty of disfranchisement were applied, they would learn to look upon themselves with contempt until purged from the guilt.

Inasmuch as a number of legislatures are understood to be engaged in consideration of the means for the better purification of the ballot, this appears to be a good time for the settlement of the question whether or not the small army of people who have to be paid from year to year for going to vote, and the smaller number who corruptly pay them for personal advantage, shall be allowed to maintain their standing as voters, proper persons to take part in the kingly duties of governing the country. Let the law disfranchise them, this penalty to be avoided by the simple method of an honest use of the ballot-box.

Since writing the above a copy of the Election Laws of Missouri has been received, and under the head of "Qualifications of Voters" we find this provision: "Nor shall any person convicted of felony or other infamous crime, or of a misdemeanor connected with the exercise of the right of suffrage, be permitted to vote at any election, unless he shall have been granted full pardon; and after a second conviction of felony or other infamous crime, or of a misdemeanor connected with the exercise of the right of suffrage, he shall be forever excluded from voting." Accepting a bribe being defined as a misdemeanor, and giving or offering a bribe a felony, permanent disfranchisement is one of the penalties of crimes against suffrage, except in case of a full pardon, and then in case of a second conviction.

MR. MOZOOMDAR'S WORK.

The many friends of Mr. P. C. Mozoomdar in this country, and especially those who have contributed to the Mozoomdar Mission Fund, will be glad to learn something of Mr. Mozoomdar's work in India during the past year.

The Interpreter, the monthly edited by Mr. Mozoomdar, contains a general view of that work. We omit the account of his homeward voyage, which has already been noticed in these columns, and also the hearty reception he received in Calcutta. Referring to this, Mr. Mozoomdar says:—

CALCUTTA.

The chief feature of my return and reception was the cordial sympathy shown by sections of the community not very sympathetic before. Raja Peary Mohan Mukerjee, a rising leader of the Hindu community, was among the many who so kindly came to the railway station to welcome us. All the missionaries of the Brahmo-Somaj of India then resident in Calcutta also came. The young men, of whom there were scores, if not hundreds, were loud and almost wild in their enthusiasm. Addresses of full sympathy and confidence came from six different bodies, three of whom were unconnected with the Brahmo-Somaj, and the other three from Brahmo ladies and gentlemen who ignored sectional differences in the impulses of brotherly feeling. All this is worth mention not in the selfish consciousness of honor shown to a particular individual, but in the prospect of united work and wide usefulness kept in prospect for the future. The union of all advanced men in the Brahmo-Somaj, to whatever branch they may belong, must some day become an accomplished fact.

I arrived in Calcutta in the midst of the anniversary celebrations, wherein I was delighted to take part. My chief duty was a public statement of all that I experienced in America in the way of religious progress and sympathy with different religious communities. Now, this sympathy and progress exactly represent the position of the Brahmo-Somaj: the triumph of truth and love means the triumph of our cause. The subject of our discourse, therefore, delivered on the 2d of February in the Town Hall, was "The World-wide Triumph of our Cause." The governor of Bengal and a large, appreciative audience gathered to express their good will and sympathy. The cordiality of the American public was thus responded to by the cordiality of the Indian public, and we felt the spirit of liberal religion was everywhere on the ascendant. It is perhaps generally known that our relations with the Society for the Higher Training of Young Men, founded four years ago, have been most intimate. The young men who are its members are many of them outside the Brahmo-Somaj, nevertheless they are much attached to us personally. It is, therefore, our agreeable duty to work among them whenever an opportunity occurs. We addressed them more than once on American civilization and American character, so that they might be penetrated with the genius of public and private life in the New World. They are all of them delighted to hear of America as often as they are spoken to, and often I have felt the wish that there were some American at my side to help me to do this. Much good may yet come out of this society.

BEHAR.

Toward the end of February Mr. Mozoomdar went on a tour to Behar. Though, indeed, some need of rest was felt after the labors of the last year, our brethren in the provinces were so eager to hear the glad tidings from the Parliament of Religions that repeated calls obliged us to leave Calcutta on a tour to Behar toward the end of February. As a centre of Brahmo religious life, no place is more noteworthy in Upper India than Bankipur (Patna); and to that place, therefore, I first bent my steps. The leaders there do not confine themselves to strictly devotional pursuits, but have earnestly undertaken female education and the moral training of young men on the same lines as the Society for the Higher Training of Young Men in Calcutta. This threefold description of work, religious, educational, and moral, precisely answers our notions of serving the public; and it was a pleasure, therefore, to help and encourage the local workers.

BHAGALPUR AND DARJEELING.

Bhagalpur is another important Brahmo-Somaj centre in that part of the country, and therefore claimed our service and attention. Bhagalpur has also a corresponding Society for the Higher Training of Young Men, which celebrated its anniversary, and presented to us an address of sympathy. The whole month of March was spent in touring through Behar and Oudh, holding services, delivering lectures, solemnizing marriages, and helping local work of various kinds. April in Calcutta begins to grow warm in right earnest, but there was a good deal to do there; and, after going through all the pressing engagements that presented themselves, I left for Darjeeling on the 1st of May. Darjeeling, being the summer seat of the local government, is not so helpful to retirement and meditation as my little hermitage at Kurseong. But it does offer some opportunity of public usefulness. There were the weekly services of the local Somaj to conduct, and occasional lectures in the Town Hall for the benefit both of the native and European public.

Mr. Mozoomdar returned to Calcutta in July, and worked for nearly three months, and then left for Simla in the last week of September.

A TOUR IN UPPER INDIA.

The tour in Upper India is described at length by a Punjabi Brahmo, from whose interesting account we make the following extracts:—

In response to the very earnest and repeated invitations of his Brahmo brethren, Rev. P. C. Mozoomdar lately paid a visit to the Punjab. More than four years ago he came to this province on a missionary tour; and all his friends, both old and young, were naturally very desirous to meet him again. Mr. Mozoomdar arrived at Simla on the 30th of September, and, in spite of many inconveniences, put up at the Asram of the Himalayan Brahmo-Somaj, and stayed there all the while he was at Simla. He kept indifferent health. Nevertheless, he was able to conduct the congregational services in the Brahma Mandir. His presence necessarily drew a large number of worshippers, and so impressive were his sermons that a good many people outside the pale of the Brahmo-Somaj began to take a lively interest in his work. At their special request, and with subscriptions voluntarily raised among themselves, the Town Hall, which, though built with the people's money, cannot be had free, was engaged, and arrangements made for a special lecture of Mr. Mozoomdar. As was to be expected, the meeting was very successful. Hon. Sir Alexander Miller, the Law Member of the Supreme Council, than whom there is not another Englishman among our rulers more friendly to the cause of Indian Reform, honored the Brahmo-Somaj by presiding at the lecture. The educated Indians went in crowds, and listened to the utterances of the great Brahmo leader on the Universal Religion of the New Dispensation. It is Mr. Mozoomdar's principle, wherever he goes, to try by all possible means to promote friendly relations between different sections of the Indian community; and, with this object in view, several meetings were held at the station, at which many leading native gentlemen were present. During his short stay at Simla Mr. Mozoomdar had interviews with the Viceroy, the Lieutenant Governor of the Punjab, Sir Alexander Miller, and Sir Anthony MacDonell; and with each and all of them he held very important conversations on matters involving the vital interests of his countrymen.

LAHORE.

Mr. Mozoomdar left Simla on the 8th of November, and proceeded to Lahore to conduct the thirty-second anniversary of the Punjab Brahmo-Somaj, reaching there on the following morning. In spite of the very early hour of his arrival, all the leading members and sympathizers of the Brahmo-Somaj were present at the railway station to accord him a hearty welcome. He met one and all of his old friends with most affectionate greetings, and seemed to feel much gratified at their deep attachment to him and to his life-work. Mr. Mozoomdar stayed at Lahore for about a fortnight; but during this short period he found very hard work to do, the programme of his lectures and addresses having already been announced to the public. Hardly a day passed without one or two engagements.

In the evening of the 9th of November, the very day of his arrival at Lahore, he gave his opening address in connection with the anniversary. Fully an hour before the time of the lecture the audience had begun to assemble. The crowd was so large that the whole of the inside of the Mandir, as well as the gallery and verandas of the hall on all sides, was full; and not a few had to go away disappointed for want of accommodation. The audience was composed mostly of students of different colleges, over whom Mr. Mozoomdar exercises a marvellous influence. He is a great friend of young men. Though grown in years, he has the earnestness and enthusiasm of youth in him in its full vigor; and that is perhaps one reason why he loves them so much.

The appearance of Mr. Mozoomdar on the platform was the occasion of great excitement. He stood up to address this large assembly in the midst of deafening and prolonged cheers. He began by saying that at the World's Fair last year at Chicago the American boys contributed one penny each; and with this large quantity of copper a great national bell was cast, called the Liberty Bell. This huge bell was struck ten times at the inaugural meeting of the Parliament of Religions, the ten strokes being given each in honor of the ten great religions of the world. Mr. Mozoomdar said that he, too, was going to strike ten strokes that evening; that is to say, he would speak ten words about the prevailing principles of the world's religious belief. In short, in a very impressive speech, which lasted an hour, he explained some of the characteristic features of the religion of the New Dispensation: (1) The unity of God, (2) The necessity of divine worship, (3) Living faith in a Personal Deity, (4) Purity of character, (5) Service of humanity, (6) Self-sacrifice, (7) Conquest of passions, (8) Acceptance of all Scriptures, (9) Honor of all prophets, (10) Universal Church.

A SINGING PROCESSION.

On Saturday, in the afternoon, the Brahmo community, headed by Mr. Mozoomdar, after a short prayer offered by him, started from the Brahma Mandir for Nagar Sankirtan, on a singing procession through the streets of Lahore. The singing was enthusiastic. There were short addresses delivered in Hindi to the masses at some of the principal centres of the town; and the processionists returned to the Mandir at 7 P.M., when Lala Shiv Dyal, M.A., gave an address on the life and teachings of Guru Nanak, the great prophet of the Punjab.

At the close of the lecture Mr. Mozoomdar spoke a few words, expressing his great admiration for the founder of the Sikh religion. The remarkable simplicity of his creed was pointed out. The history of the Church of Baba Nanak, as he very pertinently observed, has proved that theism is not the faith merely of the learned few, as is so often asserted, but that it can be, as in the case of Sikhs, the religion of the great masses of simple, unsophisticated men and women.

Sunday was the Utsab day. In the morning service Babu P. C. Mozoomdar preached a very instructive sermon on the three kinds of Bhakti (the love of God), known in the Vaishnava Shastras as Samip, Salak, Sayuj; and in the course of the evening worship he impressed upon the congregation the great importance which the New Dispensation attaches to a life which is spent for the good of others. At noon food was distributed to poor people; and, in the afternoon Mr. Mozoomdar blessed the little children of Brahmos, gathered in the Mandir.

On Monday Lala Ruchi Ram Sabni, M.A., gave a lecture on the subject of science and religion; and after the address was over Mr. Mozoomdar in a short speech explained that the religion of the Brahmo-Somaj is in perfect accord with the spirit of true science.

The following afternoon Mr. Mozoomdar presided at the meeting of the Nari Somaj held in the Mandir, and gave a very instructive sermon in Hindi to a large number of Punjabi ladies present on the occasion. In the evening the secretary of the Punjab Brahmo-Somaj had to lecture on the "Rise and Progress of the Brahmo-Somaj"; but, as that day was the birth anniversary of Guru Nanak, the engagement was cancelled, to give Mr. Mozoomdar an opportunity to address a very large gathering of Sikhs held in the city under the auspices of the Gurú Hiti-kārni Sabha. On Wednesday Mr. Mozoomdar delivered another public address, and the subject on which he spoke was the "Religious Needs of the Punjab."

THE RELIGIOUS NEEDS OF THE PUNJAB.

The attendance was as large as on the former occasion. The accommodation in the Brahma Mandir, however, was found so very scanty that Mr. Mozoomdar's closing address was reserved for a more spacious hall. As the space at our disposal is limited, we will give here only the substance of what Mr. Mozoomdar said on the subject of the Religious Needs of the Punjab.

At the outset Mr. Mozoomdar admired our unbounded enthusiasm in the search of truth; but he told us, in the plainest terms, that we had religiously very much degraded ourselves. We were, in the first place, lacking in the spirit of devotion. We will mention our failings almost in Mr. Mozoomdar's own words. "What ails you Punjabis," he said, "that you have forgotten the great devotional lesson of Guru Nanak's life,—the one great centre of religious life in the Punjab? The sooner you return to the simple piety of Nanak, the better. You let your sacred books ride on the back of the elephant, you fan them, you drape them with many costly covers. If you must do all this, well do; but, for all that, how dare you to be unmindful of the great formless Nirankar, the transcendental glory of God? Nanak's essential point, Nanak's chief art, did not lie in angry controversy, or in writing penny newspapers, and abusing people in the crudest language. He never did this. . . . Living amidst such scenes, inheriting such traditions, do you or do you not feel the old ecstasy for devotion? If you do not, then take my word that is the first great religious need of the Punjab."

"Nanak did not go on preaching with sword and fire in his hand; but how was it, then, that multitudes flocked round him, and accepted his simple gospel? There is no chemical combination so effective as the combining power of love. When that power fills the soul, a stream of occult attraction is sent forth; and thousands of spiritual arrows go and penetrate men's hearts. Love is the great gravitation of the spiritual world. If I love you, you are powerless in my hands. But is love all in all? Love is a camphor which diffuses itself abroad, but slowly evaporates. Religious feelings are very good. No progress is ever possible without them. They are the muscles and sinews of religion. But what is the good of flesh and sinew without a backbone? The backbone of religious life is made up of sound doctrines and definite principles which cannot be mistaken. The essential doctrines of every religion are few, so very few, indeed, that every man can remember them, and at the same time can easily believe them. Devotions and doctrines are all very good, but something more is required. Education is the great need of every religious body, and particularly so of religious societies in the Punjab, not that education merely which is imparted in your schools and colleges, but the education that unfolds and develops all the speculative and practical faculties of human nature, the education of the mind and the body, the education not only of man, but of woman also."

Lastly, Mr. Mozoomdar, in very earnest language, urged on us the necessity of religious union, of peace and good will, of a brotherly spirit, which shall unite all mankind in one broad universal church, with God, our Father. "Have one community," he said, "a brotherhood in the Brahmo-Somaj, with one aim and the same sympathetic impulses, in order that India may be glorified. This voice of mine has been raised before you and various races of my countrymen, alas! often in vain,—aye, now and then, too, it has been raised before other nations and in other lands; but now, daily, it is becoming fainter and fainter, and after a little more time it will stop. At this stage of my life I shall be glad to hear two thousand voices in the Brahmo-Somaj raised like mine, two thousand hearts embracing one another in the oneness of brotherhood, hating none, loving all."

On Thursday Lala Sundar Das Suri, M.A., gave a lecture on the Service of Religion; and on the following evening Mr. Mozoomdar presided at the anniversary meeting of the Sat-Sang. Short speeches were made by Babu A. C. Mozoomdar, Lala Udho Das Mehta, B.A., and Babu Bimal Chunder Ghose, M.A. The secretary of the Punjab Brahmo-Somaj, Lalla Kashi Ram, read a paper in which he explained that the religion of the New Dispensation is both natural and supernatural.

On Saturday Mr. Mozoomdar presided at the conference of the Punjab Brahmo-Somaj, at which proposals for the establishment of an orphanage were considered. The anniversary closed with a love feast, in which many Brahmo families joined. Next day after the morning service the photo of Mr. Mozoomdar, along with the members of the Somaj, was taken; and in the evening he delivered a sermon in connection with the congregational service.

OTHER ADDRESSES.

On Monday, the 19th of November, the birthday anniversary of our most revered and beloved minister, Keshub Chunder Sen, Mr. Mozoomdar held special service in the morning, and in the evening he visited the Anglo-Vedic College. On Tuesday evening he delivered his parting address in the hall of the Government College. The meeting was the largest ever held there. Mr. Mozoomdar gave an account of what he saw at Chicago last year, particularly of that marvellous assembly, the Parliament of Religions, at which the representatives of various faiths from all parts of the world met in brotherly love.

While at Lahore, Mr. Mozoomdar received invitations from friends at Jullundur and Saharanpur, and from our brethren of the New Dispensation Church in Sindh, Sukker, and Kurrachee; but he was unable to accept them. He left us on the 21st of November, and, halting a day or two at Meerut and Delhi, where in the Town Hall he delivered several short addresses, went on to Lucknow to conduct the anniversary of the Ayudhia Brahmo-Somaj.

From Lucknow he proceeded to Benares, where he gave a public lecture at the Town Hall on the Evolution of the Hindu Religion. From Benares he went to Ghazipur, where years ago he had established the Anjuman Am, a society comprising Musalman and Hindu leaders of the city. These gentlemen prevailed upon him to give a discourse on the Sympathy of Religions, which was very well attended. He thence proceeded to Calcutta, which was reached on 6th of December.

Mr. Mozoomdar's tour has more than ever convinced us that the greatest religious need of the Punjab is of a leader like himself, of catholic principle and pure life, a philosopher and a devotee, who will guide the rising generation both by precept and example.

Spiritual Life.

It is because we are children of God, because our nature is of the same eternal quality as his, that we may reverence ourselves, and confide that no work for the amelioration of the condition of humanity can be wasted or lost.—Joseph May.

The first lesson of the cross is the conquest of circumstances by character, the second is that suffering is not necessarily the result of the sin of the sufferer. Whether it is the result of sin at all we must consider later, but it certainly shows that it is no judgment upon him who suffers.—W. H. Lyon.

The light that lighteth every man may be dim, but it is very real: it is a faint dawn, but it is a prophecy of day. Where so much comes from more may be expected, only let us not avert our faces nor shut our eyes. If we walk in the light, we shall be children of the light. The truths we know or rationally believe are good to live by.—C. G. Ames.

It is wise to think of each year as it comes and goes not as a short, feverish breath, but as a long, momentous season filled with the toil that is gradually raising the walls of the great cathedral of humanity,—the imperishable walls of soul; the temple of character; the altar of virtue, whose official is the high priest, Conscience, whose ritual is duty, whose prayer is service, whose song is love and service its sacrifice.—Unity.

The "pleasant purpose" has balm in it. As the book of Proverbs has it, "Pleasant words are as a honeycomb, sweet to the soul and health to the bones." Sympathy cures. It can calm passion, soothe sorrow, and charm even bodily pain away. It is good for the headache and the heartache; it comforts the child, encourages the youth, heartens the toiler, and smooths the last stages of the aged; it is the angel who never dies, and whose word never ceases.—John Page Hopps.

What can the child on some great ocean steamer caught in a winter's storm do to overcome the tempest? Can it drive the fierce blasts back to their northern haunts? Can its little hand hold the wheel, and guide the great ship? Can its voice still the billows that can crush the steamer like an egg-shell? Can its breath destroy the icy coat of mail that covers all the decks? What the child can do is to trust the captain who has brought this same ship through a hundred hard storms. It can rest and trust and hope. And all we upon this great earth-ship have been caught, not in a storm, but in the Gulf Stream of God's providence.—Newman E. Hillis.

The Sunday School.

The usual Channing Hall "talks" at the Unitarian Building, 25 Beacon Street, will be held next Saturday, February 16. Subject, Lesson XXI, "Jesus at the Pool of Bethesda." Primary at 2 p.m., conducted by Miss A. C. Dockham; Intermediate and Advanced at three o'clock, led by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford. All cordially invited.

The Sunday-school work at Lawrence, Kan., is being prosecuted energetically, though the workers feel the loss deeply of Miss Marcella Howland. Prof. Carruth is as devoted as ever with his students' class in ethics. The Bible class on higher criticism makes quite a parlor full each Sunday. This department is conducted by the pastor, Dr. Howland, assisted by Prof. Newson.

There will be no new Easter Service published this year by the Unitarian Sunday School Society. It has been the custom to omit each alternate year the special service of any given festival day. There will be for sale reprints of the Easter Services for 1891, 1893, and 1894. These have all proven acceptable to the schools, and can well bear repetition. Price, 5 cents a copy, or $4 a hundred.

THE UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION OF BOSTON.—The fifth regular meeting will be held in the parlors of the Church of the Disciples, corner of Warren Avenue and West Brookline Street, Monday, February 18. Subject, "How to make the Sunday-school Room Attractive." Speakers, Mr. Henry T. Bailey, State supervisor of drawing, and Mr. John Lyman Faxon, secretary of the Public School Art League of America.

The current leaflet lessons on the "Life of Jesus" in the one-topic graded system are now out for March. There are five lessons for this month, the subjects being "Jesus and the Insane Girl," "The Transfiguration," "The Greatest in the Kingdom of Heaven," "Jesus and the Little Children," "Jesus and Zaccheus." The Intermediate are prepared by Rev. Edward A. Horton and the Advanced by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford. They are printed together in one leaflet. Price, 50 cents per hundred.

The Unitarian Sunday-school at Fall River, Mass., is conducted on very careful methods. The superintendent, Mr. Charles C. Ramsay, principal of the high school, has very clear ideas as to system. There are cards distributed to the teachers, with directions how to prepare a Sunday-school lesson. Other cards for pupils, assisting them to study the Sunday-school lesson. On entering the school, a pupil receives an admission card, giving the order of exercises, with special requests, seven in all, for the pupil to observe. No doubt Mr. Ramsay would gladly send samples of these cards and bulletins to any Sunday-school workers asking them from him.

NEW YORK SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.—At the February meeting of the New York Sunday School Union there was a pleasant discussion of last month's subject, "Music in our Sunday-schools." Mr. Camp opened with great praise of music and hymns, and, deploring the lack of common feeling among our churches, suggested that a few of the very best hymns, with the very best tunes, be chosen for common use in the Sunday-schools of our Union, to be learned by heart in all and sung often. The discussion was then carried on into various considerations by Rev. Russell Bellows, Rev. Samuel Eliot, Rev. George Badger, Rev. Frederick Gauld, Rev. Dr. Townsend, Rev. Mr. Brown, Mr. Mitchell, Mr. Styles, Miss Stone, Miss Curtis, and others, with the general conclusions that our children need technical training in singing, strong voices or single-voiced instruments to lead them, and great familiarity with what they sing. The choice of half a dozen hymns for common use was left with the Committee on the Whitsunday Union Service, which is to be held again this year in Brooklyn.

West Roxbury: In accepting the resignation of Rev. F. W. Pratt, the society of the First Parish passed resolutions expressing hearty appreciation of his work and profound regret at the thought of his leaving. His departure is felt to be a serious loss to the parish.

Second Church: The Second Church Branch of the Women's National Alliance: A lecture will be given in aid of the Branch by Rev. W. H. Lyon, on "Brook Farm," in the church chapel, Copley Square, Boston, Tuesday, February 19, at eight o'clock. Tickets can be obtained at the door.

Parker Memorial, corner Berkeley and Appleton Streets (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): Sunday evening, February 17, at 7.30, Rev. Mary T. Whitney. Subject, "The Art of Helping Others." Music by Mrs. L. M. Bartlett, soprano; Mr. L. M. Bartlett, tenor; Rossi Gish, violinist. All seats free.

The morning entertainment begins at 10 A.M., the one in the afternoon at 2.15. The music will be furnished by the Fadette Women's Orchestra. Five costume dances have been carefully prepared. The receipts of the entertainment are used for carrying on the work of the Memorial.

Mr. Elia S. Tovtcheff will deliver his entertaining and instructive lecture upon "The Social Life of the Turks" at Bulfinch Place Church on Monday evening, February 18, at 7.45. Mr. Tovtcheff will be dressed in the Turkish costume; and his lecture will be illustrated with Turkish arms, utensils, etc. All are cordially invited.

AUGUSTA, ME.—The meetings of the Maine Association of Liberal Christian Ministers give good evidence of the increasing interest in that association. The last meeting was held at Augusta on Tuesday, February 5, afternoon and evening. About fifteen ministers were present. The afternoon was devoted to the discussion of "Wealth against Commonwealth," by Mr. Henry D. Lloyd. The discussion was introduced by a paper presented by Rev. J. L. Marsh of Saco. The evening session was held in the Universalist church, Rev. C. A. Hayden, minister. The afternoon meeting had been in the Unitarian church, Rev. E. E. Newbert, minister. In the evening there was a large audience gathered to listen to four addresses on the following subjects:

"Liberalism and the Affairs of Men," by Rev. A. G. Pettengill of Yarmouth; "What yet Remains for us to Do," by Rev. E. L. Houghton of Fairfield; "The Newer Thinking and its Enthusiasm for Humanity," by Rev. E. J. Prescott; "The Four Steps in the Religious Life," by Rev. Henry Blanchard, D.D., of Portland. These meetings have been wholly successful in bringing together the liberal ministers in earnest discussion and companionship, without any denominational bias, but with a sincere desire for practical union. The ministers present represented the Swedenborgian, the Congregational (Orthodox), the Universalist, and the Unitarian denominations, all of whom took part in the exercises, and seemed to appreciate them no less than the dinner that was so well arranged at the Coney House. The next meeting will be held in Portland. The subject for discussion will be "Evolution." There are to be papers by Rev. S. C. Beach and Rev. H. R. Rose.

DIGHTON, MASS.—The Helpers' Guild, which was organized last summer in the Dighton Unitarian church by Rev. Mary L. Leggett, has just completed a successful series of Sunday evening readings and song services from Longfellow's religious poems, and is now entering upon a new outline of noble character studies in connection with Whittier's hymns. The guild has bound the young people together in helpful church activities, and is now a permanent living branch of church work and a social pride in the community.

FRANCE.—The question of miracles has been discussed recently in two sessions of the Société de Théologie de Paris, and has awakened great interest. Le Protestant thinks the question cannot clearly be discussed without an exact definition of terms. It is also a question of the problem of the authority of the texts of the sacred books. "No one among us believes in the miracles of Lourdes, or Catholic miracles in general, still less in Mohammedanism or Buddhistic miracles. Many persons, on the contrary, theological and laical, believe in Biblical miracles. Is it because these are better attested? That is impossible. The Biblical miracle no one of us has seen. The contemporaneous miracle has ocular witnesses. There are those of our contemporaries who have seen cures accomplished at Lourdes; and we say to them most tranquilly: 'You have seen badly. The fact is inexact; or, if you have seen rightly, the fact is real: it is not miraculous.' The same persons who use this language because they do not believe in apparitions and the miraculous power of the Virgin Mary believe that Elijah really ascended to heaven in a chariot of fire, because that fact is related in a certain book which in their eyes is authoritative." The article concludes: "The question, then, which is at the bottom of all discussion is the question of the authority of the sacred writings and writers. So long as that is not elucidated we shall not arrive at any precise solution of the question of miracle neither in the one sense nor the other, neither for nor against."

KEENE, N.H.—The Unitarian Club of Keene, N.H., held its February meeting last Wednesday evening in the parish house connected with the new church. The president, Dr. George B. Twitchell, introduced the subject,—namely, "A Living Church,"—and then called upon various members to consider different phases of it. Mr. Kimball spoke on the "Duty of the Church to Strangers"; Mr. H. O. Coolidge, on the "Message of the Church"; Dr. H. K. Faulkner, on the "Church as a Force in the Community"; Mr. F. W. Chase, on "The Sunday Religious Service"; Mr. Virgil Wright, on "The Relation of the Church to Other Churches"; and Mr. G. H. Eaner, on "The Church and the Children." After a summary of the leading points by Rev. C. B. Elder, the minister of the church, the club adjourned, with the feeling that a profitable evening had been spent together, and that it was not true that the laymen could not and would not speak.

OAKLAND, CAL.—Rev. C. W. Wendte's church reports that it "has solved the church choir problem very satisfactorily by engaging the most competent conductor in the city and organizing a volunteer chorus of thirty voices. For three years now they have sung together, and given excellent performances of worthy music. There has been unbroken harmony between its members, and pastor and choir work sympathetically together. Several of the singers are equal to solo parts. If a church can afford a quartette of well-trained voices for the solo parts, well and good; but the leader and the chorus cannot be dispensed with in a church that strives to be democratic. For there are in every congregation those to whom the training of a chorus choir is acceptable, and whose interest and strength can be secured in this way when in no other."—Parish Visitor.

Mr. Wendte began on January 13 a course of fortnightly illustrated lectures on "Sundays in Italy," as follows: Milan, and the Cities and Scenery of Northern Italy; Venice in Art and Story; Florence: Its Men and Memories; Rome: Ancient and Early Christian; Rome: Mediæval and Modern; Naples and its Bay. The lectures are informal and largely reminiscent, preceded by a service of worship and song. Mrs. Wilkes, the assistant pastor, has been taking a brief vacation in Southern California.

PASSAIC, N.J.—The Unitarian society of Passaic has extended a unanimous call to Rev. Frank S. C. Wicks, a graduate of Meadville in the class of 1894, and now a post-graduate student at Harvard Divinity School. Mr. Wicks has accepted the call, and will be installed early in the month of March. The society has obtained the use of the Masonic Temple of Passaic for its place of worship.

PLAINFIELD, N.J.—The people have organized themselves into the William Phillips Tilden Guild under the direction of their pastor, Rev. Hobart Clark, to further the interests of the church, and to do all they can to promote the religious life among its members. Its first religious meeting was held on Sunday evening, January 20, a goodly number attending. The meeting was led by Edgar H. Mumford, who made very clear to those present the object of the guild. He also paid a fitting tribute to the memory of Rev. William P. Tilden, the first pastor of the church, for whom the guild is named. The second meeting, February 3, was to have been conducted by Miss Barber, one of the teachers in the high school; but, owing to her illness, it fell to the warden of the guild, who is the pastor himself, to lead the meeting. His subject was "Discipline," which was, as usual, ably treated. There is also an efficient Social Committee, whose intention it is to give monthly social entertainments, that nothing may be lacking in forming a bond of union among themselves, or in attracting others to join them in their endeavor to establish a living church in this community. May they never grow weary in their endeavors to set their light upon a hill, that it may cast its beams far and wide!

PORTLAND, ORE.—The annual meeting of the parish occurred in January. Reports for the year showed the weekly attendance at church service large and increasing. There are now fully 350 families connected with the parish, and the church has 459 members. The Sunday-school is pursuing a series of Old Testament lessons, uniform for the whole school, with the aid of teachers' meetings taught by the pastor, and regular reviews and examinations. For the first time the school was continued all summer, with an average attendance of 77, the average during the rest of the year being 175. The total enrolment during the year was 289. The attendance at present is ranging between 200 and 240 each Sunday. The kindergarten held at the church hour is very successful, and has a membership of over 20. About 25 scholars had not missed a Sunday at church during the year, and were given Bibles by the pastor in appreciation of their faithful attendance.

RANDOLPH, MASS.—At the Church of the Unity last Sunday evening the whole service was in memory of J. F. Moors, D.D., who, as missionary of the A. U. A. for New England, was instrumental in founding this society. The chairman of the Parish Committee, Mr. Henry A. Belcher, paid an affectionate tribute to Dr. Moors's personal devotion to the interests of the society; and Rev. Charles A. Humphreys spoke of Dr. Moors as preacher, pastor, army chaplain, and superintendent of missionary work for New England.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH.—Rev. Stanley M. Hunter preached recently on the subject, "What shall Unitarianism stand for in Salt Lake City?" He showed what it had stood for in past times. It had not been a dynamite bomb to annihilate all theology. It was death only to injurious error and meaningless superstition. Unitarianism was the reformation of the Reformation. It had always stood for the freest thought and the freest speech, the noblest citizenship, the highest education, and the largest faith. The danger to liberalism in Salt Lake City, as elsewhere, was indifference. A person who has recently experienced the popular form of conversion is anxious to save others. Should the liberal be less enthusiastic? There is no place in the United States where a liberal church could be better supported than in Salt Lake City. Unitarianism stands for an exalted and reasonable religious life.

SAN DIEGO, CAL.—Rev. H. Digby Johnson of San Bernardino has received a unanimous call to settle over the Unitarian parish at San Diego.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.—Second Church: The annual meeting of this church, recently held, showed a church property clear of all encumbrance except a small debt of $4,500, receipts exceeding expenditures, a church membership of 250 on the church book, and a membership in the Sunday-school of 210. The Women's Auxiliary reported receipts of $1,429, and boasted a membership of 107.

When it is remembered that this organization is but four years old, it will be seen that the trustees have good cause for congratulation over the yearly report.

Rev. H. R. Haweis of London, a man of world-wide reputation and broad sympathies, now visiting San Francisco, was invited to preach in the Plymouth Congregational Church, and assented, subject to the approval of the bishop. Bishop Nichols refused his consent, on the ground that Episcopal clergymen should not accept hospitalities they could not return.

SEATTLE, WASH.—For the first time in nearly six months there were services on January 13 at the First Unitarian Church. The new minister, Rev. J. H. Acton, D.D., preached. The audience-room was tastily decorated with ferns and evergreens, the graceful plumes of the mountain hemlock predominating. Dr. Acton was introduced by Joseph Shippen, who congratulated the congregation on having secured, after so long a period of inactivity, the services of a man fitted by heredity, kinship, and training to be a Christian minister. Mr. Shippen, on behalf of the church, offered to Dr. Acton a pulpit which was open, as he said, to the freest expression of thought and to the preaching of a liberal and comprehensive gospel of common sense.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.—The following is the preamble of the Springfield Branch of the National Alliance of Unitarian Women: "Believing that, by meeting together to consider practical questions in religion, ethics, and philanthropy, we may enlarge our own religious life, lend a helping hand to other women, and bring ourselves in closer fellowship with each other, we do form ourselves into an association for this purpose." The officers for the year of 1895 are Mrs. James McDuffie, president; Miss Annie Bailey, secretary; Miss Emily Coffin, treasurer; Mrs. M. H. F. Gilman, corresponding secretary. The speakers and subjects for the winter are: "The Work of the Alliance," by Mrs. B. Ward Dix; "College Settlements for Women and their Work," by Miss H. S. Dudley; "Mothers and Adjectives," by Mrs. Isabel C. Barrows; "Factory Legislation," by Mrs. Fanny B. Ames; "Home and Hospital Nursing," by Miss Maxwell of the Presbyterian Hospital of New York.

TACOMA, WASH.—A carefully prepared report made by Mr. Martin shows that the First Free Church has made substantial progress during the last two years. Beginning with 65 charter members, Nov. 27, 1892, it now has an enrolled membership of 227. Of these 1 has been removed by death, 4 have withdrawn, and 24 have left the city, making a total of 197 resident members.

NORFOLK CONFERENCE.—The winter meeting of the Norfolk Conference will be held in the Church of the Unity at Neponset, Mass., Rev. George Herbert Hosmer, minister, Thursday, February 21. Addresses are to be given by Rev. George Batchelor on the passage from "Philosophy to Religion," and by Rev. E. C. Butler of Quincy on "The Church and the Young Men." Full particulars are given in our "Religious Notices."

THE NEW ENGLAND ASSOCIATE ALLIANCE.—The Branch of the Alliance connected with the First Congregational (Unitarian) Society of Jamaica Plain, Mass., extends a cordial invitation to all the New England Branches to meet with them on Wednesday, February 27. Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells will preside. Exercises will begin at 11 A.M. Papers will be read by Mrs. S. C. Beach, of Bangor, Me., "The Work of the Alliance in Relation to the Sunday-school"; Rev. Edward A. Horton, president of the Unitarian Sunday School Society, "The Sunday-school Idea"; Mr. Ellis Peterson, supervisor of Boston public schools, "Work Common to Sunday and Public Schools"; Rev. Charles F. Dole of Jamaica Plain, "The Main Purpose of Sunday-school Effort." Box-lunch at 1 P.M. (the ladies of the Jamaica Plain Alliance providing tea and coffee). The afternoon session will begin at 2.15. A discussion will be opened by Prof. Edward Cummings of Harvard University, "Strikes and their Remedies"; Miss Emily G. Balch of Jamaica Plain, "The Relation of the General Public to Strikes."

Business Notices.

Decreed by Fashion.—"Not how you feel, but how you look," is the motto which fashion repeats to-day in the ears of our devotees. It is a fact that the average woman rarely looks as she feels, but almost always feels as she looks. This is the reason why the modern toilet table is one of the greatest staples of the furniture trade to-day. At the largest warerooms in this city—Paine's, on Canal Street—they show over a hundred different styles of this single piece of furniture.

Mr. S. P. Stratton sailed from Vancouver on Tuesday last for Yokohama, his third trip to the potteries of Japan; and Mr. Theodore Jones, of the same firm, sails on the "Teutonic," on a tour of English, French, German, and Austrian potteries and glass houses.

"Brown's Bronchial Troches" are unrivalled for relieving Coughs, Hoarseness, and all Throat Troubles. Sold only in boxes.

SOUL FETTERS.

BY FANNIE A. DAMON.

If deeply hidden in thine heart,
Some hope or wish lies unexpressed;
A dream, that haunts thee day by day,
That will not let thy spirit rest;
If doubt or fear thine acts control,
Oh, be not of thyself afraid!
But break the fetters of thy soul;
Be what thou prayest to be made.

Let not the sound of worldly speech
E'er check thee in thine onward course;
Heed not its censure or its praise,
But listen to the inner voice
That bids thee stand for truth and right;
And own the law that makes men free,—
The law of love, not bound by creed,
That giveth life and liberty.

The Pulpit.

THE NEW BIRTH AND THE NEW TYPE OF MAN.

BY REV. CHARLES F. DOLE.

Let us ask ourselves precisely what we think was happening in Palestine at Christmas time nearly nineteen hundred years ago. We are all familiar with the current idea that, if we had been there on a certain famous Christmas Eve, we should have seen and heard marvellous and unspeakable things. But the wonderful thing about the divine processes really is that the very greatest of them move on so silently. Take, for instance, the change which happens every year in the course of the sun, for the celebration of which there was a more ancient Christmas festival long before the birth of Christ. At this time of the year the planetary movement toward darkness and winter, which, if it went on unchecked, would plunge us in deathly ice and cold, somehow stops, and the new movement begins toward the warmth and sunshine of a new summer. But, though this change is most real, it is so silent that one would scarcely tell the moment when it has arrived.

Take, again, the great event in history which we in New England are in the habit of celebrating just before the Christmas time, the landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth. No one looking upon that little insignificant party of colonists would have guessed that a vast and significant movement, affecting the destinies of the world, was being ushered in.

The truth is, we do not generally know the great events in their greatness till some time after they have happened. For weeks after the sun begins to ride higher in the heavens, the cold still goes on increasing, and winter lies fast upon us. But by and by the change has begun to work its true effect. The buds swell on the trees, and the brooks run full with the melting snows and the spring floods. It is so likewise with the coming of the great lives that mark the epochs of history. They come unheralded by the stars. Thus in England, when Shakspeare's genius shone out upon the world, no one saw anything strange or surprising in the country youth who had come up to London to seek his fortune. We can scarcely to-day discover the facts about his history. Yet all of a sudden there began to be written poems and dramas, which people at first enjoyed and praised, without knowing how wonderful they were. The world at last, getting their true perspective, numbers them among the masterpieces of literature.

So only lately with the life of Abraham Lincoln. Few could have guessed that the boy, sprung of the humblest parentage, with the most meagre education, born to hard work in the rough frontier life, would come to stand among the princes of the earth. But by and by he was found thinking thoughts of justice and liberty, and uttering speeches so profound, convincing, and eloquent that men began to say of him, He is a great man. How great he was they did not know till after he had gone.

I believe that it was so with the coming of Jesus. No one on any particular Christmas Day would have imagined that the greatest event in human history had taken place. No one walking up and down Nazareth streets would have discovered that the greatest of the sons of men was living a free and happy boy's life in a carpenter's little house in the town. No companion or citizen of the place would have been certain to predict whose destiny, out of all the youth of the town, would be most glorious, so silent and obscure are the divine processes! But by and by men began to remark that a great teacher had arisen among them. Very striking and gracious words began to be uttered. "He teaches as one having authority," they said.

What, now, were these teachings proceeding out of a humble peasant's mouth, the full greatness of which the world has not yet fathomed? All that we know of them is comprised within a few pages of the New Testament. They are mostly summed up in the Beatitudes and a few other passages of the Sermon on the Mount, and in two or three parables. The new teacher here reverses the ordinary judgment of the world about the nature of the happy life. He teaches that the meek and lowly and humble may be blessed or happy. He teaches that men may mourn or suffer persecution or confront pain, and yet deep down in their hearts may have all the time the secret of abiding content, and joy even. He teaches that life is not so much in receiving and getting as it is in giving and loving; in short, that the true life of man radiates beneficence, as God's sun in the heavens radiates life, shining on the evil and on the good. The life of man, the son, is like the life of God, the Father, in the unceasing and glad some ministration of love.

Jesus did not simply teach these memorable things. He trusted and tried them himself. They were not teachings that he had learned by rote out of the wisdom of the elders. They grew out of his own experience. He had given himself with utter willingness to live this loving life. He had tasted pain, sorrow, persecution; and the sunny courage and the steadfastness of his faith in God, so far from being broken, had grown deeper and sweeter. He had actually faced the evil in the world, as that man has to face it who bends to the work of relieving men from its weight. But nothing that he saw of evil gave him the slightest doubt of the conquering reality of the goodness of God. We may sum up both his thought of life and his experience of it—his theory and his practice—in what, if I may use an Oriental expression, I will call "the fourfold path." Whatever is right, I will do it. Whatever is true, I will follow it. Whatever love bids, I will obey. Whatever ought to be, whatever is ideal, I will give myself to bring it to pass. Such was Jesus' teaching, such was his life. In his thought nothing less or different could be true, nothing other than this could be thought of as life. The world has come to bow before this conception of life. The world has come to cry out that it is radical, original, beautiful. The world grants that, if every one had this conception of life, this earth would be paradise. But the world does not yet know how great, memorable, and revolutionary the new idea is.

I am well aware what certain persons are ready at once to say. They will remind me that there is no teaching of Jesus, not even the famous Golden Rule, which is not to be found in earlier scriptures. They will remind me of magnificent passages in Psalms and Prophets, bespeaking a serene faith in the righteousness of God or uttering the cry of humanity against wrong and oppression. They will remind me of the gentle Buddha in India and the great teachings which to-day are taught to hundreds of millions of men in his name. I am delighted to grant all that any one can say in this direction, as I delight in Indian summer days, which now and then come to check the growing cold of December. I am pleased that the teachings of Jesus prove not to be out of line, but in the direct line of descent, with the utterances of the great moral and spiritual pioneers of every age who preceded him. I yield to no one in my admiration of the lonely men who stand in the dim past above the heads of the great pagan multitudes, with their mighty and invincible trust in righteousness. I recognize the sweetness and serenity of the Buddhist teaching. Nevertheless, every one who watches carefully must observe certain characteristic facts about Jesus' type of life and teachings. As compared with the Buddhist model, for example, it is no less rich in humanity; and it has, besides, what the Buddhist type seems to lack; namely, heartiness, vigor, boundless enthusiasm, and, most of all, deathless hope. It is distinctly an ampler type of life: its faith is in a living and present God.

Moreover, Jesus is conspicuous in taking up into his teachings and gathering into a harmonious unity great sayings which before had seemed like scattered fragments. In him the good life,—the ideal, loving, glad some, trustful, victorious life,—which had before been heralded by all manner of noble premonitions and suggestions more or less complete, now actually appears as a distinct type. The type is so distinct that the world is not quite ready to own it as truly human. It is not the life of a man, they are tempted to say: it is the life of a God. This advent of a new and higher type of human life is precisely what we mean when we call it a new birth. When we say birth, we mean that the new thing has come to stay. There may have been hints of its coming and birth-pangs before. Henceforth there is continuous life.

I believe that the facts, broadly considered, bear out our statement that the Christmas story stands for the coming into the world of a great and memorable type of human life. We will not say that that type had never appeared before; but, if it had appeared, it had never come in such fullness and vigor as distinctly to impress men's imaginations. You cannot trace it in clear and continuous lines of growth and reproduction. On the other hand, in the person of Jesus the great type doubtless came to stay. You can now trace its history. I do not mean the history of the church, of dogmas, of ecclesiasticism. The history of the movement and growth of the good life in the world is as different from the history of men's ecclesiastical institutions as the flow of a stream is different from the works of man along the course of the stream,—the bridges they build over it, the tunnels beneath it, the walls to restrain it, the dams across it, the canals by which they drain away its waters. You trace the flow of the new and beneficent life in the first Christian centuries among humble men and women, meeting in upper chambers, in sail-lofts, in the galleries of the catacombs. You discover it far away from the great cathedral establishments, among little heretical sects in the valleys of the Alps, with Peter Waldo and the persecuted groups of earnest souls about whom our friend Dr. Hale writes his most beautiful story. You find the same stream of the good life flowing on in the times of Francis of Assisi and his poor monks, sent out into all Europe to preach a simple gospel to the people. You find it spreading into England, in the presence of war, plague, and civil commotion, in the hearts of men like John Wickliffe and Chaucer's holy priest. You find it in the great cities of the Rhine valley, in little brotherhoods of men who are going about ministering to the poor in famine and ex-communication, and in the face of a hostile world steadfastly living lives of loving service. You find the Moravians, the Quakers, the Methodists, in defiance of the scorn of great ecclesiastical establishments, preaching and living that new type of life which the name of Christ has at last come clearly to mark. You look over the world to-day, you note the survival of ancient, barbarous forces of greed and selfishness, you wonder at the vast and almost hollow human systems of worship, the elaborate and incomprehensible creeds; but underneath them all goes on flowing the stream of the new and beautiful life after the model of Jesus. It was never so deep before, it never had so many tributaries, there were never so many men and women all over the world in whose hearts Jesus' idea has entered. Wherever you find them, whether in groups, in families, or lonely individuals, whatever language they speak, they know the motto of the fourfold path. They say, as Jesus said, Whatever is right, we are here to do it; whatever is true, we are here to trust and follow it, wheresoever it leads. Whatever love bids, we are here to obey, not counting the cost. Whatever ought to be,—the ideal things,—whatever reforms ought to come, we are here to give our lives to bring them to pass.

When I turn to these facts, I am always impressed anew with surprise and admiration. I am quite familiar with the questionings, the doubts, the fears and scepticism of our generation. I am accustomed to feel the force of these things. Nevertheless, when I turn my eyes toward the bare ideal of what we may call the Christ-type of life, my doubts and scepticism disappear, as the snow melts beneath the March sun. That into a material, animal, selfish world there should have entered with its imperative and irresistible beauty the spectacle of a life lived wholly for love's sake, for truth, and for duty, fills me with wonder. That this kind of life, which at first seemed to men more than human, should have been slowly winning its way till it comes at last to be conceived as the only true human life—human because divine—is wonderful. Neither is this theory merely. It is no "counsel of perfection" to be regarded on holy days and neglected the rest of the time. The great increasing host of witnesses, the illustrious dead in every century, a multitude of humble and modest souls, who made life sound and sweet, and went unthanked to their graves, a very great number, more than any man can tell living to-day, tell us the one story; namely, that the new type of life, as Jesus showed it, is blessed and beautiful in this world where we live,—yes, that no other sort of life seems to them tolerable. At their highest and best, differences between them disappear, and their souls chant the music of the fourfold path. When I see these facts, this seems to me no longer a material and animal world of brute selfishness. It is no devil's world, where evil thrives and righteousness goes to the wall. It is no agnostic world, in which the good Powers are out of sight; but it is a divine universe, where the human race is made ever to grow toward the stature of manhood, and the stars march in their courses to make the evil things cease, and goodness and truth and love to abide.

I pass on to the personal application of what I have said. We are told that, whatever process in growth and development the race passes through, each individual passes through the same process. All the strange changes through which the human body has come to be what it is through thousands of years are registered in the growth of each individual body. It is so with the higher qualities, as, for instance, with language. We do not know through how many thousands of years our ancestors struggled to frame the wonderful vehicle of human speech; but each little child has, like the race, to pass through a similar process in learning to talk. It is likewise with the change to the new and higher type which the Christmas story celebrates. The law was that in the fulness of time the new Christ-type of the loving life had to be born into the history of the race. When the time was ripe, this new type came to stay, to grow, to conquer by its mild sway, and finally, we believe, to dominate the world. The same law commands a like process for each individual soul. The man is not truly man, has not attained real personality or won fulness of life, till the new birth comes. This is the law of each man's spiritual development.

Let me make plain what I mean here by birth. The life of the average man is characterized by all sorts of impulses, good and bad, noble and selfish, moral and animal. Like grown-up children, men will often be for the time under the sway of a powerful and generous emotion, and again suddenly they will yield to the momentum of the animal forces of avarice or sensuality. They are capable of appreciating the vision of high spiritual ideas. They are even religious by fits and in seasons. The trouble is that the movement of the good life is not sustained and continuous: you cannot depend upon it. It was said of Rubinstein that he was capable of the most tender and generous service to his friends or to the poor, but he was also equally liable to fits of desperate passion. This is a common experience of mankind. The characteristic of the Christ life, as we have shown, is that it is continuous and constant. It is not swayed, like a feather in the wind, by waves of contrary impulses. When we say, then, that the new life must have birth in a soul, we mean that it must come to stay. We mean by birth a new life that shall be sustained and grow stronger. To every soul the vision of the good life shall somehow come in such form that the soul shall answer to it and give it abiding acceptance. We do not mean that the growth of the infant thing shall not need watching and care, that there shall be no times of weakness and temptation, or that its growth shall be uniformly rapid; but we mean that the soul that has fairly conceived the beauty and imperativeness of the fourfold path, and sworn willing allegiance to its motto, can scarcely be as it was before. It cannot be imagined to commit moral suicide by deliberate disobedience. What is right, I will do. What is true, I will trust. What love bids, I will obey. What ought to be, I will live to make real. When the spirit of this type of life once enters a soul, it is a new experience: it is the entrance of a new and divine personality. That holy thing has now been born into the individual soul which by the Christmas story was born long ago in the life of the race.

I will not conceal from you the fact that in all this, as the parable of birth would suggest, there is something of venture, struggle, and cost. It is not without significance that the story of Jesus is the story of a great, brave, serene, and joyous life, winning its way in the face of what men call sacrifice and pain. I believe that for the individual, on even his lower and selfish side, the coming of the higher and spiritual life will result in nothing but good and enlargement. This at least is the rule. But the selfish and animal self cannot see this in advance. It fears the opposite. It apprehends loss of indulgence and pleasure. It fears the restrictions of its desires. The body is afraid that it will starve. The competitive spirit fears to come under the Golden Rule. It suspects that the Golden Rule means a narrower living, smaller business success, the loss of the emoluments of office. The selfish ambitions shrink from that life which pronounces greatness to consist, not in prizes and crowns, but in the largeness of service. I believe that these selfish fears are groundless. We are already able to cite great and memorable lives. We have recently been hearing the story of Mr. Brace's life, of Miss Frances Power Cobbe's, of Mrs. Hemmingsway's. We can recall plenty of others like these, where in the mere bounteous amplitude of living the great new Christmas type shows conspicuous success. It remains true, however, that very often at the first the individual accepts the new life with birth-pangs of fear.

On the other hand, I am impressed with the fact that, on the whole, allowing for all our stupid fears, fairly granting that no good thing in this world comes without cost and price, yes, that the highest gifts of God demand something in turn on our part, or else we should not know them as gifts,—I am impressed with the fact of the greatness and the splendor of the Christmas gift that is offered anew to every man. I have a strong sense of the values of the good things of this world that men are striving after,—of the values of money, education, and power. I see how beautiful these things appear to men. It is their higher uses, as interpreted by the Christian law, that give these things their greatest beauty. Nevertheless, as I look over the world and watch men's struggles and failures and what they call success, as I turn them to the great pattern of the Christmas story, and see what that life means for which the name of Christ stands,—a life earnest, serious, dignified, noble, disinterested, generous, aspiring, trustful, joyous, enthusiastic, hopeful, victorious, a life lived in the sense of a present God and a divine universe,—when I recognize that this sort of life is offered to us and our children as the high prize of our attainment as men, that it is precisely for winning this life that we are placed in the midst of this marvellous universe, that this thought, in fact, is the key to our philosophy, and the one thing that gives unity to all human history, I see nothing else in the world desirable to be compared with it. All things else seem only to have worth and use as means for winning this prize of the beautiful life, or as tools for administering its beneficent purposes. Nay, more, I hear all the voices of the great and illustrious ones whom we revere joining with all the chivalrous and divine impulses of our own souls, as though the one voice of God spoke through us with a joyous cry, taking up the words of the fourfold path: "Whatever is right, we will do it. Wherever truth leads, we will follow. Whatever love bids, we will obey. Whatever ought to be, whatever the common good of the higher humanity needs, we will live to make real."

SPIRITUAL SACRIFICES.

BY REV. J. EDWARD WRIGHT.

The history of the Christian doctrine of the atonement seems to contain a record of a progressive movement in the Church toward the ideal sacrifice. Quite early in the development of Christian theology the idea that Jesus, by his death, paid a ransom for sinners to the devil, gained acceptance; and it prevailed for some nine hundred years. Later the great sacrifice of the Christ came to be interpreted as the payment of a debt due to God from those who had not kept his commandments, and as a satisfaction of the divine justice by one who owed nothing. Later still arose from the great publicist, Grotius, the governmental theory, as it is called,—the theory that the death of Jesus manifested to the world God's abhorrence of sin as fully as the punishment of the transgressors of his law would have done, and thus opened the way for God to pardon those who penitently accepted this arrangement, without bringing his government into contempt. And this view, containing a reference to a moral impression made upon men by the death of Jesus, has served in some measure to prepare the way for the much nobler view that the death of Jesus furthers, renews, and intensifies the appeal made by his winning life of love to the hearts of men,—a moral appeal, melting them into its own beautiful image,—entire self-surrender to God's will and man's welfare.

Rising thus from theory to theory, we reach at last, I fondly imagine, the true sacrifice toward which man has been through all the centuries vaguely, blindly groping,—the sacrifice of his own selfish will to the over-arching and all-enveloping divine Wisdom and Love. In this is the real at-one-ment. Only thus does man come into perfect harmony with his environment. This is the "spiritual sacrifice" of our text. Here is no waste of that which is precious, no visible offering on a smoking altar, no symbolical service nor rite of substitution, but real service rendered by the person himself. He presents not a lamb, nor an ox, nor a human victim taken in war, nor his child, nor his own physical life: he presents himself, a living offering, a spiritual sacrifice, acceptable to his Maker. He does not destroy to the glory of God: he presents a fuller, higher, diviner life to the glory of God. He does not plead in his own behalf the merits of Christ, he does not urge that the self-surrender of the Son of God be accepted instead of his own self-devotion; but he practically accepts that sacrifice by welcoming the spirit that actuated it to the control of his own life.

Doing this, he brings himself into harmony with the universe; for without self-surrender he is in opposition not only to the aspirations of the human race manifested in religious history, but also to universal law. Sacrifice is not a law of religion only: it is the law of the universe. Life on this globe is sustained only as light and heat are freely poured forth from the self-sacrificing sun. The individual man lives physically only so long as there is action in his body; and action means the using up, the sacrifice, of something. "In physical realms sacrifice, or self-expenditure, is one-half of health, as assimilation is the other," wrote D. A. Wasson. "This law of the body is also a law of the soul. Our life is not ours: it is lent. By inspiration supplied, it must be by aspiration, by love and duty, again rendered forth, or the loan itself is cut short. We must give to gain: we must do to be." . . .

"The secret of poet and saint is the same, that our innermost fountains are filled when we draw from them, and that by incessant impoverishment we are made rich. And so utterance, outgiving, sacrifice, is one full half of the health and delight of the spirit."

Yes, man lives morally only as he lives lovingly. This is one of the central truths of the teachings of Jesus. Man really lives only as he lives with interests and affections reaching out from himself to others. In the terse language of the Master, "Who-soever will save his life shall lose it, and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it."

Literature.

SAINT PAUL'S CONCEPTION OF CHRISTIANITY.*

The distinctive excellence of this book consists in its thorough use of the personal experiences of Paul as an aid to the interpretation of his theology. Paul was not primarily a theologian, but an unusually intense man, with keen religious intuitions, which he was compelled, by his rabbinical training and the exigencies of his work, to put into dogmatic form, and defend as a system of theology. Consequently, his Epistles are spiritual autobiographies first, and only secondarily treatises on theology; and they demand for fair understanding psychological skill quite as much as philosophical lore. Prof. Bruce has little patience with the endeavor to account for Paulinism by reference to Jewish and Hellenistic sources,—a method which he styles "eclectic patchwork." Yet crazy quilts are all the rage nowadays in Biblical criticism, and documentary hypotheses are the height of fashion. And, where previous documents can hardly be alleged, as is ordinarily the case in Paul's Epistles, we hear of "borrowings" and "more borrowings," as if there were no such thing as creative genius. From such absurdity Dr. Bruce is entirely free; and his book is marked by a canny good sense, which refreshes one like a draught of Scott after reading the average novel of to-day. Therefore, the book is alive from cover to cover, with no Passover-bread pages, "holy, but heavy." It is scholarly, but does not groan with erudition. A single illustration will make clear the author's method:—

"Whatever surprise or disappointment it may awaken in us that the flesh should give trouble to such a one as Saint Paul, we are quite prepared to discover in his writings traces of a subtle insight into the nature and varied manifestations of its evil influence. . . . That the flesh meant for him very specially, though not exclusively, sexual impulse may be inferred from the prominent position given to sins of impurity in his catalogues of works of the flesh. . . . Does this language shock pious readers? It certainly costs the writer an effort to put such words on paper. But he forces himself to do so, because he believes that it is along this road we shall most readily arrive at an understanding of what Saint Paul meant by his many strong words concerning the flesh rather than through learned lucubrations concerning the meaning of the Hebrew word for flesh in the Old Testament Scriptures, or as to the probability of the apostle having got his doctrine of the σὰρξ from Philo or some other representative of Hellenistic philosophy. That one statement, 'I buffet my body,' is of more value to me as a guide to his thought than all the monographs on the subject." (pp. 265-267.)

Another rare virtue in this book is that, so far as I have observed, the word "evolution" does not occur in it.

As Dr. Royce has said, "One too easily forms the habit of shutting any new book in which he chances to encounter a term thus often repeated, but seldom appreciated." Yet Dr. Bruce's method is scientific. At the outset he rules out all the reputed Pauline Epistles save those to the Galatians, Romans, and Corinthians; and his sole desire is to discover precisely what Paul thought in each particular instance, without regard to its rationality or its congruity with the rest of New Testament teaching, or even with other doctrines of the apostle himself. Hence he makes very explicit certain differences between Paul and Jesus, and describes advisedly the contrast between the ethical and the forensic in Paul's thought. Occasionally, also, he recognizes confusion in the apostle's mind, as, for example, in discussing 2 Cor. v. 1-4, he says, "It would seem as if in the first sentence of the chapter the writer's mind contemplated the future state as a whole, without distinction between the pre-resurrection and the post-resurrection states, and that then the intermediate state occurring to his mind led to a change of tone" (p. 385). It is not quite certain, however, that the author might not have used the idea of evolution to good purpose; for the most unsatisfactory part of his book is that in which he argues for the notion that "a whole group of religious intuitions, the universal destination of Christianity being one of them, flashed simultaneously into the convert's mind like a constellation of stars on the day of his conversion" (p. 37). One who disbelieves totally such an account of the genesis of Paul's thought is very happy to appeal from Dr. Bruce to Dr. Bruce. "God does not reveal all things at once to truth-seeking spirits. He sends forth light to them just as they need it. Inspirations come piecemeal, in many parts and in many modes, to apostles as to prophets. The true divine light steals upon the soul like the dawn of day, the reward of patient waiting. So Saint Paul got his doctrine of righteousness not complete at a stroke, but in successive vistas, answering to present exigencies" (p. 215).

In the interpretation of many particular passages Dr. Bruce seems to lay himself open to criticism. The title "Lord" given by Paul to Jesus certainly does not carry the implication that Prof. Bruce suggests, neither does the designation Son of God (pp. 22, 23, 338, 339). Cf. the suggestion that ἰλαστήριον in Romans iii. 25 takes up the idea of the "revelation of wrath" in i. 18. It is not quite correct to say that "it needs only to be made to commend itself" (p. 169). But, minor matters aside, the book may be heartily commended to all students of the New Testament. It is sensible and scholarly, exceptionally candid and trustworthy.

It is to be hoped that in subsequent editions a student wishing to read "one of the most thorough discussions" of Romans ix. 5 will be directed to the volume of "Critical Essays" by Ezra Abbot, and not to the comparatively inaccessible "Journal of the Society of Biblical Literature and Exegesis, 1882." And, by the way, Dr. Bruce misspells Prof. Abbot's name, and gives the year 1882 instead of 1881. But the book abounds in typographical errors, which the reader will silently correct. W. W. F.

THE ILLS OF THE SOUTH.*

The author has made a close study of the industrial and social condition of the South, with a view to find causes hostile to the general prosperity of the Southern people.

The picture drawn in the opening chapter of the condition of the South immediately after the war is perhaps not exaggerated. It was a time of keen and bitter distress:—

In all these Southern States there was not an inland village or town containing a single store that could furnish a barrel of flour or sugar, a sack of coffee or salt, a pair of boots or shoes, a yard of calico or a yard of domestic, a hat, a cap, or a suit of clothes. Not a knife, a spade, a garden rake or hoe, or a plough, could be found. The destitution of every needful domestic article was general, and the people were in need of everything. But, if the stores had been full of every variety of merchandise to supply every want, the people had no money. Neither had a large percentage of the people anything with which to procure money.

This condition of affairs brought on the vast credit system, with all its tremendous evils; and it is against this system that the author mainly directs his attack. The tyranny, looseness, costliness, and depressing character of the credit system are shown by a large number of facts. Both whites and Negroes have to suffer under the operation of the lien law machine, that has led to unscrupulous and extravagant transactions and to the hopeless ruin of many farmers. Another evil mentioned is the overproduction of cotton. Many merchants actually compel the farmers who obtain credit from them to raise nothing but cotton, so that they do not raise grain or wheat enough for their own consumption. From 1865 to 1890, says Dr. Otken, cotton planting has been a mania. Several pages are given to testimony concerning industrial conditions, and some valuable information had thus been secured.

When it comes to considering the condition of the Negro, the writer's facts are less trustworthy, and his conclusions less valuable than his facts. It is a simple parody on justice to present the proportion of white and black convicts in the Southern prisons, as though the same justice were meted out to both races. Undoubtedly, ignorance, immorality, and crime exist very widely among the colored people; but, bad as the record may be, there is another side which receives but little attention in this chapter. The author draws no just comparison between the condition of the Negroes of twenty-five years ago and what it is to-day, or he would have found material for the conclusion that no race ever made so much progress in twenty-five years.

The writer, though mentioning one of the most prominent ills in the South,—namely, the evil of lynching, which reacts upon the white people as upon the colored,—might well have given it a still more prominent place. The author makes a strong point against the North, when he shows how many doors are closed to the Negroes in the North, and truly says, "If the Negro is here to stay, justice demands that he shall have an even chance in all political privileges, and that all the avenues of industry shall be thrown wide open for his advancement. To educate the Negroes, fit them for high service, and then close all the doors of progress, is trifling with their destiny."

Dr. Otken attempts to find a solution for the Negro problem, and takes refuge in the solution of the exodus. But this dream will never be realized. Genesis is more active than exodus among the Negroes in this country, and a proposal to deport the Negroes to Africa is as wild a scheme as was ever proposed. The Negroes cannot be excluded from this country, and the South for its commercial prosperity needs the Negro as well as the white man.

Despite the unpractical conclusion of the volume, the author is no doubt animated by a kindly spirit toward the Negro race, and makes a plea for kindness, fairness, and honesty toward them. The ruinous evils of the mob law to the white man as well as to the Negro are pointed out. The concluding words of Dr. Otken are well worth quoting: "Wrong is commissioned with curses. Right is dowered with blessings to mankind. Right knows neither rich nor poor, neither white nor black. To do the right is the path of wisdom and virtue. The best interests of the individual and the country depend upon it. Here is hope, here is order, here is security. Happy are the people who love and honor the laws of the land. Every evasion, infraction, or subterfuge affecting the purpose or the execution of law is a public injury. Right embodied in statutes, and these firmly and impartially enforced, are essential to peace and prosperity."

NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF CHARITIES AND ITS PROCEEDINGS.*

The coming meeting of this conference at New Haven (May 24-30), which will then be one-and-twenty years old, calls attention to its long existence and its broad and useful work. The men and women who first organized it at New York in May, 1874, as a branch of the American Social Science Association, are nearly all dead or retired from active work through age; and comparatively few of those who then met—Charles Brace of New York, the founder of a vast charity, Mrs. Parkman of Boston, the originator of the training school for nurses at the Massachusetts General Hospital, among them—looked forward to so comprehensive a movement as their little gathering initiated. For it not only became national in the broadest sense of the word, but in 1893 held an important International Congress at Chicago, and has now undertaken to develop and guide the college and post-graduate system of instruction in the numerous and fast increasing institutions of higher education throughout the United States. To this last subject, under the ambiguous name of "Sociology," a full chapter is devoted in the lately published "Proceedings" of the last Conference (at Nashville); and a strong committee, headed by President Seth Low of Columbia College, will report on it at New Haven, in the midst of professors and doctors of philosophy and students of both sexes. From this committee, on which are the well-known names of Prof. Peabody and J. G. Brooks of Harvard, Prof. Blackman of Yale, Prof. Henderson of the widely active Chicago University, and Prof. Graham Taylor of the Chicago Theological Seminary (said to be the largest Protestant divinity school in the country), to mention no others, we may expect a full and fair treatment of the immense topic or world of topics they are taking in hand. To mingle the utile with the dulce in the now ostentatious, now obscure districts of "Sociology," theoretical and practical, and to avoid the futilities of loose generalization while giving shape to its methods and enlarging its scope, is a task that may test the powers even of this committee. As Rasselas said to Imlac, while pursuing his researches in sociology at the Happy Valley University of Abyssinia (poetry being the subject then in committee), so we may say to the expansive university lecturer: "Enough! Thou hast convinced me that no human being can ever be a sociologist. Proceed with thy narration."

The narration of charities and the ways of correction is indeed one of the chief tasks of the National Conference, and always must be. It is also a main means of instruction in sociologic university courses. Observation and description, followed by induction, is a surer, if slower, road than the high-soaring doctor of philosophy, pursuing his flight through the upper air of speculation, is tempted to assay.

"While timorous souls plod round or ford the shore,
He shoots the gulf, and is already o'er."

But so winding and crooked is the stream of human affairs that the bold navigator, even if he escapes the fate of Icarus and his flying machine, may find himself, like the pig attempting the impossible rail-fence of the prairie allegory, on the same side when he comes out as where he went in.

So much by way of warning from a veteran in the field which so many are eagerly entering. Returning to the handsome volume of sayings and doings at the twenty-first yearly session of the National Conference, edited by Mrs. Barrows (not without judicious compression), printed by Geo. H. Ellis in Boston, and sold by the Conference treasurer, John M. Glenn of Baltimore, the reader will find it a happy mingling of narration, instruction, theorizing, and personal experiences, salted with wit and well peppered with statistics. If the latter were always exact, we might look for the speedy end of the world and reign of the saints, especially those statistical saints who never made a mistake, and can always prove what their theory requires by rows of figures. To err is human, and to omit is still more so. Omissions and unsound inferences and implications are noticeable here and there; but, on the other hand, in the long succession of earnest writers and speakers who take up their testimony concerning "State Boards of Charities," "Charity Organization" (including the unemployed experiences of 1893-94), "Outdoor Relief," "Child-saving," "Reformatories," "The Feeble-minded and Epileptic," "The Insane," and the hundred subordinate questions that incidentally came up in the six days' discussion of these main subjects, there is a mass of evidence, argument, good sense, and good feeling that make the four hundred pages very cheering as well as instructive. In Prof. Henderson's report on "Outdoor Relief," a topic where much traditional absurdity and fashionable rhetoric, based half on fact and half on fallacy, has long prevailed, there is a broad and cautious treatment which merits mention. This wise and practical sociologist also has perceived, what many of those who benefit by Dr. Wheelwright's clear guidance and reforming legislation have ungratefully forgotten, the value of Wheelwright's opinion in matters to which he gave the unselfish service of five-and-twenty years.

Notice should also be taken of the brief, practical opening address by the President of the year, Mr. L. C. Storrs of Michigan; of the able and useful as well as arduous compendium of the State reports, by Joseph P. Byers of Ohio, who well continues the work of his genial and lamented father; of the papers of the veteran Mr. Letchworth and the youthful Homer Folks on "Dependent Children"; of Miss Julia Lathrop's concise account of Hull House, that model of social settlements, which is one of the marvels of marvellous Chicago; and of the general high character of the discussions. The president for 1895 is Robert Treat Paine of Boston, and the New Haven reports and debates will be apt to equal in value any that have preceded them in the twenty-one years of growth and apprenticeship that have brought this remarkable Conference to its full majority in the present year. F. B. S.

THE LIFE OF CHARLES LORING BRACE. Chiefly told in his own Letters. Edited by his Daughter. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.—This is an adequate and most attractive setting forth of a life nobly devoted to what has happily come to be estimated as the highest form of religious service; namely, the service of the gospel of humanity. There are a few names of men and women which make up a starry list of those who have given themselves, first to the discovery of—as if in wholly neglected fields—and then to the vigorous engagement of heroic personal consecration to new forms of philanthropic activity. Mr. Brace finds his place on that list, with no one in the past or the present who can claim superiority to him. It is remarkable that what have proved to be the most necessary and efficient as well as the most rewarding objects of practical reform and of humane effort have always offered themselves to those who most zealously engaged in them as novelties inviting untried experiment and effort. Howard and Mrs. Fry are entitled not only to the veneration and gratitude due to them as effective laborers, but also to the honor of inventors, in the matter of purifying and wholly reconstructing prison discipline in England and Europe. Miss Nightingale may also head the list of inventors, discoverers, in the methods of nursing. Excepting only such feeble and wholly futile efforts as were made by a few Sunday-school teachers, Mr. Brace found the field on which he labored with such zeal and wisdom, and whose desolate and malarious objects he turned to such products of fertility and healthfulness, wholly fresh, one can hardly add inviting. So fully have the knowledge of his life work and the details of his methods and rewarding results been made public, simply by the constancy of the appeals and the ingenuity of the schemes and institutions connected with Mr. Brace's plans, that it might have seemed that he had set forth his own biography in the continuous series of his reports to the Children's Aid Society. He called this society into being just forty years ago. He was at first its one single officer, on a salary of $1,000 a year. At his death he had thousands of agents and fellow-laborers, and millions of dollars had been spent in the support of some twenty devices of reform and benevolence that had ramified from the original enterprise. His daughter has in modest narration given us, as she justly says, mostly from his own written communications, the story of his life. He had the noblest qualities of character, guided by the loftiest principles. His tastes and aptitudes were for scholarship, and he indulged them enough to produce rich fruits from them. The more signal therefore are his claims upon our veneration tion that he could repress his strong cravings for the highest intellectual work, and give himself to efforts, cares, and lifelong devotion to a work which to him was not humbling because it was exalting.

THE CRUSADES. The Story of the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem. By T. A. Archer and Charles L. Kingsford. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. London: T. Fisher Unwin.—This is one of the valuable series known as "The Story of the Nations." It deals with the Crusades, which are crusades in the proper sense of the word. In making the story of the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem the main thread of the narrative, stress has intentionally been laid on an important, if comparatively unfamiliar, side of the story of the Crusade. Much of the history of this great upheaval of the Middle Ages has been highly colored by the false glamour which has been thrown over it. But in this work the story is given with true historic sense. Special emphasis is placed on the fact that "it is through the history of the kingdom of Jerusalem that the true character and importance of the Crusades can alone be discerned." The whole subject treated is one of surpassing interest, for here we see in vivid contrast the heroic and meaner elements of human nature. It was the uprising, so to speak, of all the Christian nations into a sublime enthusiasm, such as the world has rarely seen. The lofty religious devotion was tarnished by ambition and personal greed. The movement in its various phases is described in this volume, and in addition we have a sketch of the military orders and the life of the people. In the concluding chapter, where we have the results and influences of the Crusades, the subject is treated with judicial fairness. There is also a descriptive list of illustrations, together with maps of the routes of the first three Crusades, the Latin principalities of Syria in the twelfth century and of Jerusalem in 1187. Thus we have a comprehensive survey, which makes the book valuable for reference.

*THE ILLS OF THE SOUTH. By Charles O. Otken, LL.D. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

*Proceedings of the National Conference of Charities and Correction of the Twenty-First Annual Session held at Nashville, Tenn., May 23-29, 1894. Edited by Isabel C. Barrows. Boston: Press of Geo. H. Ellis.

HOW THANKFUL WAS BEWITCHED. By James K. Hosmer, author of "The Story of the Jews," etc. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.—We have here a story of Cotton Mather's day, but Thankful was bewitched in quite a different manner from that of the Salem folk in 1692. Yet, if we should tell in what way she was bewitched, we should deserve to be indicted for grand larceny. The critic has no right to give away the author's plot. Enough that the story of her bewitchment is a very touching one. It was a priest by whom she was bewitched, and she might perhaps have been cured of her bewitchment if he had not himself been bewitched in former times and never got over it. In fact there is a story within a story; and whether the inner one is not the more pathetic is it not for the reader to decide? Thankful is the belle of the story, but she is not the bell of the story; and, whether the belle or the bell is the real heroine, this also the intelligent reader must decide. "Does Heaven say anything?" asks Confucius. If we have not said much, we trust we have said enough to send our readers to Mr. Hosmer's book, that there they may discover for themselves what a unique and interesting story he has written.

IOLA, THE SENATOR'S DAUGHTER. A Story of Ancient Rome (about 24 B.C.). By Mansfield Lovell Hillhouse, LL.D. G. P. Putnam's Sons.—The author's object in this story is to give a picture of the life of the business classes in ancient Rome, and to show how remarkably history is repeating itself in modern cities. Evidently, a good deal of care has gone to its manufacture. Almost every page smells of the lamp in a quite unmistakable manner. Cæsar Augustus and Marcellus, Ovid, Virgil, and Horace walk the crowded stage. Virgil is represented in the act of making an after-dinner speech, an amalgam of the Second Georgic and the Fourth Eclogue, not an admirable compound, and decidedly not a good post-prandial speech. At the last the question presses whether, as a dog digs up again the bone that he has buried, Mr. Hillhouse has to a considerable extent put the life of New York into the life of ancient Rome, and then solemnly taken it out again. The wiser sort will read the book for what entertainment it may afford, and go to other and more reliable sources for their knowledge of the business men of Virgil's town.

THE LEISURE OF GOD, AND OTHER STUDIES IN THE SPIRITUAL EVOLUTION. By John Coleman Adams. Boston: Universalist Publishing House.—Mr. Adams's sermons are sermons for to-day. They may not be in their thought in advance of the time, but they are not behind it. Their material and illustrations are drawn from the life that now is. The revelations of modern science furnish abundant illustration, which give a vivid interest to the style. The sentences are short, crisp, and energetic. The thought is freshly stated. The subjects of the discourses are not the old problems of theology, but problems of practical life. The thought is not tame nor the sentiment flaccid. These discourses are permeated by a deep spirit of truth. "The way out of the doubts and fears which oppress us," says the author, "is not altogether by the gate of knowledge or of logic, but by the avenues of the spirit. We do not need more facts, but a better feeling." These sermons are well fitted to awaken hope and trust, and summon us to the practical duties of life.

AS A MATTER OF COURSE. By Annie Payson Call. Boston: Roberts Brothers. $1.—If every one took the annoyances, the vexatious trivialities, of life as Miss Call would have us take them, there would be fewer sermons needed, there would be fewer sick-rooms and fewer wrinkled foreheads. If her prescription be carefully obeyed and conscientiously taken, it should prove a sure cure for Americanitis. The little book is well named and well planned. The style is vigorous, concise, and to the point. The chapters on Trivialities, Tolerance, and others, are particularly good, and contain much sound sense. It is pre-eminently a book for American women, and as such it will be read and appreciated.

Miscellaneous.

Maynard's French Texts, No. 7, is arranged by Miss F. Saw, "Petit Livre d'Instruction et de Divertissement." The stories are much longer than in the previous texts, and on that account will be welcomed by the small pupils, who may find, however, that they contain more "Instruction" than "Divertissement."

A second edition of Rev. William P. Tilden's "Leaflets for Lent" has afforded opportunity for the insertion of selected thoughts and additional hymns for the Sundays, although Sundays are not included in the canonical forty days. These selections from the Bible follow the life of Jesus in consecutive order until the last morning; while on the opposite leaves are thoughts from the last sermon Mr. Tilden preached, touching these events in human life.

The "Seventh Report on the Custody and Condition of the Public Records of Parishes, Towns, and Counties in Massachusetts" has been published by Robert T. Swan, Commissioner. It is chiefly devoted to a presentation of facts showing the great loss of records, what has been done since 1889 for their better preservation and protection, and what is still needed in this direction. It is unexplainable why public records have been so neglected in the past, and the Commission is doing much to awaken towns to a sense of duty in this matter.

The Magazines.

The February number of the New England Magazine opens with an article on "The Lower Kennebec" by Winfield Thompson, which portrays the beauties of the valley, and gives glimpses of its richness in literary and historic associations. Walter Gilman Page writes entertainingly of Henri Regnault, and the article is illustrated with reproductions of the artist's paintings. The other illustrated articles are "The Harvard Divinity School," by John White Chadwick, and "The Massachusetts Militia," by Thomas F. Edmands. An article of especial interest is that by Rev. David N. Beach, on "The Norwegian System in its Home," giving the results of a visit to Norway made by the writer the past summer in company with Rev. Philip S. Moxom. The fiction of the number is contributed by Alice Brown and Minnie Louise Taylor. "Cap'n Ben" is one of those stories that promote altruism. It is too good to be read to one's self; and yet the impulse to share it by reading it aloud is partly selfish, too, for it certainly adds to one's own pleasure. Miss Taylor is chiefly known in Massachusetts by her interest in prison reform, which cannot be wholly repressed even in a society story. Other articles are "A New Birth in the City and the State," by R. L. Bridgman, and "The Rise and Decline of the New England Lyceum," by E. P. Powell, while the poetry is by Madison Cawein, Colin A. Scott, and John White Chadwick.

Literary Notes.

A literary find of great interest is some unpublished poems of nature by Thoreau, which Mr. F. B. Sanborn prints with comments in the March Scribner's.

Mr. Howells has a fondness for naming his novels with a phrase from Shakspeare, as "A Counterfeit Presentment," "The Undiscovered Country," "A Modern Instance," and "A Woman's Reason." His story in Scribner's he names "A Circle in the Water," from the phrase "Glory is like a circle in the water."

The Home.

THE CRY OF THE CHILDREN.

Do you hear the children weeping, O my brothers!
Ere the sorrow comes with years?
They are leaning their young heads against their mothers,
And that cannot stop their tears.
The young lambs are bleating in the meadows,
The young birds are chirping in the nest,
The young fawns are playing in the shadows,
The young flowers are blowing from the west;
But the young, young children, O my brothers!
They are weeping bitterly!
They are weeping in the playtime of the others,
In the country of the free.

They look up with their pale and sunken faces,
And their looks are sad to see;
For the man's grief untimely draws and presses
Down the cheeks of infancy.
'Your old earth,' they say, 'is very dreary';
'Our young feet,' they say, 'are very weak!
Few paces have we taken, yet are weary,—
Our grave-rest is very far to seek!
Ask the old why they weep, and not the children;
For the outside earth is cold.
And we young ones stand without in our be-wild'ring,
And the graves are for the old.'

"All day long the wheels are droning, turning,
Their wind comes in our faces!
Till our hearts turn, and our heads with pulses burning,
And the walls turn in their places!
Turns the sky in the high window blank and reeling,
Turns the long light that droopeth down the wall,
Turn the black flies that crawl along the ceiling,
Are all turning all the day, and we with all!
All day long the iron wheels are droning,
And sometimes we could pray,
'O ye wheels (breaking off in a mad moaning),
Stop! be silent for to-day!'

Now tell the weary children, O my brothers!
That they look to Him, and pray
For the blessed One who blesteth all the others
To bless them another day.
They answer, "Who is God that he should hear us?
While this rushing of the iron wheels is stirred?"
When we sob aloud, the human creatures near us
Pass unhearing,—at least, answer not a word;
And we hear not (for the wheels in their resounding)
Strangers speaking at the door.
Is it likely God, with angels singing round him,
Hears our weeping any more?

Two words, indeed, of praying we remember;
And at midnight's hour of harm,
'Our Father!' looking upward in our chamber,
We say softly for a charm.
We say no other words except "Our Father!"
And we think that, in some pause of angels' song,
He may pluck them with the silence sweet to gather,
And hold both in his right hand, which is strong.
Our Father! If he heard us, he would surely—
For they call him good and mild—
Answer, smiling down the steep world very purely,
"Come and rest with me, my child."

And well may the children weep before ye,
They are weary ere they run!
They have never seen the sunshine, nor the glory
Which is brighter than the sun!
They know the grief of men, but not the wisdom;
They sink in their despair, with hope at calm.
Are slaves without liberty in Christdom,
Are martyrs by the pang without the palm!
Are worn as if with age, yet unretreivably
No joy of memory keep;
Are orphans of the earthly love and heavenly,
Let them weep, let them weep!

They look up, with their pale and sunken faces,
And their look is dread to see;
For you think you see their angels in their places,
With eyes meant for Deity.
"How long," they say, "how long, O cruel nation!
Will you stand, to move the world on a child's heart?
Trample down with mailed heel its palpitating,
And tread onward to your throne amid the mart?
Our blood splashes upward, O our tyrants!
And your purple shows your path."
But the child's sob curseth deeper in the silence
Than the strong man in his wrath!

PETER'S PREFACE.

BY SARAH BIERCE SCARBOROUGH.

A VALENTINE STORY.

"P for Peter, R for Roe,
E for Elizabeth, F for Foe,
A for Adam, C for Cat,
E for Elizabeth—catch a big rat."

It was only a whisper; but Miss Petty heard it, as she did the giggle which Susan Peppers, at the head of the geography class, sought to suppress by hastily clapping her book over her face. Miss Petty frowned severely on Susan; but her eyes roved past her to the nearest seat in the front row, where a red head was in close proximity to one like tow.

"Peter Yaples, come here!"

At the mandate the red head emerged from behind the book, and a small boy sprang to his feet as if worked by machinery. He dubiously pushed his way past the class, toeing the mark in front of the plat-form, stumbled in confusion up the one step, and stood trembling by the side of the teacher.

"What were you doing?"
"Jest tellin' Joey Hicks what them letters in the front part of his primer meant."
"What letters?"
"P-r-e-f-a-c-e."
"Peter Yaples!"
"Yes'm," answered Peter, cringing under the astounded glare fixed on him.
"You were telling Joey that meant what you said?" The tone was terrifying in its slow sternness now.
"Yes'm," faltered Peter again. "They——they—told me—so."
"Peter Yaples, where do you suppose boys go to that tell such things?"

"To—to the—woodshed," whimpered Peter, in abject humility.
Miss Petty looked at the culprit steadily for a moment. There was nothing in the frightened, ingenuous gaze that met hers to lead her to suspect the owner of being purposely unorthodox in his reply.

"Well, you'll go there for the present, anyway, until you can tell what 'preface' means."

The next minute Peter found himself unceremoniously hustled through the doorway at the left, and ushered into the society of pine slabs and saw-bucks.

He was thankful for that much. He made a seat of the two, then fell to ruminating on the affair that had led to his ignominious ejection from the school-room. Why the friendly effort on his part to add to Joey Hicks's first day's stock of knowledge should receive such recompense he was unprepared to say. His own was so limited that he really placed such implicit faith in the bit of doggerel that had been his own first day's experience, he was unable to see any just reason in the fate that had overtaken him.

He meditated some time, listening to the droning recitations in the next room. Then he heard a giggle, a rustle, and a peremptory voice:—

"Bring that straight to me, Susan Peppers. I'd be ashamed to fight over such things. That makes the tenth one I've taken to-day. No, you can't go out after a drink, Joey Hicks," as a vigorous snapping of fingers broke into the speech. "Jake Hinds, you go and bring a pail of water."

It set Peter to thinking of the visions he had seen that morning,—lovely visions of hearts and roses, bows and arrows, and cupids, only he did not call them that; and other visions, not quite so lovely, which made him grin at the recollection.

"Peter Yaples!"

The hissing whisper came from the far end of the woodshed. It proceeded through a knot-hole, to which Peter, as he scuttled over the slabs in the vicinity, found Jake Hinds's eye glued.

"Mean old thing, ain't she?" Jake's tone was sympathetic to the last degree.

"What she done to you?" queried Peter, naturally.

"Took the valentine I sent Susan Peppers. She's took lots of 'em, too. They're all she'll have. Nobody thinks 'nuff of her to send her one."

Peter pondered before he replied. Then he asked eagerly, "Say, Jake, what does p-r-e-f-a-c-e mean?"

"He, he! She cotched you on that, didn't she? Why, don't you know? 'Eels catch alligators, father eats raw pertaters.' He, he!"

"It don't." Peter's tone was of mingled scepticism and disappointment.

"What does it, then? You can't read a thing but two ways,—back'ards and for'ards. That's back'ards, an' you slipped up on it for'ards."

"I've got to stay here till I find out," returned Peter, hopelessly; "an' I don't see how I'm goin' to find out here."

"Jake Hinds, teacher says hurry with that pail of water."

"Sent the axe after the helve, did she? Hurry yourself, Bill Sims!" But, at the warning, he sauntered away; and Peter was left to himself. But his mind had been turned into another channel aside from that of his own situation.

Peter had his own ideas as to the feeling one must have who had been shut out in any sense from participating in the joys of others. Hadn't he seen Jenny Bates crying all the morning because she had received no valentine, not even a one-cent caricature? He did not stop to think she might have cried worse at receiving some he had seen. He only knew that nothing pleasant, at least, had come to either Miss Petty or himself. So, despite his incarceration,

Peter's heart grew tender with a fellow-feeling; and he even felt sorrier for Miss Petty than for himself.

He felt sure he had reached the solution as to the primary cause of his imprisonment. His self-suspected heterodoxy, which had troubled him at first, now vanished in the larger trouble,—Miss Petty's disappointment. He heard Caddie Myers drawing our her a-b, abs, and then Miss Petty's sharp tones attacking Joey Hicks. Peter was almost sure it was because Joey had proved too apt a pupil of his own in the ability to fire spit-balls. It made him still more regretfully penitent.

It was evident that he alone was to blame for everything. He thought of a big Baldwin that had escaped the tooth of decay and all eyes but his own as a prospective balm the next day for Miss Petty. In his private opinion it might be better than a valentine, which was, of course, out of the question.

Having come to this cheerful disposition of the trouble, he cast about for something to do. It was lonesome. Pine slabs were unsociable objects outside of their native environments. He fished in his pockets. There was nothing in them but some twine, a few nails, a chipped glass marble imbedded in a piece of shoemaker's-wax, and a bit of red chalk. Peter's possessions were always limited by the capacity of his pockets, and Mrs. Bowles skimped Peter even in pockets.

He lived with Mr. Bowles, who had taken him from the poorhouse on trial, and made him do the work of a man in return for the privileges of a home, an occasional day at school, and a system of discipline he considered necessary for poorhouse folks, but which others characterized as brutal. But Mrs. Bowles had reminded him daily that a "poorhouse boy that was as lucky as he was oughtn't to expect things like other folks." So Peter had not, and he had not been disappointed by having them.

However, the last two articles in his pockets suggested an idea. For the next hour he was oblivious to all outside, as, with the wax between two vigorously working jaws, a piece of paper unearthed from the kindling pile, and the chalk, he labored in the throes of a task before unthought of by him.

Miss Petty had given no recess that afternoon, because it was raining, and because she did not want the children's noise in the house, and because by not having recess she could reach home earlier. She was anxious to go home. She had been harassed all day by valentines.

Peter was right, and so was Jake. She had not even been reminded of growing age and crabbedness, except by contrast. It had been different once. She knew when she had counted her valentines as many. She sighed as she thought of it. That was long ago. There was no one now to think of her, and she brushed a lone fly off her desk rather savagely as she recalled it. But she could not brush away so easily the thought of her present loneliness, with no one but Granny Petty to care for. That thought usurped the place of all others.

She dismissed the younger children at last, glad to be rid of them. She even refused to recognize Joey's wildly waving little hand, for Joey had not forgotten that Peter was undergoing some vicarious punishment for his attentions to himself. But Joey, once outside and astride another boy's shoulders, to keep himself out of the slush, was diverted from his good intentions by the prospect of a pick-a-back ride home.

Miss Petty heard the history class without correcting the statement with which Sally Mims daily vexed her soul, that De Soto discovered Florida and Ponce De Leon the Mississippi. Then she sent them all home. It did not take long for her to envelop herself in her cloak, see that the stove was safely closed, put on her goloshes, lock the door, and set out through the drizzling rain for the little house she called home, a quarter of a mile distant.

There was considerable for her to do when she got there. She set about it with the temper of one ruffled by the care of forty unruly youngsters for the last six hours. It communicated itself to the chickens she was endeavoring to house, and brought forth a torrent of loud expostulations from a big Brahma rooster, who had supposed his duty done when he had seen his numerous wives perched for the night, without being driven to bed himself,—he, the lord of the roost, who ought to be allowed to stay out all night if he wished. But Miss Petty thought otherwise, and the indignation of both waxed hot as he led her a stern chase before he would submit to being caged in the henhouse. She came back to the house wetter and crosser than Granny had ever before known her.

"It's been Valentine's Day at school," was the unconscious explanation she gave, as she wrathfully sat down to her tea.

"Why, so 'tis!" said Granny, with animation. "Well, we're too old for 'em, but children's children. You was one yourself once, Marthy."

"It isn't a reason why I should let them run the school," snapped Miss Petty, under the unintentional sting of the reminder.

"An' we ain't children but once," mused Granny, unheeding. "We'd orter be a little forbearin'."

"I don't know what you'd have," Miss Petty stirred her tea fiercely.

"An' some don't have any childhood 't all," slowly continued Granny. "It's a mis'ble child that don't. Don't fergit that, Marthy."

Rat-a-tat-tat!
The heavy old brass knocker startled both.

"You go," said Miss Petty. "And tell whoever it is I don't want to see a soul to-night. I won't be bothered."

"Marthy," called the old lady from the entry, "you'll have to be. It's Mr. Bowles."

"Well, what if 'tis?"

"An' he wants to know 'bout Peter."

"Oh, my!"

Miss Petty rose in such haste she overturned the teapot. The cat beneath the table jumped up with a resentful "pst!" as she felt a touch of the scalding contents, and fled for the door, nearly throwing down Miss Petty, who was trying to reach it first.

"I never thought," she began, as she confronted the rough man who stood there lantern and horsewhip in hand.

"Yes," he added, "I hain't set eyes on him sence school. I walloped him this mornin' cause he didn't milk the cow dry, an' I guessed he'd run off. I wish't I was red of him."

"I'll go this minute, Mr. Bowles," said she, excitedly, as she drew on her overshoes. "Get my cloak and umbrella, Granny."

"Go where? Do you know where he is?" demanded Granny.

"He's in the school-house woodshed. I—I shut him up, and I—I—forgot him."

"Marthy Petty!" Granny looked a volume of reproaches.

"What'd he ben doin'?" snarled Mr. Bowles. "I'll show him!"

"Why, he had been— Let me get the key."

Miss Petty found herself unequal to the task of explaining Peter's misdemeanor.

The One Oatmeal

"You needn't go. It's rainin' pitchforks. Gi'mme the key, an' I'll fetch him," growled Mr. Bowles, threateningly.

"You go 'long, Marthy," admonished Granny in an aside. "An' you see he don't get teched."

Miss Petty did not need that admonition to her conscience, and she pushed out bravely by Mr. Bowles's side. She was frightened at the stillness when she reached the school-house. She almost expected to find Peter starved or frozen in those few hours. She opened the wood-house door, and the two stepped down into the shed.

"Wait, Mr. Bowles!"

Miss Petty laid her hand on his arm as he was about to stride forward to where Peter lay cuddled down in a heap of sawdust, asleep. She tiptoed ahead. She saw one grimy hand clutching a bit of wrapping-paper. She withdrew it carefully, and held it up to the lantern light.

There beneath two dropsical hearts, supposably transfixed by an arrow done in Chinese perspective, she read in the crookedest of red chalky letters:—

"MIS PETY. IME SO RY YOU ANT GOT NO VALENTINE. IIE BE URs IF UIE BE MiNE. AN iLE TRi TUBBy Good."

"Pshaw! Wake up here!" Mr. Bowles shook him roughly.

"P—fer—Pete—Miss Petty!"

Peter's dreamy beginning ended in a startled exclamation, as, thoroughly aroused, he stared wide-eyed into his teacher's face.

"Yes, P for Peter and Peter for Miss Petty," she exclaimed, hysterically, drawing him to his feet. "That's what it's going to be hereafter. You wanted to be rid of him, and now you are," decisively to Mr. Bowles. "Come along with me, Peter."

And Mr. Bowles knew now that he would never have the opportunity to take the threatened satisfaction out of him.

"Why, what you got there?" anxiously queried Granny, as she opened the door at the sound of footsteps.

"My valentine," said Miss Petty, with a queer note in her voice.

"Well, you orter," said the old woman, when she heard the decision. "But I do hope you'll stop shettin' up younguns to learn 'em!"

"What 'preface' means?" laughed Miss Petty, as she awkwardly stroked Peter's head. "Well, for him this afternoon means a preface to a new and happier life."

And Peter found it so.

PATIENCE.

She came to us bearing the singularly inappropriate name of Patience. When we say inappropriate, we speak advisedly; for, of all the impatient, obstinate, disobliging donkeys, Patience was the chief.

When Dick and Rick begged for a pony of their very own at the seashore, a compromise was effected in the shape of a donkey, this means of transportation being considered safer for ten-year-olds.

When Patience, drawing a cunning little cart just large enough for twins, was brought down for inspection, she created an immediate prejudice in her own favor by being very small and sleepy-looking. A few general inquiries were made, however, in regard to her character; and, among other things, her owner was asked if the donkey had ever troubled him by kicking, biting, or refusing to go.

"No," replied the man, reflectively,— "no: I may safely say she has never given me the least trouble in the ways you mention."

So the bargain was closed, and Dick and Rick were the happy possessors of what they loftily termed "a team of our own."

It was on the very first morning after her arrival, when the groom attempted to harness Patience to the little cart, that she began to belie her name by kicking at nothing in particular for ten consecutive minutes. Nor was this all; for Fluff, the poodle, chancing to pass at this moment, was caught in the donkey's strong teeth and shaken so vigorously that thereafter nothing could induce him to venture within several yards of his long-eared assailant.

Patience's conduct necessitated a speedy visit to her former owner, who was reproached bitterly for his perfidy.

"You said the donkey had never given you the least trouble by biting or kicking; and here she has been doing nothing else all the morning," we complained.

"I did say she had never given me any trouble in that way, and I stick to it," said the man, stoutly. "I never let such little things as kicking donkeys trouble me."

Of course, after this explanation there was nothing more to be said on the subject; for, plainly, the fault did not lie with the former owner of the donkey, but with ourselves: we were nervous.

After considerable experimenting a set of straps was arranged which would prevent Patience from kicking while harnessed to the cart; and, as she was quite too lazy to run away, the boys were allowed to drive about as they chose, or, rather, as Patience chose, for that animal had her own ideas as to route and gait, and rigidly adhered to them.

The little cart would be brought round in the morning, and Dick and Rick would tumble in with the hopeful assurance that "Patience is going all right to-day"; and off they would drive. Sometimes the donkey would draw them half a mile from home in the most delightful manner, and then suddenly stop without the slightest cause, refusing to go forward or backward. After waiting a suitable length of time, Dick and Rick would descend from the cart, pull handfuls of grass, and each in turn would walk backward, feeding Patience the while with the grass, and thus enticing her in the direction they desired to go. The boys, whose experience with "teams" had not been large, never seemed to think there was anything unusual in this manner of driving; but to a disinterested looker-on it seemed very new and original, particularly when a heavy shower fell just when the donkey had decided to rest.

But one fine day Patience quite overreached herself, and by her obstinacy provided the boys with an unfailing remedy for balkiness.

It was late in the afternoon; and they had enticed the donkey far down on the beach, that they might fill the cart with some delightful shells they had discovered early in the morning. The cart was filled just in time, for the tide would soon be in; and, throwing in their little spades, Dick went in front to pull and Rick went behind to push. But, lo and behold, Patience refused to budge an inch without her grass; and there was not a spear in sight. In vain the boys pushed and pulled. In vain they besought her to go home "just this once" without her grass, crying with tears in their eyes: "O Patience, Patience! The tide is coming, and you will surely be drowned!" But no: the donkey spread her legs stiffly out, and would none of their counsel. The tide crept steadily on, until at last it beat softly against the legs of the beseechers and besought, but to no purpose. Higher it came; and the boys were driven further and further up the beach, all the time moving backward and stretching their hands with anguished pleadings toward the obdurate donkey. But, true to her nature, she refused to stir, fearing, no doubt, to establish a dangerous precedent.

Just as Dick and Rick had given up all hope, and were preparing to die with their beloved "team," a great wave swept suddenly up, and covered Patience from head to foot. With one wild bray of terror the donkey started for home at a pace which seemed incredible to the astonished boys. On and on she fled, over rocks and stones, nor stopped until she brought up with a thump against the stable door.

"Water seems to be a good starter," said Dick.

"Let's try it again," said Rick; and home they trudged, with entirely new ideas about the government of donkeys.

The reign of Patience was over. Thereafter, when the little cart was brought round to the door, out came Dick and Rick bearing a large coffee-pot filled with water, which they placed carefully in the front of the cart, tumbled in themselves, and drove off. Whenever Patience fell into her old habit of resting, which she frequently did, Dick would take a firm hold on the reins, while Rick would elevate the coffee-pot, lean over the dashboard, and pour a small quantity of water on the donkey's heels. It was enough. Convinced that the whole Atlantic Ocean would soon be upon her, Patience would dash off, much to the gratification of the drivers, and also to the amusement of the lookers-on.

"Water settles her," said Dick.

"Glad we found it out," said Rick.—Lucy E. Tilley, in Independent.

A BRIGHT BOY.

I knew a boy, a scrap of a lad, who almost needed a high chair to bring him up to the general level of the dining-table, who liked to read the encyclopædia. He was always hunting round in the big books of the encyclopædia—books about his own size—for what he wanted to know. He dug in it as another boy would dig in the woods for sassafras root. It appeared that he was interested in natural history and natural phenomena. He asked questions of these books exactly as he would ask a living authority, and kept at it till he got answers. He knew how to read. Soon that boy was an authority on earthquakes. He liked to have the conversation at table turn on earthquakes, for then he seemed to be the tallest person at the table. I suppose there was no earthquake anywhere of any importance but that he could tell where it occurred, and what damage it did, how many houses it buried, and how many people it killed, and what shape it left the country it had shaken. From that he went on to try to discover what caused these disturbances; and this led him into other investigations, and at last into the study of electricity, practically as well as theoretically. He examined machines and invented machines, and kept on reading; and presently he was an expert in electricity. He knew how to put in wires, and signals, and bells, and to do a number of practical and useful things; and almost before he was able to enter the high school he had a great deal of work to do in the city, and three or four men under him. These men under him had not read as much about electricity as he had.—Charles Dudley Warner.

Never did any soul do good but it became readier to do the same again, with more enjoyment. Never was love or gratitude or bounty practised but with increasing joy, which made the practiser still more in love with the fair act.—Shaftsbury.

THROUGH MAGIC SPECTACLES.

VALENTINES.

The little teacher at the "Corners" had twelve children on her "books," but she was fortunate to get ten in their seats daily. But she had "ways" with her that stamped her as the born "friend, counsellor, and guide" of little children.

Among her individual ways of "doing things" was a wise management of Valentine Day in her little school-room. She had lifted it up from the silly sentimentalism that had always clung around it in this isolated locality, where the sending of a valentine was an equivalent for an offer of marriage, and had made it a beautiful custom for the exchange of pleasant remembrances.

She was in the habit of finding dainty little souvenirs of the day upon her desk when she came to school in the morning of February 14, and her smile of pleasure was enough to make the school-room sunny all day.

There was one rich family in that sparsely settled section who were the envy and admiration of the whole town, and one little girl from this wealthy home came to this country school.

One Valentine morning the teacher found an immense bouquet of half-opened yellow rosebuds upon her desk, tied with huge bows of satin ribbon of the same lovely tint. What a picture! The teacher caught her breath in the surprise and pleasure of it. Just her color! And the daintiness went straight to her beauty-loving soul. A radiant glance at Edith who had ordered them from the city conservatory was reward enough for that adoring young lady.

But there were other "valentines" also. There was one—a little bit of conventional lace paper—bought at the village store for one cent. It was soiled, half crushed, and told the story of a boy's crowded pocket and dirty hands.

But it told something else, too. It was signed only, "From Peter," but that P! How they had worked together over that P, or rather how the teacher had worked with the indifferent, unambitious, little foreign boy who lived in the only shanty in the town, and who had seemed as dull and stolid as a stone to all her pleadings. But here was a capital P that was a recognition, crude and imperfect though it was, of every little twist and turn of it she had tried to teach him.

Her face was transfigured with a gratitude that no mere enjoyment of beauty could ever call out. She said not a word; but she stole a look—and such a look—at that ragged little self-conscious boy in the high-back seat in the corner that was never forgotten. It woke to life and activity a human soul.

THROUGH MAGIC SPECTACLES.

"I wonder what she'd say if she knew I made them P's all over the kitchen floor last night, and on the side of the house, and on the fences and everywhere I could get a chance to put one in.

"I could see 'em when I got into bed in the dark. They was a-dancin' before my eyes the last thing before I went to sleep. If she'd scolded because I couldn't make 'em, I'd never made a letter for her in all my life. But she used to look so sorry and hurt-like that I wanted to s'prise her. But, jiminy, wasn't I scared when I saw them yellor roses from the city! I wished then I could 'a' got mine back. But when she see it, and looked at me—I—I thought I'd choke! I'll do everything she wants me to, jest as long as I live. Jest wait till I grow up,—you'll see. My! but she's the kind of a teacher that makes you want to do things, she is!"—Eva D. Kellogg, in Primary Education.

Charities and Reforms.

It is hoped that the citizens of Boston and those of the neighboring towns will lend generous assistance to the pupils of the Perkins Institution and Massachusetts School for the Blind at South Boston, who are to give an entertainment for the benefit of the kindergarten. The 22d of February is the time chosen for this affair; and an entertainment will be given both in the forenoon and the afternoon of that day, at the hours of 11 and 3 respectively. Tickets, at fifty cents each, may be obtained at the door of the institution and at the sales-room, No. 37 Avon Place. The pupils of the school take great interest in preparing for these exhibitions; and they hope to be enabled, by means of the kind patronage of the public, to make a large annual contribution to the infant institution which has been such a source of blessing to the youngest of them. The kindergarten will be represented at the entertainments by the two interesting children whose progress is watched with interest and delight by many, —Elizabeth Robin and Tommy Stringer. Edith Thomas will take part in the play entitled "The Dream of Fair Women," which the girls of the parent school will give at 11 A.M. Music will be an especial feature in connection with the presentation of this little drama. The entertainment will be given by the boys at 3 P.M., and will consist of literary and musical selections appropriate to the day.

The president of the Anglo-Armenian Association of England, Hon. F. S. Stevenson, M.P., says in a recent letter received at the office of the Christian Register: "A vigorous campaign against the oppressions perpetrated in Armenia is now being conducted in this country [England]. For many years past the Anglo-Armenian Association has done what it could to create a sense of responsibility with regard to the obligations incurred by Great Britain under the Berlin Treaty and the Cyprus Convention, and there is reason for hoping the government will be supported by public opinion in any strong course which they may think fit to adopt. The speech recently delivered by Mr. Gladstone at Hawarden, on the occasion of his eighty-fifth birthday, expressed the general conviction of the people, or at any rate of all to whom the facts have been brought home. We venture to hope that the time has not yet arrived when we may finally despair of any co-operation on the part of the United States government. Although the sultan has declined to allow Mr. Jewett to accompany the commission, is it not possible for public opinion in the States to insist upon an independent report? Though the United States are not a party to the Berlin Treaty, they may reasonably be expected to act in the interest of humanity and without ulterior motives; and there are numerous precedents for action on their part,—as, for example, the interference in behalf of the persecuted Jews in Morocco. In the present case the number of American missionaries in Armenia and the number of Armenians settled in New England and elsewhere constitute an additional ground for active participation in the settlement of the question."

Temperance.

To repress drunkenness, the governor of St. Petersburg has just ordered that the names and addresses of all persons found intoxicated in the streets, regardless of rank or sex, shall be posted in certain public places in the city, and also printed in the Official Gazette. Fifty years ago they were compelled to sweep the streets for a number of hours under the eye of the police.—New York Weekly Witness.

Dr. L. Bremner declares with authority that tobacco, when habitually used by the young, leads to a species of imbecility; that the juvenile smoker will lie, cheat, and steal. "This kind of insanity I have observed in quite a number of patients who presented all the characteristics of young incorrigibles. There was not one among them who was able to comprehend that tobacco was injuring him. The sense of propriety, the faculty of distinguishing between right and wrong, was lost."

The Aberdeen Association for promoting the public control of the liquor traffic in that town has formally sanctioned the scheme which has been prepared for municipalizing the trade. It will be submitted to Parliament in the form of a bill, should the general community support the scheme. The proposed system differs largely from that which has been tried in Gothenburg. At the end of five years from the passing of the act the whole of the public houses would be controlled by the municipality. During the five years no new licenses would be granted except in favor of the municipality. The scheme also includes a system of local option, whereby at the end of every five years a poll would be taken of the inhabitants. Two-thirds of those voting would decide whether the sale of drink was to be continued at all. The profits, after deducting certain charges, would be devoted to any objects which the town council might decide.

Taking

it for granted that you want to get the best results in painting, you will have to use Pure White Lead to obtain them. There are many mixtures branded "White Lead," "Pure White Lead," etc., which contain little, if any, White Lead, but are principally barytes, which is of little value, if not worthless. To be sure, accept only a genuine brand (see list).

If you want any shade of color, tint the White Lead with National Lead Co.'s tinting colors, prepared expressly for this purpose. A feature of these colors is the ease with which they are used and the exactness with which the desired shade is obtained. For particulars send for pamphlet, free.

Its poetic title is suggestive of its contents. It is a collection of brief paragraphs, which are not so much the acintillations of the intellect as poems of the imagination and pulsations of the heart. THE LADIES' COMMISSION.

THE TWENTY-NINTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE LADIES' COMMISSION ON SUNDAY-SCHOOL BOOKS.

The commission has established the custom of issuing every fifth year a catalogue of the books recommended in the annual lists of the five preceding years; and, in conformity with this custom, our last catalogue contained the titles of the books recommended in the years 1890-94 inclusive.

Fifteen hundred copies of these combined lists were printed last May, and more than a thousand were distributed at once among the Unitarian churches of the country; the Sunday School Society; the Unitarian Rooms in New York, Chicago, and Boston; such public and private libraries as have made application for them; the publishers of juvenile books; the members of the commission; and the private individuals who have expressed a desire for them. Copies of our catalogues can always be obtained free on application to the Sunday School Society.

In making this catalogue, we examined carefully our annual lists of the previous years, and compared them with the latest publishers' lists, that the catalogue might be as accurate in detail as it was possible to make it. Prices often have to be revised; and some books go out of print, and cannot therefore be retained on a useful list. Eighteen of the books included in our annual lists had, in four years, gone out of print; but, fortunately, they were among the least valuable of the books.

During the past five years 1,175 books have been examined by our reading committees; and, of this number, 342 appeared in our catalogue as cordially recommended by the commission, and 9 others are to be found appended in the minority list. It appears, therefore, that somewhat less than one-third of the books examined met the approval of the commission.

A new feature of the catalogue was the classification of the books under the authors' names as well as under the titles. Although the advantage gained from this arrangement is less marked in our lists than in some, because the number of authors represented is large in proportion to the number of books, and there is therefore less opportunity for grouping the books under the authors' names, still there is a distinct advantage in this arrangement; and it was found that the arrangement did not seriously increase either the size or cost of the catalogue.

An examination shows that the 351 volumes in our catalogue represent 209 authors, only 21 of the authors being represented by 3 or more books.

During the season of 1893-'94 217 books were examined, of which 85 were included in the regular list and 2 in the minority list. In the combined list the titles of these were printed in Italics to distinguish them from those that had been printed in the lists of previous years. Our reading committees had less enlivening reading matter than usual last year, because, owing to the prevailing financial depression, the publishers on whom we depend for our best books had fewer than usual to send us. In some cases, as in the Macmillan's, this deficiency was made up by editions of standard books prepared particularly for school use. Some of these books had already been recommended in our previous lists, and such others as met the approval of the commission were placed in our list of last year. In some instances different editions of standard books were sent by different publishers; and in such cases these various editions, if approved, were noted in our catalogue.

Some of these books were such poor abridgments, or were so weighted with notes (notes that seemed like an insult to intelligent children), that the readers were unable to recommend them. In the abridgment of Charles Kingsley's "Westward Ho!" for instance, the cruel and blood-thirsty details of life and warfare on the Spanish Main and in South America were preserved, while the effect of the splendid heroism of the book was decidedly weakened. Among the abridgments included in our list are Ginn's edition of "Gulliver's Travels," Charles Kingsley's "Hereward the Wake," and "Water Babies," two volumes of "Stories from Cooper," and Irving's "Washington." "Stories from Waverley" and "Tales from Spenser" were also included.

Notwithstanding the dulness of much of the reading last year, the interest of the members in the work of the commission, as indicated by the attendance at the meetings, was well sustained. Of the thirty-three members reading through the season, there was an average attendance of twenty-two.

We have to record the resignation of three members during the year.—Mrs. S. H. Bullard, Mrs. Thomas F. Sherwin, and Mrs. C. F. Dole. Mrs. Bullard had been identified with our work for twenty-five years, and had been president of the commission from 1876 to 1883. We were accustomed to depend upon her good judgment and wise counsel, as also upon her critical estimate of books, with a confidence that was never disappointed. We are glad to record her name among our honorary members. The death of Mrs. Arthur T. Lyman deprived us of another valued member. We still miss her gracious presence and her kindly interest in our work.

We cannot close this part of our report without reference to Miss Anna C. Lowell, by whose death the commission has lost an honorary member whose interest in our work has been marked and constant. Miss Lowell was one of the original members, and continued in active membership until 1878.

Personals.

MRS. ABIGAIL LINCOLN.—Mrs. Abigail Lincoln, wife of the late Rev. Increase Sumner Lincoln, died quietly at her home in Wilton, N. H., on January 24, in her seventy-ninth year. Mrs. Lincoln was a remarkable woman, who justly commanded attention wherever she went. For more than forty years she was the devoted companion of Mr. Lincoln, engaging with him in all the great reforms of their day, especially in the great anti-slavery reform. She was the friend of every man, woman, and child in his parish; and all felt that they could go to her for comfort, advice, or inspiration. Her religious faith was beautiful in simplicity. God to her was something more than a mere abstraction. Her religious life was practical rather than theoretical. Her faith in the future life was derived from the inmost depths of personal consciousness, and was most real. Her life was nobly lived. Her work is over, but the influence of her exalted character remains in the grateful hearts of many.

Here and There.

Mr. H. Balfour gives the aborigines of Africa and India the credit of producing the originals of our best modern stringed instruments.

A great invention is that reported in English papers,—a typewriter worked by pneumatic action. Being nearly noiseless, a chief objection to the use of the machines in rooms where there are many writers or readers at work is removed.

There is a benevolent society in Russia called "The Lovers of Zion," whose purpose is to encourage and assist emigrants from that country to Palestine, and has already sent more than thirty thousand families, who have bought or taken up the idle land in and around Jerusalem and are cultivating the olive, which is the staple of the country, and the vine, which grows with great profusion.

The "Annual Report on Immigration" presents an exhaustive review of the operation of our immigrant laws. It shows that during the year ended June 30, 1894, 288,020 immigrants arrived in this country, of whom 285,631 were landed and 2,389 debarred from landing because of being under contract to perform labor made previous to their arrival. Of these, New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and Illinois received the largest number. Very few were destined for Southern States. Of the immigrants over sixteen years of age, 41,000 could not read or write.

An old ducky, being asked the age of his two boys, replied, "One's big enough to plow, and the other's two sizes smaller."

You can apply this rule to your daughters, and say that one's old enough to need a Toilet Table, and the other's two sizes younger. For in these progressive days the Toilet Table is held to be a necessity at sixteen, and this rule applies with the most marked exactness.

Here is a very appropriate pattern of Toilet for a Bud. It is as graceful in its lines as any Table of this size that we have ever offered. The mountings of the mirror are wonderfully carved, and the appointments are carefully complete.

We are quoting the lowest prices ever known on Toilet Tables, and our assortment is large.

Pleasantries.

The man next door always has one advantage over me. That's in his neighbors.—Puck.

Mrs. Keyboard.—“Why do you always sit at the hotel piano? You can't play a note.” Old Stokes: “Neither can any one else while I am here.”—Munsey's Weekly.

Stout lady at street crossing to policeman: “Could you see me across the street, officer?” Policeman: “Sure, ma'am, I could see ye tin times the distance aisy.”—Boston Commercial Bulletin.

Its Location.—“You are something of an anatomist, I believe?” “Yes,” replied wife, who had been reading from the paper. “That's interesting, very interesting,” he mused. “It's a positive paradox. It's what might be called a singular plurality.”—Washington Star.

“And you say he was defeated by one vote?” said the professor. “Yes,” replied wife, who had been reading from the paper. “That's interesting, very interesting,” he mused. “It's a positive paradox. It's what might be called a singular plurality.”—Washington Star.

Codling: “Look here, Mawler, you pretend to be a realistic painter; and yet in this picture you have a stream in oil colors, instead of putting it in with water colors.” Mawler: “That's all right, Codling. The stream in that picture is Oil Creek, in Venango County, Pennsylvania.”—Brooklyn Life.

A Boston gentleman, calling on a lady who lives in the Back Bay District, tried to ingratiate himself with her by noticing the child she held in her arms. “Ah catsee catsee coo coo,” he gurgled, chucking the little one under the chin. The child looked up inquiringly to its mother, and said distinctly, “Mamma, is the gentleman afflicted with paresis?”

The scholars had listened with attention to the story of Enoch; and at its close the teacher asked, “Do you know of any one else who was ever translated?” Obvious as was the answer, the occasion seemed to drive away all thought, until the German youth in the corner broke the silence by exclaiming, “I know a Miss Vogel who married Mr. Bird.”—The Happy Thought.

President Lincoln, who loved to hear stories of the soldiers and their humorous pranks, told me of a soldier who was being carried to the rear in a great engagement, seriously wounded and likely to die. He espied a sutler woman with leathery-looking pies driving her trade on the “devious verge of battle fought.” The bleeding soldier grinned at the woman, and said, “Say, old lady, are those pies sewed or pegged?”—Noah Brooks, in Century.

Some twenty years ago a theological student was spending his vacation at his home near Cleveland, Ohio. He was one day asked by a person, who often preached for a church of a certain denomination there, “what Christ meant when he said, ‘Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men.’” The student told him what he supposed was the meaning. He replied: “You are wrong. He meant, Follow me, and, as heretofore you have drawn fish out of the water, so now you shall draw men out; that is, you shall immerse them.”—The Advance.

NOT RESPECTABLE.

The custom of having baked beans for supper on Saturday nights, and again on Sunday mornings, is so common in some parts of New England that the servant who has lived in New England families cannot easily adapt herself to any change in this respect.

This was amusingly illustrated in the case of a domestic named Hannah, who went to live with a family who had moved to New England from the West.

On the morning of the first Saturday in her new home Hannah came to her mistress, and asked,—

“Please, ma'am, where is the bean-pot?”

“The bean-pot, Hannah? We haven't any.”

“No bean-pot, ma'am?” said Hannah, aghast.

“No, Hannah: we never eat baked beans.”

“Don't eat baked beans? Why, ma'am, what do you eat of a Saturday night?”

“About the same that we eat on any other evening, but we never have beans.”

Hannah departed for the kitchen, muttering something under her breath; and an hour or two later her mistress chanced to overhear the following conversation between Hannah and a friend who had called to see her:—

“How do you like your new place?”

“I don't think I'm going to like it at all. I just believe that these folks are—are—well, I just don't believe they're respectable people.”

“Why, Hannah?”

“Well, they never have baked beans of a Saturday night, nor no other time. So how can they be respectable?”—The Golden Rule.

Editorial.

WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY is not in the ecclesiastical calendar; but it is in the calendar of patriotism, and we are celebrating it this week by appealing to the patriotic ideals and sentiments of our readers. The full report we give of the last meeting of the Boston Unitarian Club, in which "Ideal Americanism" was expounded by two of our most prominent and respected Catholic citizens, Father Conaty of Worcester and Mr. Stephen O'Meara of the Boston Journal, is admirably fitted to awaken patriotism of the highest and noblest order,—that patriotism which is above bigotry, demagogism, and personal interest or ambition. The sermon of Rev. Samuel A. Eliot sets before us inspiring elements in the character of Washington; and the stirring speech of Rev. E. C. Bolles, given at the Lincoln dinner in New York, shows what the ministers of both sexes did in the war for the salvation of the nation. The poem, "The Wakened Harp," which precedes Father Conaty's eloquent address, although not delivered at the club, is a fitting prelude to an occasion in which Catholics and Protestants, Ireland and America, joined in the same strains of lofty patriotism.

THE celebration of the hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Peabody in the Massachusetts town which bears his name is something more than an event of local interest. The fruits of his life and generosity have been widely felt over two continents. His gifts amounting to $2,500,000 to the poor of London; his gift of nearly $3,000,000 for education in the South, to be enjoyed alike by whites and blacks; his gifts to Harvard and to Yale, to Salem and Peabody and Rowley, made in the interest of science and art as well as philanthropy and religion,—have made the power of his life felt, as it were, at all points of the compass, and will secure for him perpetual remembrance. Few lives radiated their generosity in so many directions and in such copious streams. Whatever the limitations of George Peabody may have been, he had not the vulgar ambition to hoard his wealth. If he had a genius for accumulating, he had a genius for spending. If all who profited by his gifts could have been present at the Peabody celebration, the little town would have been too small to hold them. But the best gift of all that he made to his fellow-men is the gift of his example.

OUR Ethical Culture friends have not gotten over their fear of worship. They do not protest against it: they would rather like, indeed, to have some symbolism of their own. But they find nothing that satisfies them; and so they are content to have a cold, purely intellectual service, excepting, however, the moral enthusiasm which is infused in many of their discourses, and which is of the highest order. The voice of the prophet will always kindle; but there are symbols which are as eloquent as anything that can be uttered by human lips, and as inspiring. While it is true that such statements and symbols cannot be manufactured, there is no need to wait for their manufacture. The world is full of them. Humanity for centuries has been uttering, and still utters, its highest thought and aspiration in noble and heart-stirring, devout and grateful prayers. The Ethical Culture movement is free to use them, and might gain by doing so. Ethical Culture has its prophets: it seems now to wait for its priests. The priest who has the prayerful spirit will not fail of language, whether that of yesterday or to-day.

IN a sermon on "Prayer and Worship" Dr. Felix Adler argues that "there are feelings too deep for utterance, and genuine gratitude is one of them." He asks: "Can we conceive of a son as formally expressing his obligations to his father; or can we imagine husband and wife, who have walked the path of life side by side for many years, who have been good and true mutual helpers, who have received innumerable kindnesses at each other's hands, making to one another set speeches expressive of their thanks? Would not that be the most absurd behavior in the world?" Would it not be still more absurd to make no recognition whatever of such service? Gratitude is not, as Dr. Adler seems to think, always mute. It may be hearty, if not voluble. A simple "thank you" may express in tone and emphasis what cannot be expressed in any other way, and this power of expressing appreciation often needs to be cultivated in these sacred relations in which Mr. Adler seems to think they would be absurd. Indian stoicism, which can receive a multitude of gifts without even a grunt of satisfaction, and cold Puritanic immobility, are not things we need to cultivate. An expressiveness which is not too effusive, but which is warm and generous in its recognition, is something to be sought for. There is many a father who would be happier if his son were a little more demonstrative in his manifestations of appreciation, and many a wife who would certainly be happier if the husband would say "thank you" more frequently. If gratitude cannot be fully uttered, neither can it be fully pent up.

There is an inexpressible side to human emotion, but that should not hinder us from cultivating that which is sweetly and easily expressible.

THE reason Unitarians have no use whatever for the pastoral letter of the Episcopalian bishops is because their own beliefs are larger and better than those which are set forth in that document. It would seem like minimizing and paring down greatly the Unitarian view of the incarnation, for instance, to have it reduced to the size of the doctrine set forth in the pastoral letter. It would be a sad reduction of the Unitarian view of revelation to whittle it down to the dimensions of the dogma set forth in the same epistle. It is simply because Unitarians believe in a greater doctrine of incarnation,—the manifestation of God in all human life; it is because they believe in a richer and wider revelation than that set forth in any book or collection of books; it is because Unitarians find more inspiration in the historic human Jesus than they do in the deified Christ of the theologians,—that they have no desire to exchange their larger faith for the smaller dogmas of ecclesiasticism. Though the bishops are, no doubt, animated by a sincere desire to do the best they can for their own Church in what seems to them a critical time in its history, yet they would have done still more if they had exhorted it to a larger and richer conception of the incarnation, of revelation and of the leadership of Jesus than the one they have set forth.

BUT, though the Episcopalians, if we may judge by the bishops' letter, are not adjusting themselves to modern thought with great success, except in the Broad Church wing which the bishops are trying to clip, they are adjusting themselves more successfully to the social and philanthropic demands of the hour. It is a great mistake to suppose that the church that is adjusted to new changes in thought is best adjusted to the life of its time. Other things being equal, the church so adjusted to modern thought and knowledge has an advantage; but it cannot hold it unless it is adjusted to modern sentiment, unless on social and philanthropic and educational lines it is working to renovate, redeem, and bless the community in which it is planted. In our large cities, though the Episcopal Church may be backward theologically, it is taking hold with great vigor of the living problems which demand the attention of the Church to-day; and it is working with enthusiasm and interest, marked by a love for God and a love for man. Concerning old dogmas, if we are to judge by the bishops' letter, it has nothing to say; but concerning the application of Christianity to social life we may well listen to its message.

THE iniquitous result of mixing politics with the administration of benevolent institutions is finding fresh illustration in Fort Wayne, Ind. Mr. Alexander Johnson was taken from the office of secretary of the State Board of Charities and placed over the School for the Feeble-minded because he was deemed eminently fit to hold the position of superintendent there. The only possible objection was that he had had no medical training, but it was believed that his excellent business training and his sterling character would counterbalance this lack. No fault was found with his administration up to the time of the last election. On the contrary, experts and disinterested persons had found ample grounds for commendation in his success, and especially in the good work accomplished by his wife, who threw her efforts in with his in behalf of these poor unfortunates. But at election the scales were turned, and the present purpose is to oust Mr. Johnson by a trumped up investigation. Concerning this the Indianapolis Sentinel says: "The so-called investigation of the School for the Feeble-minded bears every indication of a shameless attempt to blacken a man's character for the purpose of getting him out of office. It has been conducted in that way thus far. The object of the outrage is to get political control of the institution. The method now resorted to is the most cowardly and contemptible ever used in this State."

IDEAL AMERICANISM.

Ideal Americanism does not depend upon race, color, sex, or religion. It is not a social condition nor a party alliance. It means the enjoyment of peace, liberty, and fraternity under the American Constitution. Its illustration and interpretation are not committed to any one political party, to any one church or nationality. The ideal American may be born here or somewhere else. He may be English, Irish, German, or Scandinavian. He may be Jew, Christian, or Mohammedan, Republican or Democrat, Methodist, Baptist, or Unitarian. But, if he has the true American spirit and ideal, his patriotism will burn just the same.

So the powerful address of Father Conaty—the address of an Irish Catholic, given before a Boston Unitarian Club—was in its aim and spirit and sentiment practically and essentially the same as if Mr. Roger Wolcott or Mr. Francis C. Lowell had made an address before a club of Catholic laymen on the same subject. And we believe the sentiments of these gentlemen, if uttered there, would have met the same reception. There are many things in politics, theology, social life, that tend to separate Americans from each other; but, when it comes to the great ideals of patriotism, then we ought to feel the unifying power of a sentiment which draws us together to a common centre.

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

George Washington is something more than a figure in American history. He is an inspiration and an ideal. The observance of his birth should keep alive his memory, but it will be most valuable if it keeps alive the ideal of patriotism which he embodied. Whatever may become of Washington's reputation as a military commander in the light of modern ideas and standards, nothing can shatter the reputation as a patriot. It is not wholly fair to Washington as a soldier to compare his generalship with standards which belong to our day rather than his, though it is possible that a commander like Washington might come out of such an examination much better than some of his critics. But, when it comes to his services as a patriot, the ideal which he held up in that age will not suffer by comparison with ours.

Suppose, for instance, we take Washington's self-sacrificing devotion to the public weal, his spurning the crown that was offered him, his refusal to use his position of power to promote personal ambition and emolument, and compare it with the ideal of patriotism of the whole pack of rascally thieves and blackguards who have been ruling New York for the last twenty years, reeking with corruption, battenning upon blackmail levied on criminals, dives, and saloons. When we compare the incorruptible gentleman of Virginia and the devoted patriot who laid his fortune and his sword into the balance with the kind of patriotism which has distinguished this den of thieves, there is all the difference that there was between Washington and Arnold, between Judas and Jesus.

Let not our teachers, public or private, neglect the lessons which the life of Washington can furnish. He was a man who never surrendered his troops, but who absolutely surrendered himself for the cause he espoused. He was rich. He might easily have obtained favor from the king; but he gave the prestige of his name, influence, example, and service to the Revolutionary cause. He persevered in a long and difficult struggle. He had to meet oppositions at home as well as abroad. It was a dark, cloudy hour in the destinies of the colony; but Washington did not lose his courage, and he saw the sun-burst of brighter fortune. And, what is even more difficult and dangerous for many people, he was enabled to bear in incorruptible integrity and high-minded patriotism the temptations of prosperity.

Washington helped to make his country. His country helped to make him. The gain of each was immeasurable. We hear much of the revival of Napoleonism. Let us hear more of the revival of Washingtonism as an ideal of patriotism as well as of noble and manly bearing and personal integrity.

THE TRAINED NURSE.

What one would do without Sairey Gamp as a foil for the modern nurse one can hardly imagine. Those who recall the reign of the former look with wonder on the evolution of the invaluable service that is rendered by the gentle and refined women who now preside in the sick-room. The lady, Miss Linda Richards, who holds the oldest certificate of graduation from a training school for nurses in the country, who has served so faithfully in her own land as well as five years in Japan, is still full of life and vigor, with the glow of health in her cheek and the gleam of humor in her kindly eye, so recent is the change which has given the educated nurse to the community.

It will be a surprise to many not that the quality of the work has been improved year by year, but that it has grown to such magnitude that the superintendents of the training schools for nurses have now a well-organized association. This association has just held its second annual session in Boston. Including two days spent in visiting hospitals, they were here nearly a week, holding four sessions for papers and discussions. The association is made up of sixty-two superintendents and assistant superintendents, representing quite an army of graduate nurses.

It seems but the other day since the work was first established in this country, in the New England Hospital for Women in Boston, and in Bellevue Hospital, New York, six months later. Then the Massachusetts General Hospital cautiously followed, but so haltingly that at the end of the first year success seemed doubtful. Now there is hardly a large hospital in the land that has not its well-equipped school. There are in Boston thirteen hospitals, and in all of these trained nurses are to be found at work. Within an hour's ride of Boston are twenty-two more, including those for the insane; and in all the educated nurse finds her useful place. In hundreds of private homes she is the helper, consoler, and friend.

Naturally, such a large body of intelligent and educated women feel the need of organization; and it is interesting to know that they are setting their standards higher and higher. Originally, the course was but one year. Then it was stretched to two, and now the women themselves are demanding three years for study. In the early days it was thought necessary for the pupil nurses to do a great deal of hard drudgery. There has been vast improvement in this direction. They must carefully learn how every thing in that line must be done, but their own strength is reserved for work requiring more brain power and dexterity of hand. In a few hospitals the hours of continuous duty have been reduced to nine instead of the long, weary ten or twelve or even thirteen. The time will undoubtedly come when the division will be on the eight-hour plan. When this change is made, and the curriculum is arranged to cover three years, the same course being adopted in all the leading hospitals, so that there shall be a uniform standard, the women who are graduated will occupy a standing hardly second to that of the physician. Even now, if one were to choose between a competent nurse and a physician, if but one could be had, many people would choose the nurse. Happily, they go together; and there is harmony between the two professions, though there is a little too much inclination on the part of some doctors to control the directories of nurses, as though they were an appendage to the medical profession.

It was a fine body of women who assembled in Boston the other day, and the matters they discussed were practical and important. They meet next year in Philadelphia, though perhaps not all may be there, for marriage, like death, loves a shining mark; and yearly some of these women, whose education admirably fits them for the home life, fall out by the way, and give up serving the public for the sake of ministering at the domestic altar. Wherever they are, they are a boon to the community.

THE USE AND ABUSE OF CHURCH-MANSHIP.

By turns there is something very beautiful, and something which we feel as dangerous, in the attachment that binds men to their religious institutions. Any great sacrifice of life and strength, such as churchmen have often made, is wonderful to look upon; but we feel, now and again, that it is too much like the beauty of the serpent which hides a deadly poison. Perhaps this is why Emerson said:—

"I like a church; I like a cowl;
I love a prophet of the soul;
And on my heart monastic aisles
Fall like sweet strains or pensive smiles;
Yet not for all his faith can see
Would I that cowed churchman be."

It ought to be possible to make some kind of distinction by which to explain in a measure the difference between a right and a wrong sort of churchmanship, so that we shall not lose the good in striking at the evil, and shall not tolerate an abuse which closely imitates a virtue. A distinction which promises at least some light upon the problem is that between fear and love as a ruling motive of the religious life. Throughout religious history we see one habit of practising sacred rites under the compulsion of a superstitious fear, and we see another habit of joyous sacrifice and praise.

There is one kind of attachment to the church which is essentially the same as the fetich worshipper's attachment to his image or charm, when the churchman does not feel for a moment safe from deadly perils apart from the ritual and dogma that constitute his means of salvation. There is another kind of affection for the church in which fear is practically unknown, but the mind is held by its love for time-honored expressions of the highest beauty and truth. Now, fear, as a controlling power, is itself a prolific source of the gravest dangers and abuses; and disinterested love is always a refining and purifying influence.

It may be that, as there are no characters all white or all black, love and fear are so mingled in the ordinary life they cannot be rendered entirely separate. Like the wheat and tares, they must grow together till the harvest. But it makes vast difference which has the ascendancy,—whether churchmanship takes its tone from reverence for heavenly things or from a consuming desire to get out from under the shadow of what is supposed to be God's curse upon man. The latter is not to be wholly trusted. The authorities which it sets up "play such fantastic tricks before high heaven as make the angels weep." It has an uncomfortable way of serving God by establishing a Spanish Inquisition, which makes it an undesirable neighbor. One reason to be assigned for this is that fear, when it is strong, maddens and crazes the mind, and, even in its weaker forms, so clouds the judgment that people cease to have clear ideas of right and wrong.

But, put away the false notion that every soul of man is in imminent peril of sinking into everlasting torture, and churchmanship is wholly eased of these alarming tendencies. Then it ceases its selfish scramble to get off the crumbling bank of the abyss,—a scramble in which all rights may be trodden under foot,—and prepares itself for a resolute and earnest attempt to scale the spiritual heights. Perhaps there still is and ought to be mingled with its love of what is bright and good some fear of the dark powers that surround us; but when hope, and not terror, has become the force that drives the Church, it is no longer a foe to liberty and progress.

The best churchmanship of the day in all communions is clearly of this stamp. Now and again, as when the Episcopal bishops tell us that, except for the miraculous birth of Christ, "we sinners have no true and adequate Mediator," we hear an echo of the old note of dreadful alarm. But it is only an echo. One is not quite sure if it be even so much as that,—whether it is anything more than a kind of silent posturing in imitation of the fierce zeal of former times. Certainly, on all ordinary occasions the appeal is made to man's love of goodness, very little to his fear of hell.

Many people, it would seem, have come to doubt whether, in the absence of those terrors which have so much ruled religion hitherto, any devoted adherence to the Church can be maintained. This scepticism is not without facts to allege as a pretext; but it is, on the whole, as pure a piece of atheism as there is going. True, there is a good deal of playing at having a church done by people who do not seem to know why they should have one, save to make it a little different from some other structure. But in all the past there are instructive examples of a heaven-born zeal for righteousness as strong and tenacious of purpose as any desire that is born of fear. Indeed, the light that has shone on every martyr's face is a radiance of pure love; and the loftiest courage and faith give no aid or comfort whatever to the theory that selfishness is the great tap-root of the tree of life.

The fears that have raged through the Church have so burned over the ground like a conflagration that it is small wonder if human nature does not at once respond to the cultivation of those who would bring forth its heavenly hopes. But the seeds are surely there, and will surely germinate. Wherever they have begun to spring up in newness of life, it is easy to see whether or not earnest churchmanship has disappeared with the thumbscrew and the rack.

It is time to stop fighting with shadows. The spectre of a spiritual authority torturing men for refusal to obey its mandates has become one of the thinnest ghosts that can be summoned from the vasty deep. The race is now for a form of the Church which best expresses man's highest spiritual ambitions, and most nobly utters the deepest insights of the soul. In that trial it will avail nothing whatever, in the end, to blacken the character of other contestants; but the great world will judge each one squarely and honestly by the fruits he can show. There is, therefore, no danger in loving one's Church to the uttermost, if only it is worthy to be loved; and with us it is each man's business to give it that character in his own and all other eyes.

Musings.

ON the eve of Washington's Birthday I recall with personal and patriotic satisfaction the privilege I had some twenty-five years ago, when in the State Department, of holding the key to the cabinets which contained the Washington papers. I have spent many an hour in going over the letters, diary, accounts, and records, written in that large, gentlemanly hand, which never lost its poise or became hurried, slovenly, or undignified, but always suggested the gentlemanly bearing and imposing presence of the writer. I was much gratified, in visiting Washington a few weeks ago, to find that the State Department was taking special pains to mount the Washington letters so as to retain their legibility and insure their preservation. Formerly they were huddled together in boxes, and were not properly protected from handling. The rules of good behavior, when you see them in their original handwriting, utterly dispel the idea that Washington was anything of a prig. No coxcomb could have written in such a bold, manly, unaffected hand; and then there was the Revolutionary diary, and the record of personal expenses, and the journal of how he spent his time before the war,—the printed pleasantries on one side of the page standing in contrast with Washington's sober entries on the other. There was one letter to Washington also carefully preserved in the department which I had not happened to see before, and which impressed me greatly. It was the letter which Major André wrote to Washington after his capture, asking that he might die as a soldier. The language in which this letter was written at once revealed the literary man as well as the soldier. There is not the slightest tremor in the firm, bold hand. It is a letter of a man who knew that death was inevitable, and who simply asked that he might die by the bullet instead of by the gibbet. I wonder that this manly letter did not soften the heart of Washington; but he never answered it, and I suspect it was partly because he could not easily find words in which to deny this request. I have often visited, as a boy, the spot where André was captured near Tarrytown, and admired the bluff courage and integrity of the cowboys who captured him, and who could not be bribed. But André was not less heroic than his captors. He succeeded in concealing in his mouth the miniature of the woman he loved, though he did not know that she had even then passed away, and that he would join her in a few weeks by a voyage over the same river.

I HAVE wondered what would have been the fortune of West Point, and the fortunes of the Revolutionary War, if André had succeeded in his mission and Arnold had succeeded in his treachery. But West Point was safe, and so was the cause; and we know that West Point has continued to be of service to the American Republic ever since. I doubt if it has ever done better service than it is doing to-day in turning out young men admirably fitted for the military profession. During the last week I have heard three West Point officers give addresses on the relation of the militia to the army and to the exigencies which may arise in our large cities. One of these addresses was delivered by Col. Green of the New York Seventy-first before the officers of the Massachusetts Fifth. Col. Green graduated from West Point in 1870, first in his class. He did some remarkable work in the South in the Ku-klux days, and assisted in determining the north-west boundary in 1873-74. He was military attaché at St. Petersburg, and witnessed the great engagements in the last war between Russia and Turkey. He was connected with the engineer corps in Washington for several years in improving the surface of that city. Of course, such a man is too valuable for the government to employ; and a large manufacturing concern has captured him for its president. Yet, under our military system, his West Point training and experience become valuable and useful in another way. He was elected colonel of the New York Seventy-first, and has seen service with that regiment in the riots in Buffalo and in Brooklyn. His address was an admirable statement of the duties of the militia in such exigencies. It was marked by intelligence, moderation, and practical wisdom, which made me wish it might be in the hands of the militia the country over. It showed that a man who graduated first in his class at West Point might find an admirable sphere for his training and abilities in educating the militia into order and efficiency. Our little army, let us trust, is to have no more Indian wars; but its officers and men have a very important vocation as instructors of our National Guard, on which the safety and peace of the nation must really depend.

Brevities.

Gen. Booth has had a warm welcome in Boston, in which Unitarians have heartily joined. At the meeting in Trinity Chapel Edward Everett Hale wore the army badge.

The reception to Gen. Booth at Trinity Chapel Tuesday afternoon drew together a catholic audience of Boston ministers and laymen. It is seldom that more people, representing such widely different religious views, are found together. For once Joseph Cooke and Minot J. Savage were not far apart.

Some ministers in the Outlook are discussing the question why young men do not go to church, founded on Mr. Edward W. Bok's article in the January Cosmopolitan; but it will be better to ask the young men themselves. We suspect that their answers would vary a good deal from that of some of the ministers.

The London Christian World tells the following story: "A hoary-headed joke has repeated itself in connection with the Laud celebration. A North-country gentleman went to the celebration because, he told his friends, he thought Laud must have been a good man, or King David would never have commended him in the Hundredth Psalm, wherein, in the metrical version, he sang in the North, nearly every Sunday, 'Praise Laud, and bless his name away!'"

With great truth and earnestness, Unity says: "There is much talk of the Church of the future; but, in the main, it is shallow talk. The Church of the future comes only as the Church of history came, by sacrifice, by profound faith. When we who boast of a liberal gospel shall have such living faith in this gospel, such a hold on our future, as the old cathedral and monastery builders had on theirs; when we shall build our very kitchens 'to the glory of God,'—build them so they stand the shock of centuries,—then we may hope to become a power over men's lives; then indeed we shall become the Catholic Church, and our altars will become the consecrated shrines of posterity."

The Herald of Gospel Liberty is the organ of the Christian Christ-ian Church. It has got itself into difficulty by some speculations on the Trinity in which the Christians do not believe. The editor has received the following communication, which is headed, "Please Don't": "Dear Bro. Summerbell,—Some articles have lately appeared in the Herald attempting to prove that the Holy Ghost is a person, and the father of the Lord Jesus Christ. Now, if the Father, the first person, who has always considered himself the Father of the Son, and who announced at the baptism of Jesus that Jesus was his Son, should hear of this, that he is not the Father, but that the 'third person' is the Father, would it not make trouble in the family? Please do not write anything that will make doubtful the honor of the Father."

The Examiner makes a needed plea for religious liberty. It shows that in "not a few of our States religious liberty is grossly, wickedly, infamously violated through abuse of what are called the Sunday laws." This persecution falls largely upon the Seventh-day Adventers, members of which organization have been imprisoned in Arkansas, Tennessee, Maryland, Georgia, and Western Pennsylvania. The Examiner says: "All these are in violation of the principle of religious liberty, which is that the State takes no cognizance whatever of any one's religion or lack of religion,—that the State has nothing to do with religion, except to see that no one's religious rights are interfered with. No one, under whatever guise, has a right to disturb the Sunday worship of his neighbors. No one has a right on Sunday to go through the streets with a band of music or to cry his wares. But any work done that does not interfere with the rights of others is utterly out of the proper reach of the law."

Pro and Con.

"UNITY HYMNS AND SONGS."

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

I see that in a recent number of your paper Rev. F. L. Hosmer states that the price of the new edition of "Unity Hymns and Songs," published by the Western Unitarian Sunday School Society, has been fixed at 50 cents. It is quite certain that the book is worth all of that, judged either by the printer's bills or by the intrinsic value of the work. Not even Mr. Hosmer can rate it too highly; but a much lower price has been fixed, and the book is sold at 40 cents a copy, or $3 a dozen. And perhaps I may be allowed to add that, so well is the work appreciated, that all but about fifty copies of the first thousand have been already sold. Yours sincerely,

A. W. GOULD,
President Western Unitarian Sunday School Society.

BOOKS FOR THE SOUTH AND WEST.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

The Cheerful Letter Exchange ask leave to thank, through your columns, those who have been so kind as to send books for our Southern and Western Sunday-school and church libraries.

We have received the following books out of the list asked for:—

One set of the Waverley novels, three novels by Miss Austen, two by Mrs. Stowe, two by Charlotte Brontë, one each by Miss Alcott, Mrs. Whitney, Miss Yonge, and George Eliot; also Dickens's Child's History of England, Irving's Life and Letters, Higginson's History of the United States, Pardoe's Life of Louis XIV., some good biographies, and a few other books.

We have not received any copies of Fiske's History of the United States, nothing by Parton, Macaulay, Motley, and Parkman, none of the books for children mentioned (except the one by Miss Alcott and two by Mrs. Whitney above), nothing by George MacDonald, only one copy of Dr. Hale's "In His Name," only one novel each by Dickens and by Miss Yonge.

We hope no one will be prevented from giving by having only one book to bestow; and that it will be understood that the more duplicates we have, the better. The works of Dickens and Scott may often be procured now at reasonable prices, and are always read by the frequenters of libraries.

Books may be sent to the vestry of Arlington Street Church on any week-day, and will be packed and forwarded. They should be addressed to Miss Langmaid.

THE NEW LITURGY.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

Many inquiries having been received from all parts of the country in regard to the progress being made by the committee on the new liturgy, it would seem to be a matter of sufficient public interest to bring before the attention of the readers of the Register. Speaking therefore not officially, but simply for myself, I will say that for the last year the committee has worked faithfully and continuously; and it now hopes to issue the book somewhere near the middle of March.

First as to the contents of the book. There will be but five services (in place of ten, as in the Martineau collection). These five services will be followed by three special ones, intended for Easter, Christmas, and memorial occasions; about twenty pages will be given to prayers; and the rest of the book will contain the psalter, especially arranged for responsive reading. As to the make-up of these five services, it may be well to say that the committee has tried to do a very difficult thing. It finds in the larger number of our churches a congregational form of worship, such as, for instance, the doxology, an exhortation, a responsive reading, Scripture, prayer, congregational hymn, sermon, with final prayer and hymn, such choir music being interspersed as the taste of each minister suggests. In a few of our churches there is what may be called the Episcopalian order of service, modelled after that laid down in the Common Book of Prayer. At the very beginning the problem which confronted the committee was how to reconcile in one set of services these two methods of religious procedure, so as to satisfy and please all parties concerned. Starting from no theory of its own, the committee interviewed various clergymen, and called for suggestions from all those who were likely to use a book of liturgy, if one after their own heart could be compiled. Speaking simply for myself, let me say that I have received valuable suggestions and ideas from men in all parts of the land; and largely these will be found to be incorporated in the five services, either in the prayers, sentences, or parts of the responsive readings, etc. Among others these ideas have been obtained either directly in conversation or through letter from the following clergymen: Messrs. Wendte, Sprague, Eliot, and Wilbur of the Pacific Coast; Mr. Hosmer of St. Louis; Prof. F. G. Peabody of Harvard; and Rev. Messrs. W. H. Savage, Littlefield, Fish, MacDougall, and Gilman of Massachusetts.

My own ministerial experience having been almost altogether in the Far West, I have tried to meet the wants of those churches with which I am personally acquainted. All the way through the work I have said, How would this service meet the wants of my former congregation in Denver or San Francisco? Rev. Howard N. Brown, another member of the committee, has doubtless asked himself the same question about his own congregation. The largest catholicity has been shown in the compilation of the prayers, Jewish, Roman, and Hindu thought having been utilized, as well as that enshrined in some of the best ancient prayers. A number of modern prayers to meet the reverent yet liberal spirit of this age have also been compiled. The Rubric, as arranged, allows the greatest elasticity; and it will be possible to take this book into almost any one of our churches, and with very slight changes in the present order of service to use it as a help to worship. Possibly, nothing further need be said at present. These slight hints will give the general reader an idea of what the committee has aimed to do. If the book be not the last and most satisfactory compilation which will be issued for the use of Unitarian churches, it is hoped it is, at least, in the right direction. Having blazed the path, others may follow, and succeed in doing what we who are the pioneers can only hope to partially accomplish.

THOMAS VAN NESS.

CONVENTION MORALS.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

The topic treated in the last two numbers of the Register by Mr. Snyder and Mr. Chadwick is one of constant and large interest. Its discussion is always timely and should be useful. I suppose it must have, as all questions are said to have, two sides, else Mr. Snyder and Mr. Chadwick would not be opposed to each other; but except for the fact that men do differ on it I should say it is one question to which there is but one side. As Abraham Lincoln said, "If slavery is not wrong, then nothing is wrong," so I should say of Mr. Snyder's doctrine,—that if a man is a member of a party or of a party convention, he is bound to support the action or nominee of the party—that if such a doctrine is not wrong, then nothing is wrong. By this I do not mean to imply that the one offence is as great as the other, but that the one is as indefensible as the other. In the present lack of responses from the list of very eminent men whose opinions Mr. Snyder would be glad to have, I venture a word, though Mr. Chadwick has hardly left one which needs to be said.

Mr. Snyder says, "It is understood to be a political and party axiom that delegates to a national convention will support its candidate." Elsewhere he refers to this as "a fundamental principle of party organization." I think he is mistaken here. I know of no such understanding except with the very broad limitation hereafter considered, still less of such a fundamental principle. My observation and experience go no further than to show that the support of a candidate or measure of one's party is ordinarily expected, as alas! it is too often given,—from the members of the party; but among all but machine politicians, among all who practise or care for political virtue, all whose views Mr. Snyder, I think, would value, I should say it was understood that whether one should support the candidate or measure of one's party or not, always depended on the answer to the other question,—whether the candidate was worthy or the measure was good, or not. I do not think any party as such has ever yet had the hardihood to avow the tenet or theory that its members are bound in honor or conscience, or even in fidelity to party obligations, to support party action unless such action, after it is taken and made known, meets the moral and political approval of the individual members of the party. Individuals have often asserted Mr. Snyder's claim. The late Gen. B. F. Butler did it, when he demanded the exclusion from a Massachusetts Republican convention of a delegate who avowed in advance his purpose not to support Butler if he were nominated by the convention. This demand was not only spurned by the convention, but it called out from James Freeman Clarke, himself a delegate in the same convention, the golden phrase, worth volumes of homily—"the divine right of bolting."

The phrase is not strained. It is simple, elementary morality; primary ethical truth. The right to reject a nominee or spurn a platform of one's party, if believed to be morally unsound, is as inherent, as inalienable, as divine and as clear as any right we may claim. Not only may we claim and exercise it, not only may no other man or body of men deny it to us, but we ourselves may never, except upon our peril, fail or neglect to assert and maintain it against all comers. Why? Simply because we are, each and all of us, responsible moral beings, bound by moral rules and answerable in the forum of morals as individuals, and not as mere parts of a majority or other aggregation of men. Does Mr. Snyder really wish us to think that if Mr. Blaine's nomination—I refer to it not to wound but for illustration—was immoral, or was sincerely believed by him to be so, Mr. Curtis ought to have supported it because he was a member of the convention that made it? I can hardly think so. If he does, he claims for party a prerogative and power which party has never to my knowledge dared openly or in terms to claim for itself. I have been a party man, have sounded party shibboleths loud and long, have worn party gyves,—thank Heaven, long ago! but I can say with emphasis, non in haec foedera veni, even then.

I think, therefore, Mr. Snyder errs in counting it a recognized or avowed or even implied rule of party organization among honorable men, that a member of a political party is bound to support his party's action, or if he be a delegate in a nominating convention, to support its candidate, regardless of his individual moral sense or judgment touching such action or candidate.

Upon the other question, whether such a rule, if supported by unvarying party practice and authority, could stand at the bar of conscience and morals, how can men of ethical training or moral sense differ? Mr. Snyder says that without such a party fetter there can be "no such thing as party discipline or cohesiveness." This is the wonted language of the party hack, the boss, the party ringster or whipper-in, not of one who fills the chair of a moral teacher. I might borrow a recent rough phrase of Dr. Parkhurst and say, Party discipline and cohesiveness "go hang." What is party? Is it or ought it to be more than a body of men who think alike at a given time on certain leading public topics, the doors of its organization swinging freely both ways—to let in or let out its members—with the necessarily implied and understood and perpetual condition of membership, that when the action of the party ceases to meet the approval of the individual members, no party obligation longer binds them? And what is a party convention? It is just what Mr. Curtis described it,—merely a conference of members to agree upon lines of policy or statements of principles. Always, I repeat it, always there is the implicit condition that no member is bound by the result of the convention one step or fraction of a step beyond where it meets his moral approval. It is only on such terms and between men governed by such rules that honorable party relations are possible. Discipline and cohesion that go further are got at the cost of the very things which parties profess to seek; namely, public welfare and honor and private rights and security. A man who bows his neck to such a yoke is fit to be, as he will be, the slave of his party, the tool of its boss, and the support of its machine.

A man may not be false or treacherous in his party relations. He may not promise and break his promise. He must act in good faith and not deceptively, but it is no part of party fealty to merge one's moral identity in one's party or to leave it to party to make the final determination of moral or even of mere political issues. The best party man is always he who stands in no awe of party; the poorest party man is he who permits it to be understood that his action can be controlled by party beyond the plain line of his private sense of duty. I used to say when chattel slavery existed in this country that the most pitiable victim of slavery was the willing or contented slave, and I say now the most worthless party man is the man who makes a fetish of his party or who for one moment hesitates to repudiate its action whenever it does not square to his own serious personal convictions.

Mr. Curtis was wholly right, though I well remember chiding him for his delay, in bolting the Chicago nomination in 1884; Mr. Chadwick is wholly right in calling the doctrine which Mr. Snyder defends, "unmitigable stuff," though I cannot find the word in my dictionaries; and Mr. Cary is wholly right in making "short work" of the slavish theory which converts into a conscience-keeper what is at most a mere combination based on identity or similarity of views, having no authority or claim after divergence of views shall for any reason have occurred. D. H. CHAMBERLAIN.

Reading over in cold typewriting what I have here written, I see clearly I have taken a rather dogmatic tone, but certainly not from any lack of respect for Mr. Snyder; whom, on the contrary and for the best of reasons, I hold in high esteem.

THE WAKENED HARP.

BY WM. HOWARD MONTGOMERY.

The flag of Erin waved beside Old Tara's castle wall:
 Below it bloomed in joy and pride
 An orange-lily tall.
 Swayed by the breeze, the silken folds
 Caressed the lily's head.
 "Let us forget the bitter past,"
 The floating banner said.

"Why should our colors or our faith
 Like barriers fall between?
 Thy chalice blooms with orange hue,
 Thy stem and leaves are green.
 Our common hope is God's great love:
 Thy Saviour, too, is mine;
 And o'er us from his throne above Shines down the light divine."

"God bless thee for thy words of peace!"
 The waving blossom cried:
 "We'll bury with those bygone years
 Their discord and their pride.
 Well may thy fluttering folds of green
 In triumph be unfurled!
 Thy color is the selfsame one
 That gladdens all the world."

Then scattered at their feet they saw
 A nation's broken chain;
 And, lo! the silent air was cleft
 By music's thrilling strain.
 In rapture at the glorious dawn
 On Erin's troubled shore
 The harp long mute on Tara's wall
 Rang out in song once more.

The Unitarian Club.

IDEAL AMERICANISM.

The Boston Unitarian Club held its monthly meeting on the evening of February 13, Mr. Francis C. Lowell, the vice-president, being in the chair. In opening the discussion of the evening, Mr. Lowell said:—

Address of Mr. Francis C. Lowell.

Some excellent people tell us that the sentiment of patriotism is a relic of barbarism, which in the process of evolution will disappear. They tell us that a proper love of our neighbor requires us to regard mankind, from China to Peru, with equal, impartial, philanthropic regard. Some of these good people carry their theory to its logical results, and decline to a man the right to love his own family better than any of the rest of his fellow-citizens. Now, if these people confined themselves to speaking prophetically of what they supposed was going to happen in the twenty-fifth or thirtieth century, instead of complaining of the sentiments of the nineteenth century, I should have no controversy with them, though their prognostications might make me the more thankful that I was not born five hundred or a thousand years hence. At the present day I think we may say this: that a proper realization of what evolution really means shows us that patriotism, being a natural sentiment, has a reasonable use, which conduces to the benefit of mankind as a whole. That it has an unreasonable use is too painfully evident. There is a blatant and immoral egotism which is a parody of patriotism, just as there is a nepotism which is a parody of proper family love. What true patriotism is I think we can best learn from a book with which, whether rightly or wrongly I shall not pause to consider, we Unitarians are charged with being too little familiar. I mean the Old Testament. There is no book or collection of books, if you prefer to put it that way, so full of patriotism as is the Old Testament. It is true that the patriotism of the Hebrew was sometimes savage and cruel, but often it was sublime. Read the sixty-second chapter of Isaiah, for example, realizing what it meant to the man in the book, without a thrill of patriotism if you can. I know that the common consent of all Christendom has applied to such words as "Jerusalem" and "Zion" an allegorical or esoteric meaning, and I am very far from saying that that application is not justified. But it ought not to make us forget that such a word as "Jerusalem," for example, meant to the man who uttered it and to the man who heard the words that hill town in Judea which the Hebrew, present or in exile by the rivers of Babylon, so intensely loved. "For Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest, until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth. For as a young man marrieth a virgin, so shall thy sons marry thee; and, as the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee." Circumstances change, but the spirit of man remains much the same from age to age; and the American patriot may learn a lesson from the Hebrew.

To-night we have with us a man who, called by nature and by his holy profession, has by example and precept taught Americans for years to love that dear land of ours to which the providence of God has called us. I have the pleasure of introducing to you Rev. Father Conaty of Worcester:—

Address of Rev. Thomas J. Conaty, D.D.

Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Club, —I am not without a feeling of gratitude to you for the very kind invitation extended to me to address you this evening; and I am equally grateful to you, members of the club, for your generous and cordial welcome.

As I listened to the worthy vice-president of your club speaking of patriotism, and also of the jingoism which at times and periods seems to be common to all races and creeds and nationalities, I felt that it was rather a strange position that in this day, when there is so much that is simply lip-service patriotism and so much condemnation of the church of which I am a minister, you should ask me to address your non-Catholic body upon that which is dear to us all, the making of a true American. It seems to me that you thus give the strongest possible answer to the men who dare to say that any roof-tree of a church or any roof-tree of a home or any blood that courses through men's veins can of itself make hostility to America. [Applause.]

I have been asked to speak to you to-night upon "The Ideal American," and I realize at once the difficulty of the task. It is not the question of a man's ideal. It is not the picking out from the great men of history some one who stands more eminently the incarnation of all that is good in our political history. It is that from all our history we may draw, not an ideal American, but the ideal American,—a man that becomes such because of the institutions of our country, a man who cannot be otherwise if true to the principles upon which our government is founded. I am asked to turn to our history, and from it to cast, as it were, upon a canvas before you the picture of the ideal man.

I realize the difficulty, because I cannot divest myself of my own feelings in the matter; and I know that in the minds of many there may come the thought that this ideal American is my own conception or but a play of fancy. But I would ask you to consider that I am but a student of history; and that from the pages of our history I shall try to draw for you the lineaments, the character, the expression, of what you as well as I can find by close study of our common history.

And, after all, is not this a place for just such study as that? Here in Boston, historic Boston, under the shadow of Bunker Hill, within gunshot of Concord and Lexington, under the inspiration of the names of noble men,—here in this very atmosphere must not the student of history breathe the spirit of Hancock and Otis and Adams, of Phillips and Andrew? And, though we might take one or all of them to make our composite picture, yet not with that will we be satisfied. But we will go down to the foundation stones of the fabric which they helped to build and to embellish; and, like true students of history, we will ask, not our country's patriots, but our country herself, to tell us her ideal American.

WHAT IS AMERICANISM?

What is Americanism? We hear much of it to-day. One would imagine that it was simply the floating of a flag over a school-house. Another would imagine that it was simply the blatant voice of the demagogue, who considers no man to have patriotism but himself. What does our country tell us Americanism is? Ah, it is something deeper than the mere lip-service of the demagogue seeking political position. It is something deeper than the hypocrisy of the "holier than thou" Pharisee politician. It is the innate and the deep-rooted sense of love for liberty in the individual man, for the love of liberty itself, and for the enjoyment of it in his life. If I read our history at all aright, it tells me that Americanism is the embodiment of personal liberty,—liberty to serve the God that made us and liberty to serve the brother that stands by our side. That is the political incarnation of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. [Applause.]

Americanism is something real and tangible. It has flesh and blood. Americanism is simply law with liberty and liberty with law. It is the generous, unselfish determination to help our neighbor, to make the world better for our being in it, and to offer to God better service because men are freer to serve him as they will. That is my thought of Americanism. Let us question the foundations.

NATIONAL IDEALS.

Every nation has its nation idea. Providence has selected different individuals for work among men, and Providence has selected nations for work among nations. We turn back the pages of history, and we find the Hebrews with their nation idea: it was the idea of faith. To them were given the traditions of religion, that they might preserve them for the nations to come, for the nations unborn. Rome had its nation idea: it was conquest and government. Greece had its nation idea: it was art. The American's nation idea is liberty,—the liberty of the individual man because he is man. There were other republics before ours, and men in them enjoyed comparative liberty; but it was the liberty of the few and the slavery of the many. Rome in all her greatness was practically a nation of slaves. The freemen were few, the slaves were many. Athens in all her splendor was but a handful of freemen. The great masses were slaves; and their freedom and the citizenship which came out of their freedom was a gift of the State or a gift of the senate or a gift of the majority of the freemen. The republics of the Middle Ages had their freedom and their citizenship, but it was a freedom and a citizenship of class. The Holland republics had their citizenship from out their guilds and their skilled artisans. The republics of Greece had their citizenship from their aristocracy. There was liberty, it is true, but liberty minimized,—liberty the birthright of citizenship, liberty that came with citizenship and passed away when citizenship passed away. How often have we considered, when we have read the story of old, how much slavery exercised its power in the world for the benefit of the few! The great battle of Marathon was fought and won by slaves. How often as school-boys have we, in our attempts at oratory, committed to memory the great speech of Spartacus to his gladiators! How often we have revelled in striving to produce something of the power of that noble athlete as he stood at the foot of the mountain, with his thirty thousand gladiators before him, full of rage against Rome, that had made them simply the tools for the enlargement of Rome or the winning of their battles; and, when the test came to those men, and their leader stood before them, he said to them, "Men, if we must die, let us die for liberty." And he raised the banner of revolt against Rome. They were met by the armies of Pompey; and do you remember the message that Pompey sent to the Roman senate? He said, "We have met the vile slaves, and we have reduced them to their original nothingness." And yet those "vile slaves" were the physical beauties of manhood. They were the men who stood in the arena to battle against one another and against wild beasts, and all to make a Roman holiday. They were "vile slaves" in the eyes of the Roman senators; and they were "reduced to nothingness" whence they came.

AMERICA AND LIBERTY.

Athens bestowed citizenship at will. A man in Athens was free because Athens willed him to be free. His freedom was a gift of the State. The same State that gave it by its vote could withdraw it, and return him again to the absence of citizenship. Ah! but America, to whom Liberty flew for a resting-place, America took Liberty to her bosom, drank in her inspiration, and felt that liberty was not a gift of senate nor a gift of people nor a prerogative of title, but that it was innate in man's individual being; and that whether the senate willed it or not, whether the State willed it or not, whether he was of lowest or highest caste, that he was a man was sufficient to entitle him to all the privileges of human liberty, and with it the citizenship which the State might create for him. [Applause.]

America was the first nation to realize that manhood was the source of citizenship, as manhood was the source of liberty; and by this there came to the American the high Christian thought of liberty. For he who had come an outcast to the great city, of which he was supposed one day to be the king, he who had come as an outcast that he might live for his fellows and die for them and redeem them,—the Saviour of the world,—came to teach the world, for the first time, the true thought of human liberty, that it was in man, and not in the power of other men. And, when our fathers built their fabric of liberty, they placed as the foundation-stone the Christian thought of liberty in the inalienable right of man to life, happiness, and liberty.

AMERICANISM OF CHARACTER AND PURPOSE.

Edward Everett has a thought, in speaking of the Revolution, in which he says: "Independence, if taken literally, is of no interest and little value. Construed in its real meaning, it binds us to a distinctive Americanism of character and purpose, to a keen sense of large responsibility, and to generous self-devotion." "Distinctive Americanism of character and purpose,"—friends, do you realize it? Do you recognize it in the story of our country's birth? "Distinctive Americanism" in the thought of liberty,—not mere license to do the unjust thing, but liberty to do the just thing, liberty to do right according to the individual conscience. Distinctive Americanism of character, so that the nations of the world, looking upon America, will see in her the home, the resting-place, the shrine of liberty, outside of which, unless she communicated it, there would be no real liberty. Americanism a title of citizenship, better and nobler than titles given by family or given by vote of the majority. A character which is individual, and which makes our citizenship not merely the voice of the houses of Congress, but the voice of the individual American, where every man is king, where every man has power to rule. Oh, long distant from us be the day when we shall ever acknowledge that the halls of legislation shall be the entire embodiment of our American citizenship! [Applause.] For our State makes our nation, and the home of the individual citizen makes the State. [Applause.] There is the source of our greatness,—to protect the citizen, to protect the individual in the enjoyment of life, liberty, and happiness. The individual citizen is our strength. Upon him is our nation built. And that is the purpose of our Americanism,—to prove to the world that man can be trusted. Sam Adams said of old, "We can trust the people," and he trusted the people as the people trusted him; and because of that mutual trust the gunshot of the Revolution was made the knell of all tyranny. By that trust of man for man the American nation was able to show to the world for the first time that all men could be freemen, and that all men could be trusted in the government of themselves. "Distinctive American character,"—friends, do you find it anywhere else? Oh, we know, we know the pessimists speak to us of the dangers from the people; but the people, when properly understanding their duty, bring no danger. The danger comes from the few, and not from the many. [Applause.] Edward Everett says that this distinctive Americanism of character and purpose brings with it "a large responsibility." Yes, a responsibility upon you and me, a responsibility upon every citizen. No man so poor as not to add to the wealth of the nation, no man so rich as to be able to make our nation what it ought to be; but the individual units, acting together in their citizenship, they make the nation. And hence there come to the individual citizen the responsibilities of liberty,—responsibilities which we carry with us everywhere, in our business, in our private life, in our public life, everywhere to be Americans according to the American idea, according to the ideal of human liberty, everywhere living that other men may be the better for our living, and everywhere living that other nations may see the beauty of trusting the people and bringing out from the people all that tends to the people's good. These responsibilities follow us in all our relations as citizens, so that anything which strikes at the individual citizen strikes the State as it strikes the nation; anything that corrupts the individual citizen corrupts the State and corrupts the nation; anything that in any manner abridges or diminishes the rights of the individual citizen diminishes and abridges the thought of human liberty, which is our nation idea, to perpetuate and to preserve. [Applause.]

THE SOURCE OF OUR LIBERTY.

"Generous self-devotion,"—was there ever a nation that fought more generously for liberty? Cast upon these inhospitable shores, but with a sense of manhood within them that would not brook the tyranny even of royalty, the early American pioneers felt inspired to lay here the foundations of the fabric of human liberty. And not mere lip-service was theirs, not mere Pharisaism was theirs; but there was a knitting together of men to men for the common cause of home and country, with liberty above them. How our fathers suffered in those early days! I say "our fathers," because we are the inheritors of their deeds, and they are our fathers in liberty. The emigrant that stood upon our shores for the first time yesterday, with a feeling that he wanted to come under the mantle of American liberty, and was determined to cleave to it, is as American as I who came forty years ago, or you whose parents came a hundred or more years ago. For the source of our liberty is in our manhood, and the man who comes to our shores carrying to them his tribute of manhood is welcomed by the hand and welcomed by the heart of every true American. [Applause.]

THE STAIN UPON OUR BANNER.

But there was a stain upon our banner, there was a spot upon our shrine, there was a something wanting to give the complete embodiment of liberty to the world. It hung over our nation as a black pall of death, giving as it were the lie to all our professions of liberty. It was there by law, it was there by statute; and yet there sprang in the American breast, upon these shores of Massachusetts where the first lessons of liberty had been taught, the wish to blot out by organized effort that foul stain from our record, to take away that which the world reproached us with. And, though it took years of war and millions of money and millions of hearts' blood, yet I think you and I agree that it was well worth the sacrifice; for, when the War of the Rebellion was over, and one flag floated over a united country, and brothers met again as brothers after having met as enemies, and they sang the hymn of unity, they sang it as it never had been sung before, because they were able to say, "We have taken from our statute that which says the black man shall not be free; and we have taught to the world that neither race nor color nor creed shall be deprived of the advantages of human liberty, but that over this vast continent there shall float the flag of freedom, and the black men shall leave the cabin of a slave to come into the free light of liberty as a free American citizen." [Applause.]

Ah, friends, until that was done, we were not a nation of freemen, as we had professed ourselves in the eyes of the world to be! While, then, we regret those pages of darkness in our brotherly strife, let us give thanks to God that at least there was this reward, that we had taken the chains of slavery from millions of men, and had lifted them up into the free daylight of American liberty. Never, never again, will we stain our honor with the slavery of any man, be he black or red; but all men, as all creeds, as all nationalities, shall be amalgamated into American citizenship. That is the American idea.

May I touch on a few of the dangers as they occur to me? For our duty is to watch and ward, to watch and save. Liberty has been handed down to us, not for ourselves alone, but for those who are to come after us,—handed down that we may beautify and embellish it, so that other nations, looking upon us, may take courage as our fathers did, and shake off the shackles of human slavery in whatever form they may exist, and rise into the dignity of citizens as America invests us.

THE DANGER OF DEMAGOGISM.

One danger, I think we all agree, is to be found in the demagogism which at times prevails,—not merely the demagogism that preaches false doctrines against human liberty, but demagogism that attempts to corrupt human liberty in the citizen. The man who would touch in any manner the liberty of the individual citizen to exercise his citizenship, that man is a greater danger to the State than the citizen who under his influence forgets his duty to the State; for the one poses as a leader, and the other as a follower. The man who attempts to defile our common stream of citizenship, that man, no matter what the world calls him, is a danger to our American State; and you and I and every man with a true sense of our American citizenship should rise in arms to protect our common country from him. Oh, if the fathers on these plains were willing to leave the homes they had made and go forth never to return, because they would not acknowledge the right of a foreign power to tax them without representation, why should not we, in the face of danger greater than that, rise to defend by word or act, to ostracize, to mark, to brand, the man, whoever he is, in whatever party he be, to whatever class he belongs, who dares to stand in the presence of citizens either to buy his right to power and to rule or to corrupt the common foundations of our citizenship by any of the means that are known to the demagogue? Friends, the danger-signal should be put wherever the citizen's vote is touched, wherever the attempt is made, no matter what the motive, to poison and corrupt the foundations of our common citizenship.

THE DANGER OF RUM RULE.

There is another danger, and to my mind it grows out of this. Perhaps I may be a little selfish in this matter, in the sense of following my own line of thought; but I have come to believe that one of the greatest dangers to our American citizenship is in the organized power by which men attempt to rule us, who have neither right from God nor from men, but who rule us for their own selfish ends. The great power of rum, the great power of the liquor associations, are at the bottom of much of the corruption of our great cities. They trade upon the weaknesses of the individual men. They use that power which is for the time given to them, that they may lift themselves above their fellows into wealth and political influence and power. I am one of those who believe that one of the greatest of the forces of evil in our body is that organized traffic in rum, that traffic that respects not the laws, as it respects not the individual. I speak of it now as an organized effort,—that effort, that traffic which practically nullifies what is upon our statute books when that stands in the way of its success,—always unwearying and unwearyed in the attempt to corrupt the sources of citizenship.

THE DANGER OF BIGOTRY.

There is another influence, as there is another danger; and I, as an American in the presence of Americans, am ashamed to mention it, to think that in this city and in this State and in this land there should stand even a single man who should be allowed to say that religious differences endanger our common country. And yet we know that the bigot is abroad, abroad in organized power. You and I may agree that it is not intelligent power, but is a power of darkness; for it could not live in the open light of American public sentiment. It seeks the darkness of the night and the secrecy of the lodge to aim its blow at an individual citizen, because he does not worship at the same altar. Oh, shame upon our manhood if it ever shall be Americanism to say that because I kneel at one altar and you at another there is between us a dagger that goes to the heart of American liberty! The altar I kneel at and the altar you kneel at are the common foundations of our individual goodness, and it is that which makes the State good; and the dagger that would go to the heart of liberty would be snatched from it by the worshipper at my altar as by yours. [Applause.]

AMERICANISM AND CATHOLICISM.

We hear a great deal of the danger from the Catholic Church. We never imagined we were such dangerous beings. We were trying to live like our neighbors, groping along day by day, and trying to do the greatest good we could to the greatest number. We have lived in and out of these communities, we have been born and bred upon these hillsides, we have studied the history with our neighbors, we have suffered and died with our neighbors for liberty; and yet men stand and call us a menace and a danger! Oh, we can recall, we can recall with feelings of gladness, what our books of history state of our forefathers in the faith, in the days when it cost men to be true! We can recall how, upon the weary hills and by the frozen rivers, when Washington needed men of heart and energy, he could look upon his Moylan and his Meade, just as the business men who stood behind them, to supply them with the necessities of life, were glad to call upon the Carrolls and McClenahan, and all those brave men united in Philadelphia. There was then no question of loyalty to the country. And when the dark days of Rebellion came? I remember as a boy, and you can remember with me, how a certain tide of hostility passing over our State took the arms from the shoulders of the Columbian Guards in Boston and the Emmet Guards in Worcester, and there was a sense of narrowness and hostility to race and creed; but, when the tocsin of war sounded, and when Lincoln called for men, and when Andrew sent out his proclamation, the first men to answer to the summons were the Columbian Guards of Boston and the Emmet Guards of Worcester. [Applause.] In that moment they had forgotten the bigotry and the religious hostility. They saw liberty in danger; and they were the men and the children of men who had been driven from a country they loved because they would not worship at an altar they did not believe in, and they loved the liberty they had found, and were willing to die for it. Who questioned in those days the loyalty of any man to American liberty on account of his creed?

Who braver, who better exemplified the love of true manhood for liberty, than those gallant men of the Sixty-ninth New York who laid their bones upon nearly every battlefield of our Rebellion?

A good Scotch friend of mine in Worcester, who has no feeling for anything but what is broad and liberal and true, said to me the other day, "Father Conaty, there was a gentleman came to my store the other day, and there was a book lying on the counter. He picked it up, and he looked at it; and he said to me, 'There are men in Massachusetts that wouldn't let that man have the privileges of citizenship because he was an Irishman and a Catholic.' That man was Phil Sheridan, whose Life he picked from the counter; and the man who said it was your friend and mine, George Hoar." In those days was there a question between the Catholic Sheridan and the Protestant Grant? Was there a question between the Catholic Corcoran and the Protestant McClellan? No, there was a flag to be saved, there was a country to be redeemed, there was a principle to fight for; and, though they knelt at different altars, there was but one altar of liberty, and before that altar they offered that sacrifice that calls for the greatest of men's efforts, their life-blood. Yet men tell us we are a danger to the republic!

COMMON GROUND OF OUR AMERICANISM.

My friends,—I call you so because I know you and I are friends,—we meet together upon the common ground of our Americanism. I ask no favors of any man, nor do I want any odds from him. I simply say: "Do you want a profession of loyalty? I will not give it. Look at my life, gauge my actions, see what I have done, see what I am willing to do, and then put the test." For that is loyalty that is willing to suffer and to die, that men may be better; loyalty that goes into the cabin of the poor, to lift from him the heavy load of suffering and poverty; loyalty that goes to the death-bed of the fever patient, in order to bring to him some of the solace of religion; loyalty that goes, when the nation summons men, to die for her, and says, "This my life is small indeed and short indeed; but, if this country that I love wants my life, I will give it to save her." When men are needed to stand between her and the bullet of the enemy, then, like our fathers of old and like our brothers, then will you find no stronger men, no truer men, no more loyal men, than those who worship at the altar of which I am privileged to be one of the ministers. [Applause.]

Not in all our code of morals, not in all our code of doctrine, is there a single fibre of hostility to true Americanism; but there is hostility to demagogism, and there is hostility to that which would destroy true manhood. There is hostility to the bigot; for, if I read my history aright, my Catholic forefathers on the shores of Baltimore preached religious toleration first. Yes, as Bancroft himself says, and as Montgomery confirms it in the book which is in our schools to-day, and as Mr. Fiske said practically the other day, at Baltimore, five years before the Baptist colony at Providence proclaimed religious toleration, the Catholic colony at Maryland proclaimed it. It is well for us to read our history aright. Thank God, there are men who read it with the clear spectacles of reason and unprejudice. We are willing to trust ourselves to them.

We are here from all the nations of the earth. We are here from all the religions of the sphere. We are here filled with the love of liberty, asking simply that no man stand between us and our altar, no matter what that altar may be; that no man stand between us and our conscience, no matter what our conscience in right reason may dictate; but that our test of loyalty shall be in the good we bring from out the searching years to this land, which has received us with the hospitality of a mother and the kindness of a friend. Then, then, shall we be true Americans.

Have I pictured the ideal American to you? Were I now to draw back the veil before the canvas upon which I would fain have drawn the lines, would you recognize, from what I have said, the ideal American? Liberal and just, wanting liberty for himself and wanting that it should be held by others, protecting liberty in himself and for the good it brings, and protecting it equally in his brethren; liberal and just, fair-minded, giving to every man the honesty of the motive which he would wish every man to give to him, living to the full sense of the Golden Rule, and simply asking that all we have of good in this nature of ours, material and spiritual, we be willing to give to build up this fabric of human liberty, where the peoples of the world may come to worship true manhood according to Christ,—oh, this, this indeed, is my thought of the ideal American! May I then say that the wish of this ideal American is expressed in those words of our well-beloved Holmes?—

"God of the universe, shield us and guide us,
Trusting thee always, through shadow and sun!
Thou hast united us, who shall divide us?
Keep us, oh, keep us, the many in one."

Mr. LOWELL.—I am sure that I express the feelings of all of us in giving our deepest thanks to the speaker for his eloquent presentation of the ideal Americanism, and his eloquent enforcement upon us of the responsibilities resting upon each one of us, without which citizenship and patriotism are worse than useless. [Applause.]

We had hoped to have with us to-night, and we had hoped that he would address us, Rev. Leighton Parks of Emanuel Church in Boston; but he has found himself obliged by illness to remain at home, being unable to speak on account of a severe attack of bronchitis. We are fortunate in having with us another gentleman who, in an entirely different way and by an entirely different means, has rare opportunities of enforcing upon large numbers of people a realizing sense of public duty. For certainly there is no means which reaches so many people, and I do not know if there be any means so effective for reaching the public, as the daily newspaper. I have great pleasure in presenting to you Mr. Stephen O'Meara, the editor of the Boston Journal.

Address of Mr. Stephen O'Meara.

I wish, Mr. President, that you had informed your associates, as an apology for me, that I stand here to-night a drafted man, and that I fear I shall perform my work as drafted men are apt to do. I was asked by your secretary to fill the gap, the cause of which you have understood from your president's explanation; and I told him that I would put myself in his hands, and, if he were willing to take the risk, I would take the post of danger. Whatever I say to you, then, comes absolutely without preparation, because even the few thoughts which came to my mind have been driven absolutely and wholly to the four winds of heaven. I begin afresh from this point; and you may have an opportunity, as the child did in the old story of "Helen's Babies," to "see the wheels go round."

I recall—and I give you the recollection not as an impertinence, but simply as a sign that I bear you no malice—the remark years ago of a good old minister, of a denomination different from yours, who said that he believed that the Boston Unitarians were better satisfied with themselves than any other people on earth. [Laughter.] I recall that, only in order that I may add that to-night I have not only been convinced of the truth of what he said, but I am prepared to defend it. [Laughter.]

I am very glad that Father Conaty in his address, which it would be an impertinence for me to characterize,—you characterized it as it was delivered,—though he pointed out the dangers and showed where the path of duty lay; though he depicted evils which were all about us, yet never, in word or phrase, for I listened with great anxiety,—and yet not anxiety, for I felt sure of the result,—never did he utter one despairing word for this country. I think I was twenty years old before I ever heard an intimation that there was any danger that this country would not live as long as the universe held together. In the presence of educated, cultured, liberal gentlemen such as you are, gathered for the purpose for which you are together, I feel free to say, what I would not say possibly to an audience in another place, that the most dangerous man in this country, in my judgment, whether he realizes it or not, is the man who permits the thought to enter his mind, much more the man who permits it to go from his lips, that there is any danger, under any circumstances, that this country will not survive all the shocks and all the perils which will come to it. [Applause.] I was brought up in a plain way, among plain people; and I tell you, gentlemen, that among those people you do not need to preach the perpetuity of this country. Those are not the people who have the slightest lack of faith in the vitality which animates and will preserve her. I believe that I got my first hint that there was any loyal man who believed that this country would not survive finally from a writer in the Atlantic Monthly; and I felt it almost as if a dear friend had betrayed me. I felt it more than a public, more than a political sorrow, to learn that a man existed who could harbor that thought, could mould it into words and give it to a miscellaneous public. For I believe that there is nothing calculated more to produce, if that were possible, the result which it professes to fear than the expression of any doubt as to the perpetuity of this country.

It is not whether or not we are to continue. It is how we are to continue. How near shall we come to reaching the ideal which we have set for ourselves? How near shall we come to the perfect nation? I had heard, of course, of the armed rebellion against this country, which now we call politely the Civil War. I knew that even in the North in those years there were men who were called Copperheads; but the knowledge of their existence, the feeling that there were men who would raise their hands against the government, never struck me with the subtle force, never pained me so exceedingly, as the discovery, which was an absolute discovery, that there were loyal men who in cold blood, with the deliberation which writing requires, were capable of intimating that this nation was coming some time to an end.

The question of the ideal American citizen I regard as one of those questions which in their very simplicity baffle definition. I believe, speaking in homely, every-day words, that the ideal American citizen is simply the ideal man, the ideal merchant, the ideal minister, the ideal bricklayer, the ideal hod-carrier, not as merchant or minister or bricklayer or hod-carrier, but as those plus the faithful and full and complete performance of their political duties. You cannot differentiate between them. You cannot say that a man is half a good citizen because he attends to his own family and neglects his political duties. You cannot say that a man is half an ideal citizen because he attends to his political duties and neglects his personal interests, using that word "interests" in its broadest sense. So I have kept before my mind always the thought of the inseparability of the personal from the political in the ideal American citizen.

I have no suggestion practical enough and specific enough to present to this audience as to the means of development for the individual, for we must work from the individual to the State. I believe that substantially we are on the right track. I believe that the same efforts, organized or individual, the same feelings, the same liberality, the same brotherly love, which will produce the ideal man, carried a little farther, possibly modified to meet particular circumstances, will develop the ideal man who is but half an ideal citizen into the full rounded and complete ideal American citizen. [Applause.]

Mr. LOWELL.—I think you will all agree with me, gentlemen, that, as was often observed in the war, a drafted man, upon emergency, sometimes fights very well. [Applause.]

STORY OF UNITY CHURCH, PERRY, IA.

On an evening in 1883 a number of our best citizens met in Mr. Parks's book-store and entered into a discussion of religion. None of them belonged to a church; but they recognized the worth of character, and were interested in the great moral questions of the day and the welfare of their fellow-men. They were barred from membership in existing churches, because they were too conscientious to subscribe to a belief which seemed to them to be erroneous. On this particular occasion they remarked, among other things, that moral and business integrity are not monopolized by the churches; and they were prone to criticize the churches as well as their members. The proprietor of the store spoke up in a somewhat rebuking manner: "Well, what good does it do to criticize? Why don't you offer something better?" This query presented the matter in a new light; and those present set out to find whether or not there was an organization, society, or church in this broad land with which they, and the thousands of others like them, could work without compromising themselves. Liberal lecturers were brought here from time to time. Ethical Culture societies, Spiritualism, and secular unions were investigated; but none of these seemed to fill the want satisfactorily. They had heard of the Unitarian Church, but dismissed it without investigation, thinking it only another orthodox church with some verbal change in its creed. Finally, in the fall of 1889, a gentleman delivered two liberal lectures here, to the great satisfaction of the liberal people. After one of these lectures Mr. Parks went to him with the same old question, putting it something like this: "Do you know of a church in which well-meaning and earnest people who do not believe in the trinity and such doctrines can work without stultifying their own conscience?" The lecturer replied that he thought he did; and told him of Unitarianism and the position of the Western Conference. It seemed to be just the thing. So Mr. Parks wrote to Jenkin Lloyd Jones, editor of Unity, who turned the letter over to J. R. Effinger, then secretary of the Western Conference. After a short correspondence he came here, and preached in the Congregational church on Monday night, June 23, 1890. The society had really already been started; and he came here at our request,—not as a representative of a strange cause, but to assist us in our own cause, for the society was not a foreign institution transplanted among us, but a native of our own little city and of spontaneous origin.

Soon after Mr. Effinger's meeting Mr. Parks began the distribution of Western Conference sermons and other liberal literature,—mostly at his own expense,—pushed the sale of liberal religious books, and secured some twenty-five subscribers for Unity. In April, 1891, Rev. Thomas P. Byrnes of Humboldt preached in the Congregational church on a week-day evening. A few weeks later Miss Safford followed with two large meetings in the opera house. At these meetings a subscription paper was started, and $300 raised to pay the expenses of twelve meetings to be held during the succeeding year, the State Conference agreeing to furnish the ministers. A temporary organization was also effected, and plans formulated to hold regular services every Sunday, some member of the society reading a published sermon when no minister was present. The lay meetings were continued through the larger part of the year, meeting first in private houses.

In April, 1892, the executive committee of the State Unitarian Conference met in this city; and at the close of their sessions articles of association were adopted by this society, and it was duly incorporated under the laws of the State. Rev. L. A. Harvey ministered to the society during the following summer. He was followed by Rev. L. D. Cochrane, with four meetings; also two or three other ministers. And on Feb. 1, 1893, Rev. Henry D. Stevens came to us from Menomonee, Wis. He was soon tendered a call, and accepted, and has given such satisfaction that he is still with us.

We early realized the necessity of having a church house, and last spring invested $1,500 in real estate, and undertook the erection of a church edifice. We have of course encountered many difficulties,—notably the unexpected financial depression and shortage in crops; yet, in spite of all these disadvantages, we are now meeting in our own church house. Whoso neglects a thing which he suspects he ought to do because it seems to him too small a thing is deceiving himself. It is not too little, but too great for him, that he doeth it not.—E. B. Pusey.

THE NATIONAL ALLIANCE.

The regular monthly meeting of the executive board was held at 25 Beacon Street on Friday, February 8, nine ladies attending. Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells presided, as the president is still confined at home by illness. The secretary reported recent visits to the Branches at Lexington and Brighton, where the members are interested and active. At Brighton the women are anticipating with much satisfaction the opening of services in the beautiful new church. The corresponding secretary has lately attended a meeting of the Branch at Springfield, Mass., which includes the women of several societies, and is a strong and effective organization.

Interesting letters were read from Charlestown, Va., and Birmingham, Mich., where copies of the "Manual" have been sent.

Miss Langmaid, being present, reported for the Cheerful Letter Exchange. The Cheerful Letter is nearly self-supporting, but the wide range of work of the Exchange and the large distribution of books is a heavy tax on the committee. At least two hundred copies each of "Black Beauty" and "Gentle Measures in Training the Young" have been distributed, the gift of one member.

The Committee on Appeals submitted the following statement, which, in order to do justice to the Southern work, is rather lengthy. The plan outlined in it by Mrs. George L. Chaney meets with the cordial approval of the committee and of the executive board of the National Alliance, which recommend the plan to the Branches.

All of our Southern churches have larger opportunities and needs than means to meet them. All would thankfully receive and use wisely whatever might be given; but those which most imperatively need assistance are Chattanooga, San Antonio, and Mr. Gibson. When Chattanooga built its church, the city was flourishing; but the sudden and complete reverses which befell it caused many to leave the city, and have thrown a still greater burden on those who remain. The church now owes interest to the A. U. A. and to the Church Building Loan Fund to the amount of $1,100, and has also to pay annually $80 on its floating indebtedness. It is doing its utmost itself, and is an important church from its geographical location and the character of its members.

The minister of San Antonio, Mr. Shultz, receives the smallest salary of any of the Southern men, and therefore has to supplement it as best he can by lecturing in the schools. The Branches sent him but $45 last year. He needs more.

Mr. Gibson desires to give his entire time to work in Middle Florida, if assured of $500 a year. He received $163 from the Alliances last year, and earnestly asks for more, as he has no assured income from any source.

The committee again recommends church extension work in the South by means of travelling circuits, to be distributed among various ministers on payment of their travelling and other necessary expenses, estimated at $200 a year. It is thought that such work will be very valuable in arousing new interest in our faith. If any Branch is willing to appropriate money for such preaching, Mrs. Chaney will receive it, making quarterly remittances to the preacher, and receiving regular reports from him through Mr. Chaney. Correspondence can also be carried on between those specially interested at the various points and the Branches aiding the work. Such correspondence may result in the formation of Alliance Branches, even if no church is formed.

These circuits embrace various points in Virginia under Rev. J. M. Seaton, central station, Richmond, Va.; in Western North Carolina and Eastern Tennessee under Rev. H. A. Westall, central station, Asheville, N. C.; in North and South Carolina under Rev. H. A. Whitman, central station, Charleston, S. C.; in Georgia under Rev. W. R. Cole, central station, Atlanta, Ga.; in Florida under Rev. J. C. Gibson, central station, Edwards, Fla.; in Louisiana under Rev. W. C. Pierce, central station, New Orleans, La.; in Tennessee under Rev. S. R. Free, central station, Chattanooga, Tenn.; in Texas under Rev. E. M. Wheelock, central station, Austin, Tex.; in West Texas under Rev. N. Shultz, central station, San Antonio, Tex.; in West Virginia, central station, Charleston, W. Va. The circuit in East Tennessee, in care of Rev. H. A. Westall, has already been taken by one of the Alliance Branches. It will include, as visiting points, Knoxville, Tenn., Greenville, S. C., and some places in Western North Carolina.

Reports were due from New England, the Rocky Mountain, and Pacific Coast sections. Reports from Oakland, Alameda, Berkeley, and San José, show that the women's society in each is loyally struggling to be of all possible service to its own church, which in these times necessarily means practical work, though all report some literary and denominational work. The Channing Auxiliary and the Society for Christian Work in San Francisco are prosperous, and doing useful work along all the lines of activity.

In Maine the Branches are much interested in the Tuskegee and Montana schools, and have sent many boxes and barrels of books, clothing, and apples. Waterville also sent $10 to Montana. Eastport has given $37.85 to its own church. All the Branches in New Hampshire are in full activity. At Concord the meetings are well attended, and a fine programme is being carried out. Eight members lately visited the Branch at Laconia, where an inspiring and helpful meeting was held. At Peterboro the members are making an effort to renovate the church; and at Rochester all the energies of the Branch are devoted to the completion of the new church, in which they are very happy. Littleton and Walpole continue enthusiastic; and the new Branches at Manchester, Wilton, and Lebanon, are "in good order, and bid fair to catch up with the older ones in all good works." Windsor, Vt., is doing excellent service.

The Branches in Massachusetts are in the full swing of work for the year, meeting regularly, reading, listening to lectures, conducting social entertainments, carrying on Post-office Mission work, and distributing immense amounts of literature. At Ayer the members meet at each other's houses, discussing religious subjects and reviewing the sermon they have recently heard. At Groton the Alliance women have been working hard to pay for a new carpet and other repairs on their own church. Littleton, like other country Branches, combats wintry weather, but has unabated zeal, read and study the best, and have sent small sums of money to Hamilton and Tuskegee. At Lowell the Branch has great vigor this year. At each meeting an original paper is read, and "discussion always follows." The Westford Branch is small, but active. Arlington, like the Branches elsewhere, has been interested in the Nebraska sufferers, and has sent clothing. Lynn has held meetings to "discuss subjects of great interest and profit." The Salem Branches are maintaining their record for active interest. At Barton Square fortnightly lectures are held. The East Church is rejoicing in a fine new chapel, the work of the young people as well as of the Alliance. The Branch at Peabody holds fortnightly meetings, and accomplishes much work. The Haverhill Branch has well-attended meetings, and is arranging a course of lectures. At West Newton Mrs. Andrews lately addressed an audience of two hundred. Hingham, Plymouth, and Cohasset are following the usual lines of work; and the Branch at Barnstable has doubled its membership. The meetings of the Worcester League are large, and many churches are represented. At the South Church the new building is finished, and the Alliance gatherings are held in the beautiful parlor. A sale at Christmas realized $330, $200 of which goes for an organ and the rest to furnish the parlor. Leicester has now the advantage of a resident minister and his wife, and is actively interested. Uxbridge is helping its own church. The two Branches in Providence, R. I., those in Newport, Taunton, and Fall River, have done a great deal in the way of distributing books and sermons, and have also discussed most helpful subjects at the Alliance meetings. In speaking of the Post-office Mission and Cheerful Letter Exchange, the director says, "The reports give no accurate impression of the work done or the possibilities of these departments."

Twelve Branches in the Suffolk Conference reported through the director. These Branches, like those in the North Middlesex Conference, have the advantage of meeting together monthly for consultation; and nearly every part of the work is taken up by each Branch, making an astonishing total of accomplished result, while, the secretary of one of the Branches writes, "We are looking forward to a larger and better work the coming year."

The following appropriations of money were reported: Allston Branch sent $5 to Green Harbor, $2 for Japan Library, gave $15 to its janitor and $1,400 toward paying the debt of its church. Church of Disciples sent $25 to Green Harbor and $1.50 to Japan Library. King's Chapel gave $10 to Morgan Chapel, and $70 to various libraries asked for in the Cheerful Letter. The First Parish, Dorchester, sent $25 to Montana. Jamaica Plain sent $5 for Japan Library. The Branches at the New South Church, Boston, and at Cohasset, each sent $2 for the Japan Library. The Branch at Church of the Unity, Boston, sent $5 to San Antonio. Arlington Street Branch sent $5 to Hamilton, $2 to Plainfield for sermons, and $40 to a colored school. South Congregational Branch appropriated $20 for Post-office Mission and $20 for the Cheerful Letter Exchange. Springfield collected at a meeting $5.30 for Hamilton. First Church, Providence, sent $50 to Montana and $42 to Miss Dean's school at Manassas. Newport sent $20 to Montana. Lynn sent $10 to Green Harbor, $10 to Montana, and $5 to Hamilton. The Lawrence Branch contributed $100 to its own church expenses. First Church, Salem, Mass., sent $10 to Chattanooga, $5 to Green Harbor, and $10 to Montana. Peabody sent $20 to Ithaca, $10 to Bath, $10 to Green Harbor, and gave $56 to its own church. The Worcester League gave $12 to the South Church, Worcester. West Newton Branch sent $50 to Montana, $10 to Green Harbor, $10 to Sherborn, $10 to Greenville, S.C., $15 to Proctor Academy, $5 to Hamilton, Ont., $10 to Redlands, Cal., and $10 to Austin, Tex. Hingham appropriated $5 for books for the life-saving station at Brant's Rock. Watertown sent $5 to Ithaca, $1 to Whitman, gave $50 to its own parish and $10 to its Sunday-school. Cambridge sent $60 to Ithaca, $25 to Green Harbor, $15 to Miss Dean. The First Church, Boston, sent $50 to Green Harbor. Waltham sent $10 to Montana, $2 to Miss Putnam, and $5 to Ithaca. Quincy sent $30 to Montana. Dedham sent $25 to Miss Putnam. Belmont sent $5 to Montana. New South Church, besides contributing to the Japan Library, sent $27 to Ithaca. The Branch at Highlands, N.C., sent $5 to Nebraska sufferers. Unity Church, Chicago, sent $5 to St. John and $5 to Ithaca.

The following places are among those already recommended by the executive board, which still need contributions from the Branches: St. John, N.B., Hamilton, Ont., Ithaca, N.Y., Bath and Rochester, N.H., Chattanooga, Tenn., Austin and San Antonio, Tex., San Diego, Cal., Green Harbor, Chelsea and Sharon, Mass.

In March reports are due from the Middle States, Middle West, and Southern States. EMILY A. FIFIELD, Rec. Sec'y.

The dates and subjects are: February 22, "Political Outlook for Russia," Lydia L. Noble; March 1, "Social Evolution," Rev. M. J. Savage; March 8, "India," by Wilmina L. Armstrong. The lectures of Mrs. Noble and Mrs. Armstrong will be given in costume. They will begin at eight o'clock. Course tickets, $1; single tickets, 50 cents. The lectures promise to be of the greatest interest, and it is to be hoped that they will be largely attended.

Second Church: Commencing with Sunday afternoon, March 3, a series of six vespers services will be given in the main auditorium of the Second Church, intended primarily to meet the wants of young people and the many strangers and visitors in the adjacent hotels to Copley Square. These services will be but an hour in length (from 4 P.M. to 5 P.M.), the pastor, Rev. Thomas Van Ness, giving a short address on some practical theme. Mr. H. G. Tucker will preside at the organ; and the choir on the first occasion will be augmented by thirty voices from one of the Boston chorus societies. The music of "Noël" (Saint-Saëns) will be rendered in full.

Dorchester, Mass.: Rev. William R. Lord preached his farewell sermon at Christ Church, Harrison Square, last Sunday morning. His sermon was an earnest and eloquent setting-forth of the ideal of the family, Church, and State. He received many affectionate benedictions from his friends and parishioners at the close of the service. Recognizing his eminent public services in Boston in the interest of good government, temperance, and other reforms, Mr. Lord and his wife became the guests of a number of friends at a dinner at the Hotel Thorndike. Rev. Charles G. Ames presided. In the speeches, that followed the services Mr. Lord has rendered to the State as well as to the Church were gratefully recognized, and a happy poem was read by William Lloyd Garrison. Mr. Lord left Boston last Monday afternoon, and, after spending next Sunday in Buffalo, will go at once to St. Paul, where a recognition service will be held next week in Unity Church.

FRANCESTOWN, N.H.—A correspondent says: "Though we have not been sounding a trumpet before us, we are not dead. In addition to the regular work of the church, for more than a year we have maintained a Union Literary Club, with an attendance of from fifty to seventy-five, with interest and enthusiasm as yet undiminished. January 30 we were all delighted with a lecture on 'William Barnes,' by Rev. W. F. Greenman of Fitchburg, after which the people met him, his wife, and other visitors, in a pleasant sociable. Thursday evening, February 14, twenty-five members of the sewing-circle celebrated Saint Valentine's day by reciting in rhyme, interspersed with good music, how they each had earned a dollar for the church. No entertainment of the year has been so largely attended or, apparently, so fully enjoyed as this. However hard the road may be, we propose to go forward."

PITTSFIELD, MASS.—Unity Church was filled to overflowing last Sunday evening, when sixteen Mount Lebanon Shakers, of whom ten were women, took full charge of the service. The morning service was in memory of the late John F. Moors, D.D., who, as missionary of the American Unitarian Association for New England, founded this church. At the close of the sermon the following resolutions were adopted:—

"Whereas this Unity Church of Pittsfield, Mass., was founded and reared into life through the foresight and perseverance of the late John F. Moors, D.D., therefore, Resolved, That Unity Church shares in a peculiar sense the loss to the community of that ardent apostle of a liberal Christianity to Western Massachusetts.

Resolved, That Unity Church desires to cherish the memory of Dr. Moors, and hereby pledges itself anew to that form of religion which he strove to embody in life, which made him honest and simple in doctrine, responsive to the duties and trusted with the privileges of the citizen; the faithful comrade in the patriotic campaign; the zealous missionary of the simple faith of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man.

"Resolved, That the clerk is hereby instructed to record these resolutions in the minutes of Unity Church, and send copies for publication to the Christian Register and the Unitarian."

SEATTLE, WASH.—Rev. J. H. Acton, D.D., has been installed pastor of the Unitarian society. Rev. Thomas L. Eliot, D.D., of Portland, father of W. G. Eliot, who preceded Dr. Acton, preached the sermon. He had known Dr. Acton since fifteen years ago, when they were ministers of different denominations in Portland; and he was deeply moved by the occasion. The address to the people was by Rev. Frank H. Adams of Puyallup, and Mr. Joseph Shippen extended to the new pastor the right hand of fellowship in behalf of the congregation.

TACOMA, WASH.—The First Free Church passed resolutions at their quarterly meeting February 3, appointing a committee to prepare a letter to be sent to the church at Seattle, congratulating that society on the resumption of regular services under the new pastor, Dr. J. H. Acton, and expressing the feeling that the two societies are one in aim and the hope of even closer relationship in the future.

WARWICK, MASS.—The Unitarian society at Warwick, Mass., held their annual fair in the town hall Wednesday evening, February 13. It was well patronized by the citizens and many from adjoining towns, especially from Northfield. The fair was a social and financial success, and the society feels gratified with the results.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.—The board of directors of the American Unitarian Association held their regular monthly meeting at their rooms, 25 Beacon Street, Tuesday, February 12. There were present Mrs. Hooper, Mrs. Wells, and Mrs. Williams, and Messrs. Ames, Batchelor, Brown, Crothers, Dole, Fox, Gaffield, Hosmer, Howe, and Lincoln. Mr. Gaffield took the chair. The treasurer's report showed all expenses paid to date, about $73,000, with a probable expense of about $20,000 before May 1. The probable income, estimating on the basis of contributions last year, should be upward of $35,000. The general fund stands well invested at over $70,000, with temporary loans of $45,000. A legacy of $40,000 has been invested in the Isaac Sweetzer Fund. Other legacies, amounting to over $25,000, have been received this year by the treasurer.

The Finance Committee, after a long session, offered the following vote; and the request was granted:—

"Voted, That, in the opinion of the Finance Committee, it is expedient, at as early a date as possible, to invest all substantial legacies, and spend only the income thereof for the work of the Association; but that it is inexpedient, and, indeed, impossible, at this moment, to fix the date at which such a policy shall be inaugurated. Also, in view of the approaching end of the financial year, and in the absence of Mr. Eliot, it is desirable to postpone definite action on Mr. Eliot's proposition until some later meeting; and the Committee on Finance asks for further time to consider the matter."

The president, Hon. George S. Hale, and Hon. Henry J. Hosmer were appointed a committee to obtain from the General Court authority to hold such additional amount of property as might seem expedient. Messrs. Howe and Lincoln were authorized to adjust certain claims under the will of the late Mary B. Emmons, by which the Association is made a residuary legatee.

On recommendation of the Publication Committee a proposition was adopted whereby the plates of a new Hymn and Tune Book, based upon the book known as "Hymns of the Church Universal," should become the property of the Association with little expense and no risk.

Upon the recommendation of the Committee on the Pacific Coast it was voted,—"That it is not expedient to make any appropriation at present for mission work in the City of Mexico."

The expected report on the reorganization of the Association not being ready, an animated discussion followed concerning the financial responsibilities and expectations of the Association. The general conclusion was that the financial outlook is more encouraging than it was a year ago at this time, and that, if the churches which have not yet contributed should maintain the average increase of those that have done so, the end of the financial year would bring the hope of greater activity all along the line of missionary enterprise.

Business Notices.

Sufferers from Coughs, Sore Throat, etc., should be constantly supplied with "Brown's Bronchial Troches."

THE Chairs of 1794.—The rage for Colonial chairs is even greater this year than ever before. During the last decade these old campaigners have been in increasing demand, and no house may now be considered as completely furnished which has not one of these high-backed, "dug" seat Colonial chairs. They have over one hundred patterns at Paine's, on Canal Street. Each one is an exact copy of some famous original. The prices are surprisingly low.

Always Something New.—The announcements of the great seed house of Peter Henderson & Co. of New York, which are published each year in our paper, attract always the widest attention. The offer contained in their advertisement in this week's issue is worthy of prompt acceptance. Besides sending the special packages of seeds, they offer to include, without extra charge, their wonderful catalogue, with its many colored plates and 500 engravings, a perfect encyclopedia and library to any one who loves flowers.

Select Excursions to the Pacific Coast.—The comprehensiveness and high character of Raymond & Whitcomb's tours will have another illustration the coming spring. Three parties, having special Pullman vestibuled trains with dining cars on the transcontinental journey, are to leave Boston April 24 for extended visits to California, including the Yosemite Valley. One section will also see the Yellowstone National Park on the return, while another makes a voyage to Alaska. Still a fourth party starts May 28 for the transcontinental trip by the Canadian Pacific route and a subsequent Alaska voyage, coming home through the Yellowstone Park. A complete descriptive book may be obtained without charge of Raymond & Whitcomb, 296 Washington Street, Boston.

FAITH FROM KNOWLEDGE.

BY ADA C. BOWLES.

What availeth me to know
Whence I come and whither go;
Trait and tendency to trace
Back to primal age and race;
Germs of lower life to find,
Warring with the higher mind,
While confessing that to-day
I am still the toy and prey
Of the yet unconquered brute
Bedded at my being's root?
Am I stronger, that I know
All the lineage of my foe?
Even so, if in that line
I can read the plan divine,
Mating low and high in strife
To evolve the nobler life.

A NATION'S CROWN.

A SERMON FOR THE 22D OF FEBRUARY.

BY REV. SAMUEL A. ELIOT.

"Of Zion it shall be said, This one and that one was born in her."—Ps. lxxxvii. 5.

We are apt to think that all we learn must come from the voice of man or his written word; but may not the associations of a day or a place teach us more than any printed page?

"Words pass as wind; but, where great deeds were done,
A power abides, transfused from sire to son."

For the establishment in the mind of an ideal of American character there is nothing comparable to a visit to Mount Vernon.
Failing that, let the associations of this day stir our latent thought.

The history of a nation is the biography of its great men. The glory of a nation is not in the number of bushels of wheat it raises or tons of coal it mines or miles of railroad track it lays, but in the type of individual character it produces, the standard of intelligence and morality it upholds, the best personality it develops. The mere numbers or wealth of a State do not entitle it to observation or remembrance. On the map you can cover Athens with a pin-point and Judæa with a finger-tip, yet in those insignificant places the impulses were given which have not ceased to direct civilization.
Material prosperity may be an excellent thing, for it means power and leisure; but the higher civilization means, as Lowell taught us, more than accumulation of riches.
It involves the creation of finer individual thinking and living, the development of intellectual and moral forces, the refinement of taste, speech, and manners, the quickening of æsthetic sensibility and spiritual desire. The order of progress in these things is not from without inward but within outward. The powers and graces of the higher civilization are not acquired by institutional arrangements, by laws and statutes: they are usually attained by virtue of the leadership of individual sincerity and personal example. Life is not mechanical: it is inspirational. When a nation catches sight of its ideal of national character, when of that nation it can be said, "This one and that one was born there," then, and not till then, it begins to write history; and the world begins to read it and draw life from it. The dynamic of the world's progress is personal character.

No need to say that there is often something inexplicable about the achievements of guiding minds. We may demonstrate how a great man is the child of his age, and exhibit the circle of ideas in which he grew up; but, when we reach the creation moment, it is usually impossible to analyze the procedure. The way in which a great man seizes on his problem, combines its elements, and reaches his result, is for most of us a mystery. Probably the man himself cannot explain his method. When we have called his power genius, we have only labelled it with a name that defies definition.
It were waste breath to stop to analyze that subtle, rare, and unequal quality; for it baffles explanation and imitation. I want rather to speak of the qualities of greatness, which, because they are common, do not always seem to be noble, or which amid the dazzle of brilliant accomplishment we fail to recognize. There are many of the essential attributes of the leaders of men which are parts of our common humanity, and as attainable by us as by those to whom we render the homage of immortal fame.

First among these forgotten qualities of greatness I mention moderation. That seems to you perhaps a strange idea. A high enthusiasm ought to be the first characteristic. Moderation is a cold hard word:

it has a chilling sound; but is not close-lipped self-restraint an essential element in successful enthusiasm? Without that quality enthusiasm often degenerates into mere violence, or is misdirected into channels of idle fanaticism or tumult. The pursuit of highest purposes may become mere bubble-blowing unless disciplined in calm reserve and controlled, not by outside compulsion, but by the firm grasp of a will which holds everything in obedience from within. An Arabian poet described his hero by saying, "Sunshine was he in the winter day, and in the midsummer coolness and shade." The great man has a gravity of nature which is like the fly-wheel of a mill or the governor of an engine. It distributes power equally, and prevents destructive shocks.
This trait of character delivers a man from the control of irregular and interrupted impulses. It dreads fury and excitement as signs of feebleness. It dreads exaggeration of statement because exaggeration of statement means weakness of belief. It is patient because it is powerful. It is tolerant because it is sure. It is the self-trust which is the essence of heroism.

Next I mention persistence. The great man fulfils Emerson's decree. He does not have "wandering impulses or fits and starts of courage." When he has chosen his part, he abides by it, and does not weakly try to reconcile himself with prevailing orthodox-ies or changing opinions. The fire of his enthusiasm is not fed by the stubble of popular applause, but by the substance of his soul, and hence is equal and unquenchable. His fortitude is born of hope and self-denial. He possesses his soul in some great expectation. He is a man in earnest.
He does not, as Coleridge said, "believe that he believes": he knows. He has nothing to do with hearsay. He lives in communion not with semblances, but with realities. He is not weary in well-doing, though success be but small. He is not disturbed by difficulties nor terrified by danger nor chilled by neglect. Too many of us cherish the notion that patience is a meek virtue.
That idea is the survival of the mediæval thought, which made submission to persecution the ideal of Christian grace. True patience is not passive endurance merely:
it is rather active persistence, not drawing back in resignation or submitting to compromise or giving up in despair, but resisting evil, not bitterly or resentfully, but with determination. The man who walks through life with calm fortitude, thoughtful, not of showy appearance or of the flattery of the crowd, but of inmost realities and permanent results, is sure to be recognized at last as the master spirit of his age.
His name may not be celebrated in epic song nor chanted in cathedrals, but his work and his fame alike endure.

Thirdly, I mention timeliness. It is the prerogative of the great man to await the fitting opportunity and to act at the right moment. Do you recall that superb illustration of the sun-tipped wave with which Phillips Brooks began a famous sermon?
In a flash it declares to us the nature of timeliness. It is, he says, as when we stand upon the seashore and look out across the sea, and here and there on the surface of the gray, monotonous ocean there comes a flash of silver. One single wave seems to leap up and burn with a lustre that compels the eye to look at it. You ask yourself why that special wave should have that peculiar privilege, and there is only one answer to give. It is not any larger wave than the rest, and it is made of no different water from them. It is simply that that wave happened to leap just where the sun was smiting; and so the sun smote it, and it became illustrious. So it is with illustrious men. The sun of history shines on the great sea of human life; and the special career which leaps just where the sun is striking catches his glory, and seizes men's notice and remembrance. The larger the wave, the more of the sunshine; but the only essential thing is that it should leap at the right moment and be turned the right way. With those conditions the simplest life becomes illustrious. Without them the largest character will melt back into the humanity out of which it sprung, unknown, unnoticed, unremembered. Genius is often nothing more than the capacity to leap just at the right time, the ability to speak the word or do the deed immediately necessary. The great man strikes when the iron is hot. He does not waste effort. He fits the square peg into the square hole, and does not try to squeeze it into a round one.

Universal adaptability is, we often think, a good Yankee trait; but is it, after all, a very praiseworthy characteristic? The more earnestly a man does anything, the more clearly he perceives that he cannot do everything. Some one says that to be good for everything is to be good for nothing. To fit anywhere is to fit nowhere. Have you not often seen some commonplace man who is at home and at ease wherever he happens to be, looking down on a man who is evidently his superior, but who stands waiting and awkward, unable to bring his plans to accomplishment? Suddenly that man's opportunity arrives. Instinctively he knows it. He falls to work, and in a day achieves more than his ordinary and scornful rival can accomplish in a year. It is not necessary that the great man's thought should be original or his act novel. Somebody else may have discovered the truth he declares.
The point lies in knowing when and where to proclaim it. Somebody else may have done precisely the same deed. The prerogative of genius is to do it at the time when it will be effective.

The last of the forgotten qualities of greatness which I shall mention to-day is symmetry. Many men fail to make their lives successful because their natures, while strong on one side, are weak on another.
The perfect character is symmetrical. "The length and the breadth and the height of it are equal." By length I mean not length of days, but the reaching out of a man on the line of his own special capacities and ambitions, the extension and exercise of self-discovered aptitudes. The breadth of a life is in its sympathy with the lives of others, its genuine humanity and genial warmth. The height of a life is in its reach upward, its hopes and aspirations, its confidence in the guidance of its best ideals and in the support of the everlasting arms.
Symmetry means the equal education of hand, head, heart, and spirit. Some men are pious, but not honest, others honest, but not devout. Some are zealous, but narrow, others broad, but cold. The quality of character I want to emphasize is the just combination of attributes which, developed singly, may run to injurious excess. Dependence on length alone makes a man narrowly self-absorbed. The great man must not only possess that which will do men good if they take it from him: he must be such a man that they can take it from him.
In every age we see wise and learned specialists, who through long devotion have acquired the knowledge which is power, and yet who have no message for their fellow-men. They remain so wrapped up in contemplation of their accomplishment as never to repeat their secrets to others.
They dwell apart like snow-drifts on the mountain, wondering perhaps why their locked up fertility is not more useful. The snow must melt and come down in spring freshets before its richness can enrich the valleys. When a man comes to value his personal career because of the way in which it brings him into relations with other men, and gives him opportunity for individual helpfulness or public-spirited service, then his life begins to be enlarged, and to its length is added breadth.

A character which has breadth alone is too often soft and sentimental. It is broad, but thin. It is loving, but not always just.
It needs direction and clear-sighted purpose. It needs to make feeling express itself in action. Too many of us imagine that because charitable sentiments have stirred in our hearts we are charitable, and because we admire the heroes and heroines of history or romance that we are capable of emulating their virtues. We are deceived by the good intentions that play around our good deeds. We have too much aimless benevolence, too much half-baked character, too much thin and pulpy liberality. Let us have not less breadth, but more length, more purposeful zeal, more thorough endeavor, more unswerving devotion to a clearly apprehended course.

The man whose character has height alone is too often a pietistic prig or a monkish mendicant. He looks up, and forgets to work. He adores and idles. He makes religious emotion or excitement a substitute for habitual righteousness. What we need is not the cultivation of any one element to the exclusion of the others, but their combination in due proportion. The great purpose and aim of life must be upborne by emotion and sustained by the impulse of hope, and must express itself in loving helpfulness. The great man does not dare to live without some distinct intention and direction; but he is not so absorbed in his own task as to be blind to the needs of others, and he keeps close to conscience and to the guidance of his spiritual desires.

He is not one-sided, but symmetrical. His character is long with tenacity and steady-ness of pursuit, broad with sunny sympathies, lofty in its reach toward God. He unites energy, love, and faith.

Moderation, persistence, timeliness, symmetry,—these I call the often forgotten qualities of greatness. Save timeliness alone, which may be a God-given instinct, not one of these attributes of character is beyond the reach of the humblest one among us. In the combination of these familiar qualities is the only essential of leadership. Position, imperial powers, prophetic gifts, transcendent genius,—these add perhaps additional glory to greatness; but, to be a true leader of men, there is need only of the union of these simple, approachable virtues.

Consider, one hundred and sixty-three years ago to-day the fate of the American nation lay cradled in a humble homestead in Virginia. No pageantry hailed the birth of the founder of our State. He was not born heir to great possessions or intellectual inheritances. He never had any unusual advantages, and never developed any transcendent talents. Yet this nation owes not only its existence, but many of the most conspicuous merits of its conscious organism, its mental and moral attributes, its ideals of patriotism, to a simple country gentleman, whose constant desire was just to live in hospitable quiet on the banks of his loved Potomac. If we have a national honor to preserve, if we have a national fame to extend, if we have a national character to keep pure, we owe it to him in whose life were incarnated those ideals of character I have been describing.

"Soldier and statesman, rarest unison,
High-poised example of great duties done
Simply as breathing, a world's honors worn
As life's indifferent gifts to all men born;
Modest, yet firm as nature's self; unblamed
Save by the men his nobler nature shamed;
Never seduced through show of present good
By other than unsetting lights to steer
New trimmed in heaven, nor than his steadfast mood
More steadfast, far from rashness as from fear;
Rigid, but with himself first, grasping still In swerveless poise the wave-beat helm of will;
Not honored then or now because he wooed
The popular voice, but that he still withstood;
Broad-minded, higher-souled, there is but one
Who was all this and ours and all men's,— Washington."

It is astonishing how soon the whole conscience begins to unravel if a single stitch drops. One little sin indulged makes a hole you could put your head through.—

THE CLERGYMAN IN THE CIVIL WAR.*

BY REV. E. C. BOLLES.

That you call on me to answer to this toast because I was a clergyman in the Civil War excites one feeling that does not go to enliven an after-dinner speech. Almost a generation has passed since Lee surrendered to Grant; and this means that I am taking my place with the patriarchs, whose memories are more active than their hands.

They are wild times which you ask me to remember. They have left upon men who were actors in those scenes the most un-effaceable impressions of their lives, just as they left scars, honorable, but indelible, upon the veterans of the fight. We looked out over the sea, stormed upon by a new and terrible gale, hoping, fearing, praying, as we wondered if the Ship of State would founder or reach her port, just as the last week we have followed the fortunes of a missing Atlantic steamer, only to-day moored at her dock. But the old ship came safely in,—not convoyed by craft which flew another flag nor in tow of friendly tugs: she came in under her own sails, and with the Republican party on deck! [Applause.]

"The ministers made the war!" was the cry of some, who thought that with the ending of peace the day of doom had come. They did not make the war, any more than they made slavery. They did link the Constitution to the Bible; they did preach what they believed the gospel stood for,—the liberty of men. They did take for their texts, "Righteousness exalteth a nation," and that the "acceptable fast" was "to set the captives free." They did this so effectually that their message crystallized into politics, and a blizzard of votes swept all unchristian compromise away. But the hand which fired the first gun made the war. A little while after Sumter a sneering critic said to a clergyman of my acquaintance: "You profess to follow the Prince of Peace, and yet you are hungry for war; you teach the fraternity of all men, and then approve of killing your brothers in the South." "Yes," was the reply: "the man down South is my brother. I know it. But he's assaulting my mother; and, brother or not, I can't stand that!"

There are some great services which clergymen rendered to the cause of the Union, which are conspicuous even among the illustrious men and deeds of the time. Edward Everett Hale wrote a story, "The Man without a Country," which was worth a thousand regiments to the army of the North. Thomas Starr King, with his silver eloquence and magnetic patriotism, held the Pacific Coast to loyalty. Henry W. Bellows organized the Sanitary Commission, which duplicated the army of the men who fought with the army of consolation, help, and relief. And, besides these churchmen of vast ability and opportunity, a hundred thousand others, Catholics and Protestants, did their best to uphold the State. They shouldered their muskets in the ranks or served as the chaplains and friends of the soldiers in the field. They followed the recruiting officers to add their persuasions to every patriotic call. They flung out the stars and stripes from their church towers, to wave over the boys who went marching to the front, and wrapped the flag around their pulpits, whereon lay the Word of God. They preached patience, courage, hope, and held men's hearts to faith in the eternal laws of right when the darkness of the Peninsula or the repulse at Fredericksburg chilled the public blood. [Loud applause.]

And they did all these things with single-mindedness, and at the cost of much self-denial. Of all classes in the community, they formed, perhaps, the one which found no practical compensation in those years of war. They had to face the rising thermometer of high prices and the falling barometer of a dwindling purse. They had no government contracts, no business boom. They bought no bonds. When cotton cloth was a dollar a yard and gold stood at $2.50, and they had sent almost everything except the clothes they stood in to the hospitals and freedmen, the only comfort they found was in laughing at the income tax; for then, as now, the public kept the average minister under bonds to be unworldly by giving him no possible opportunity to be corrupted by too much money. [Laughter.]

There were times when the clergy were invaluable in inspiring public calmness and confidence. I well remember one Sunday, when the "Merrimac" was out, and had already sunk the "Congress" and "Cumberland," that McClellan telegraphed to the seaports of New England their danger if the rebel ram should turn northward on a further errand of destruction. Some hot-headed lunatic had handbills printed in staring type, and headed, "No Sundays in the midst of Revolution!" and proceeded to rush into the churches and scatter them among the congregation. For a moment it was like a cry of "Fire!" My own church was full, and the congregation seemed as if a cyclone of hysterics had struck it; but in the end we went on with our devotions, with the conviction that, whatever peril or emergency was at the door, we should meet it all the better with God's help. I do not say that the "Monitor" came in answer to our prayers: it is not my custom to claim a monopoly of Providence. But it did come, as all the world knows; and Ericsson earned the immortal gratitude of America. [Applause.]

There were some silver threads of comedy in the sober web of a clerical war experience. As the years went on, there was much relief work to be done at home. Then the woman's kingdom was, like the King's daughter, all glorious within. "Women and ministers" used to be one of the stock sneers of our domestic traitors. A minister of war times could ask no greater honor than to have his name coupled with that of Mary Livermore, who rose to higher honor and service than even Florence Nightingale or Julia Ward Howe, whose "Battle Hymn of the Republic" sung a new meaning into the bugle-call of the Union. Well, the ministers and women had much to do for men who had come shattered and sick to their poor homes, families who had given their all of support and strength to their country, children suddenly fatherless, widows crushed under the cruel feet of war. I was called to see one woman, said to be poor, whose husband had been killed or was missing from the ranks. Poor enough she seemed to be, and I entered with a sympathetic heart into the story of her trouble. Her husband was gone. That was all she knew. What was his regiment? She could not tell. Was he in the infantry, cavalry, or artillery? She was ignorant. But, finally, with a sudden gleam of memory, she said, "I believe they call him a bounty-jumper, sir!" [Laughter.]

Almost every clergyman who was in orders from 1860 to 1864 remembers some sermons which were to him the greatest of his life,—his first sermon after the shot at Sumter; the sermon on that Sunday when the first company of recruits stacked their arms outside his church door and filed in to prayers; the sermon, set in jubilant music, when Lee had surrendered; that sermon when the heavens seemed hung in black, and Lincoln lay cold and dead. The echoes of those sermons died long ago on the public ear: they will never die in the preacher's heart.

THEODORE DWIGHT WELD.

The following address was spoken by William Lloyd Garrison at the funeral of Theodore D. Weld:—

"God sends his teachers unto every age," and it was the happy fortune of our friend to be an early teacher in the largest school of the century. Nature fitted him for a persuader of men. A spiritual nature, a logical mind, a sensitive conscience, moral courage, an eloquent tongue,—these were the endowments of Theodore D. Weld. We come together to-day to speak our word of appreciation because these gifts were worthily used. To be an anti-slavery teacher in his day was to be a soldier also, not less heroic because the warfare was not carnal.

A few brief years cover his historic period, personal disability too soon following his persistent and exhausting anti-slavery activity. But so crucial were the times when he espoused the cause, so dramatic and brilliant was the scene in which he was a chief actor, that no history of the abolition movement can be written without embalming the story of Lane Seminary and Theodore D. Weld. It is an oft-told tale. Dr. Lyman Beecher, with his great New England reputation, was the president of the institution. Of the more than one hundred students, eleven were from slave States, seven of them sons of slaveholders, and one a slaveholder himself. The force and magnetism of young Weld found instant illustration. Forbidden by the faculty to discuss the burning question of slavery in academic debate, he led the stern revolt, sweeping by the force of his abilities and character even the Southern students into the anti-slavery crusade. Leaving the seminary in a body, the students scattered far and wide, apostles of freedom, many of them preaching in peril the duty of emancipation. Who shall measure the influence of that devoted band?

During two years only was Mr. Weld permitted to labor on the platform, his magnificent voice failing through over-use and accident; but with his pen he added service to service. Singularly enough his harrowing book, "Slavery as it is, or Testimony of a Thousand Witnesses," stimulated Mrs. Stowe to the later writing of "Uncle Tom's Cabin." How little Dr. Beecher imagined that the immortality of the Beecher family, through the pen of his gifted daughter, depended in such measure upon the recalcitrant student he labored so hard to repress!

Another chapter in our friend's romantic history was his marriage with Angelina Grimké, one of the famous Grimké sisters. That a despised abolitionist should, in consequence of his advocacy of a hated cause, thereby secure a wife from one of the proudest slaveholding families in South Carolina would be considered improbable in fiction.

Few, if any, of this assembly can recall the early days of the nation's regenerative struggle. Only in his later life, venerable in aspect, when circumstances brought Mr. Weld and his family into this New England neighborhood, at the outbreak of the Civil War, did we know these toilers in the time of great adversity. The nation had then eschewed the selling and scourging of human beings under the law; and Northern soldiers were finishing the work of emancipation which the abolitionists began, and which they fondly hoped to reach through peaceful means.

But the veteran did not come into a strange community. Many years at Bellville and at Eagleswood, N. J., had Mr. and Mrs. Weld kept schools for the children of reformers chiefly; and former scholars rallied to him with spontaneous loyalty and affection. Again he looked for fresh pupils to instruct, and through the pages of Shakspeare interpreted by the light of life's experiences the lessons of the world's bard.

Who can forget his striking and familiar figure as he wended his abstracted way through Boston streets, a contrast to the alert and nervous multitude? He might himself have stood for a Shaksperian hero, this man of strength and tenderness and leonine front. Year in and year out, through domestic loss and sorrows, serene amid mutations that tax the courage of advancing age, he went his daily rounds, not soured and pessimistic, but with the serene faith and optimism of the true idealist. His soul could not grow old. The atmosphere he carried, not less than his picturesque beauty, impressed strangers unaware of his remarkable past. His mind was open and hospitable to new ideas; and, as became the husband of such a wife, he was an earnest champion of woman's utmost rights.

This is a day of rejoicing for him. The body was weary of its long service, and further extension of days could bring nothing to counterbalance the waning faculties and weakening limbs. He had seen the death of slavery, and had enjoyed the apotheosis accorded to most reformers only after death. It was time that the trammelled spirit should be emancipated. He had no doubt that death was the threshold to a larger life, and no man had more reason for the assurance. His faith was a continual comfort, for

"He who sees the future sure,
The baffling present may endure,
And bless meanwhile the Unseen Hand that leads
The heart's desire beyond the halting step
Of deeds."

Rev. J. H. Rich, a former pastor, in an address on Mr. Weld, said: "He was a prophet of humanity, a preacher of hope to the world, a defender of the weak, and a deliverer of the oppressed. The yokes he could not break he battered and bruised, and hastened their divorce from the galled neck of all manner and kind of slaves and sufferers. Mr. Weld was an absolutely just and fearless man. He would stand up for right and justice, and insist upon these virtues in friend or foe. During the last thirty years, he was an ardent believer in and supporter of the Unitarian Church, and its most distinguished member, and president of his own society."

WHITTIER'S LIFE AND LETTERS.*

Up to a certain point Mr. Pickard has given us a book which is entirely satisfactory. It is a mine of information, from which future biographers can coin their books at will, and impress them with their own image and superscription. Presumably, his information is as accurate as any we shall ever have. If it is not, it is not because Mr. Pickard has withheld details which might seem to be injurious to Whittier's reputation. Nothing is so characteristic of his book as, to use Charles Lamb's phrase descriptive of his father, "a most incorrigible and losing honesty." We can imagine him as mastered by the soul of Whittier's soul, the conscience of his conscience, and fearing above all things to withhold anything that is true of him, and yet casts a reflection more or less painful on his character. And so it happens that, considering the length of Whittier's career, and how much has been written on him heretofore, including two separate biographies, we have in Mr. Pickard's book an element of revelation and surprise that was not at all to be expected, and which is very uncommon in the biographies of long-lived men written after their death. The point at which Mr. Pickard's book ceases to be entirely satisfactory is that where it begins to be critical. Hardly does it begin, and it does not go far on this line. Here we must wait for some volume of the "American Men of Letters," written by a competent hand,—if by Mr. Stedman's, how happy we should be!—and in the meantime content ourselves with isolated articles or such judgments as we are able to frame in our own minds. Mr. Pickard's book is rich in particulars of the methods of Whittier's work, which will be extremely serviceable to the critic we await, when he arrives.

Although Mr. Pickard's account of Whittier's childhood and youth are very full and interesting, it contains little of striking value that the biographies of Underwood and Kennedy did not furnish us. His descent from Stephen Bachiler with Daniel Webster is attested by better authority than their common possession of "the Bachiler eye." Mr. Pickard has a better opinion of that early ancestor than had Gov. Winthrop or Mr. Whittier. In the earlier New England generations the name Whittier had all the variability common to surnames of the time, being spelled in eighteen different ways. The poet's delicate health, which had a giant's strength in shaping his

COLONIAL COMFORT.

If you want a chair with some smack of age in its design, look at this engraving. In this 18th Century framework you may taste the exact comfort which your forefathers enjoyed a hundred years ago.

And so it is not to be despised. Every one who has not in his house one of these old-fashioned, high-back Colonials has something well worth saving his pennies to purchase.

At first sight a wooden seat is inimical to luxury.

But the handicraftsman of 1800 understood how to hollow out a "dug" seat, and shape it to the exact bearings of the body.

It is surprising how much more comfortable such a shaped chair is than the more yielding, but more tiring upholstered seat.

We have over 100 patterns of these Colonial chairs. The frames are ornamental, with marquetry on the seat, arms, legs, and braces, while the back is inlaid with tortoise shell and mother of pearl.

The designs are exact copies of famous originals.

career, he attributed to the toughening processes to which he was subjected in his youth. We owe to them, it will be seen as we go on, a debt of gratitude that we cannot easily exaggerate.

Mr. Pickard's narrative confirms our previous impression that it was the anti-slavery movement that made Whittier a poet, not merely an anti-slavery poet, but a poet. That taught him how to write poetry; and, once he had learned this secret, he could turn it to account in other fields. It is "significant of much" that the poem to Garrison (1832), which stands first in the order of his anti-slavery poems, is chronologically the third of all the poems that he finally included in the body of his collected works. (A few others were printed in an appendix as literary curiosities.) Yet, when he wrote that poem to Garrison, he had written and published nearly or quite three hundred since his first poem which appeared in print was published in young Garrison's Free Press at Newburyport, June 8, 1826. Where shall we look for another instance of a young poet, finally attaining to a marked ability and fame, writing so much before really coming to the use of his right hand? And it is not as if Whittier's self-criticism was very stern. It certainly was not. Few or any of his intelligent admirers would wish to save more than the two poems, "The Vaudois Teacher" and "The Frost Spirit," which were all that he saved from the three hundred written from 1826 to 1832. We have here an experience at the antipodes of Bryant's, where "Thanatopsis," written in his seventeenth year, is equal to the best he wrote in the next sixty years. But, once the anti-slavery spirit had stirred the heart of Whittier, everything that he wrote assumed straightway a higher character. This must not be taken too absolutely, for the ambitious "Mogg Megone" (1834) he finally remanded to the limbo of his ineffectual things.

But in all this there is no surprise for those who have attended to the life of Whittier heretofore with any carefulness. What is surprising is the fact that, having become an abolitionist, he remained a Whig politician for some eight or ten years, and then, joining the Liberty Party, carried with him into that much of the predilection for wire-pulling and log-rolling which had been characteristic of the earlier period to a remarkable degree. For about a dozen years he was the loyal henchman of Caleb Cushing, then endeavoring to represent the Essex District in Congress, and finally succeeding in doing so with Whittier's help. But his loyalty was not complete. There was a majority rule, and consequently elections were frequent; and, when there was no chance for himself, Cushing graciously allowed some one else to stand up and be shot at. To Whittier, so privileged, it occurred that he might so manage things as to actually secure an election for himself behind Mr. Cushing's back; but somehow the scheme miscarried. The promises he made to his fellow-conspirators at this time savor of the spoils system most offensively, though the magic formula, "To the victors belong the spoils," had then two years to gender in the womb of time. We have also to notice a letter of Whittier's to Cushing at one time, begging, if he had said this and that which Whittier had attributed to him, he would reassert it like a man, but if he had not, that he would be discreetly silent. Again we find him forcing the hand of Cushing to write a letter, or, rather, writing it with his own hand, and then flaunting it as a spontaneous expression of Cushing's to the Essex electors, and thereby securing Cushing's election. Later we find him using the same letter to discredit Cushing for a place in Tyler's cabinet. And this course of things runs parallel with an anti-slavery enthusiasm the genuineness of which we are notable for a moment to suspect.

Something was needed to save Whittier from the fatal consequences of his predilection for political management. It came to him in the guise of physical disability. In 1843, unable to extort from Whigs or Democrats an anti-slavery pledge, he over and over again prevented an election by standing as a Liberty Party candidate. Finally Daniel Webster advised the Whigs to support him. That would have meant an election, but his health was too precarious for him to take the proffered gift. "A kind Providence," says Mr. Pickard, "by a seeming affliction, had set him apart for a still higher usefulness." That phrase is big with a suggestiveness on which one cannot look without a quaking heart. For, had Whittier's health permitted him to enter Congress and to remain there, or go higher, it is very certain that we never should have known him as the poet who is now so dear to us, and sure to be as dear to coming generations. The list of anti-slavery poems might have been as long and good as it is now; but that we should have had "The Master," "Snow-bound," "The Eternal Goodness," and the many of their kind he wrote in the last half of the century, we are compelled to doubt. Nor would the man have suffered less than the poet. His tastes and his abilities would have fixed for him that line of secret management which is far more dangerous to personal character than the open combats of the political arena.

The interest of Mr. Pickard's second volume is much less striking and suggestive than that of the first, but it is of a more pleasant kind. There we have more the Whittier of our habitual reverence and love. There, too, we have the successful man of letters. He was not this until the war was over. He was so far from being it that just before his publication of "Snow-bound" he was on the point of mortgaging his modest house in Amesbury. But the first sales of "Snow-bound" brought him $10,000, and after that he had no more anxieties; and, though still frugal, he could easily be generous and leave a liberal fortune to his relatives and friends. Mr. Pickard gives us the history of many poems; and Whittier's correspondence about them with his publishers and with his editors, Lowell and Fields, is always interesting and frequently amusing. If they left many a line that we would blot for some wrong pronunciation or some intolerable rhyme, we are permitted to be grateful to them for blotting many worse than those we know. It seems that we are indebted to Lowell for the dialect form of the refrain in "Skipper Ireson's Ride," a distinct addition to that ballad's splendid force. His relations with Lowell, Holmes, Emerson, Longfellow, and Bryant, and especially with the Boston group, were of an ideal beauty. So were his friendships with Lucy Larcom, Lydia Maria Child, and others worthy of his love. There are many pleasant humors of his literary and domestic life. By no means indifferent to reputation, the notoriety that came with it at length was very troublesome. He could lose a masculine bore upon the Amesbury streets with tolerable success, but to "lose a her" was much more difficult. Of his religious life as illustrated in these volumes the Register has already spoken editorially (Dec. 13, 1894) with some particularity. They assign him, together with his works, a distinguished place among the liberals in theology and the liberalizers of religious sentiment. The sterner aspects of Orthodoxy had no beauty that he should desire them and no rationality appealing to his mind. But the most characteristic feature of his religious genius was his ability to find the spirit of love and worship under all the disguises of sectarian belief, and thereby to find himself a member of that church universal which is not of any special land or time.

J. W. C.

THE CRUCIFIXION OF PHILLIP STRONG By Charles M. Sheldon. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co.—This is a powerful and affecting story of a minister who endeavored to conform his ministry to the New Testament ideal. The same thing has been tried before, and tried much more effectively than it is here in at least one instance,—that of Mrs. Linton's "Joshua Davidson," meaning Jesus, the son of David. That was so remarkably well done and so very tragical and impressive that its short-lived fame must be a matter for wonder and regret to those who knew it and admired it in its day. "Phillip Strong" is much inferior to "Joshua Davidson" as a piece of literary art, but one is not sure that it does not bring home certain matters of importance even more powerfully. It touches many a sore spot in the ordinary ministrations of religion,—sore spots that are quite inseparable from our voluntary system of church support. To preach the simple truth to men who pay your salary is not an easy matter. At the same time it is permitted us to doubt if Phillip Strong was "rich in saving common sense," and also whether the social ethics of the Sermon on the Mount are workable in the present order of society. There is the further question whether, if they are not, this order should be overturned. Mr. Howells would say, "Yes, they should be," and Mr. Sheldon evidently agrees with him; but so drastic a pronouncement gives us pause.

IN THE MIDST OF ALARMS. By Robert Barr. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Company.—This is a bright and thoroughly amusing story, the fun depending largely on the contrasting qualities of two friends, one of them a reporter and the other a professor. The former has the knowingsness peculiar to his class. Probably he knows as much about cooking as about anything else; but he is constitutionally tired, and allows the professor to do the cooking when they go camping out together in Canada on their vacation. Fortunately, they make friends, of whose hospitality they avail themselves. Two interesting girls appear upon the scene. The professor falls in love with one of them, the reporter with both, and desires the advice of the professor in determining the balance of his affections. He finally settles on the professor's girl, but the embarrassment is relieved by her predilection for the professor. Thereupon he turns to the other, who is agreeable to his wishes. The title of the book is a satire on the failure of the reporter to get the quiet that he seeks. There is a Fenian rising, and there are telegraphic demands for his return and various complications. If one does not expect more from the story than an hour or two of innocent amusement, it will not be disappointing.

A DOUBLE CHERRY. By M. E. Winchester. New York: Macmillan & Co. $1.25. This story for children is elaborate in construction and as carefully considered as a novel. It is interesting and well written, except that it is sometimes too long drawn out and slow in action. However, if children enjoy a book, the longer the better for some reasons. This is not by any means, however, a book that should be put into the hands of a delicate, sensitive child, who would distress himself unnecessarily over the sorrows and sufferings of the two devoted little brothers of the tale, to say nothing of the parts relating to the miser and his dreadful death. A critical writer ventured the suggestion a year or two ago that we should have a censorship to taboo such books as make for melancholy in a season when people have troubles enough of their own. For children's books at least the plan might be a good one.

HEART TREASURES. By Fannie A. Damon. Buffalo: Charles Wells Moulton.—The dainty white covers and the gold lettering of this book are simple and attractive, while the verses within give evidence of a thoughtful spirit and a mind disposed to find good in trial and hope in the heart of sorrow. They are not ambitious verses, but will doubtless fulfil their mission of speaking a word of help to other hearts. The writer is more concerned about the purity of her thoughts than the form in which they are expressed.

THE RUBIES OF ST. LO. By Charlotte M. Yonge. London: Macmillan & Co. 75 cents.—This is a charming little story of romance, with family legends, hidden jewels, and enough mystery to make an effective denouement at the end. Truth avails over spells and errors, as it ought. Probably the chief criticism that young girls will make on the book will be that it is too short.

The Magazines.

The Pansy appears with its usual variety of stories and verses for the little ones. The February number includes instalments of the serials by Pansy and Margaret Sidney, short stories by Myra Spafford, E. H. Buckhout, and a few articles of more serious tone, besides the usual departments.

Lend a Hand continues its record of progress by reports of good work already accomplished or in operation. The opening article of the February number discusses the "Abolition of Pauperism," finding the solution of the problem in decentralization. W. H. McElroy commends Palmer's "Wealth of Labor" to students of economics, especially to law-makers. The Indians of Minnesota and the Massachusetts Indian Association, the Boston public schools, home studies for children, German public kitchens, and other topics of interest are discussed or presented here with ability.

Col. Hill James contributes to Macmillan's Magazine for February an interesting article entitled "Recollections of the Chinese War," meaning thereby the taking of Peking in 1860. "The Sexcentenary of the English Parliament," by J. W. Root, traces briefly the steps that led to the great consummation of 1295. Mr. Andrew Lang writes of the romantic career of a queen of England, who never saw English ground, Maria Clementina, grand-daughter of Sobieski and mother of Prince Charlie, and of her escape from imperial custody at Innspruck. There are as many more articles, all deserving mention.

The Charities Review is a journal of practical sociology, and contains much interesting and instructive matter for any one interested in charity organization or other forms of this work. The "Care of the Insane" and "Causes of Poverty" are articles in the January number, written by Rev. S. G. Smith and Amos G. Warner respectively. Rev. W. G. C. Wright contributes the leading article on "Society can afford to lose None of its Fragments," which is followed by Ansley Wilcox's "Concerning Labor Tests," in which the writer shows this to be one of the problems that do not

NEW
SWEET SCENTED PANSIES.

New Hybrids in which are blended the perfume of the Violet, with the beauty of the Pansy.

This new class is the result of crossing the pansy with the sweet alpine violet; the resulting hybrids, in addition to retaining the delightful violet perfume, produce the most beautiful pansy-like blossoms, 2 to 2½ inches across. The solid or selfs include white, lemon, orange, claret, crimson, maroon, lavender, purple, rose, black, blue, etc., etc. The fancy varieties are exquisitely tinted, striped and blotched. Many critics consider the combinations and blendings of color in the NEW SWEET-SCENTED PANSIES to be more beautiful than the ordinary strains of Pansy.

The NEW SWEET-SCENTED PANSIES are hardy, of easy culture, and, planted in masses or lines, they form perfect mats covered with myriads of flowers. They begin to make the garden gay in early spring and continue to bloom with marvelous freedom until autumn. The flowers are borne on long stems which shoot up like the violet directly from the roots, rendering the flowers of special value for cutting purposes.

PRICE PER PACKET (FIXED COLORS) 25 CENTS.

A complete description of this new floral beauty will be found in our 1895 Catalogue of "EVERYTHING for the GARDEN," which we will send FREE with every order from this advertisement, when this paper is mentioned. admit of absolute determination because of their variable factors; but he offers helpful suggestions. The other articles and the general notes are also instructive.

The Cosmopolitan contains its usual number of illustrated articles, "From Baku to Samarkand," by Frank Vincent, representing travel, and "The Fall of Louis Philippe," by Émile Ollivier, representing history. Anatole France continues the series "Great Passions of History" by a study of Abelard and Héloïse, Viscount Wolseley tells us "What China should do," W. Clark Russell spins a three-stranded yarn, Mr. Howells concludes his "A Parting and a Meeting," while Mrs. De Koven contributes a cynical little sketch of society life. Julian Hawthorne's article on "Salvation via the Rack" is one whose grim title warns off readers, who prefer not to sup upon horrors unless it is necessary; and there are other articles of varied interest.

The Arena for February includes in its articles on social, economic, and political problems "The President's Currency Plan," by Congressman W. J. Bryan; "Bimetallism and Legislation," by Hon. C. S. Thomas; "The Populist Campaign in Chicago," by Willis J. Abbot. "Woman Suffrage in the South" is discussed in articles presenting opposing views, and written by Mrs. Josephine K. Henry and Mrs. Annah Robinson Watson. Each quotes freely from letters received from representative women; and perhaps nothing is more significant than the moderate, even uncertain, tone of those opposed. The article by Rev. S. J. Barrows, on "Penology in Europe and America," is a comparative study of prisons and prison methods in different countries. Henry Wood has written of "The Dynamics of Mind"; B. O. Flower, of "The Italy of the Century of Sir Thomas More"; and there are other articles of interest.

Christian Literature for February contains the first part of an article by Leonard Woolsey Bacon, in which he considers the assurance of salvation and the certainty of belief to which the pope has invited Christendom. It is called "How the Rev. Dr. Stone bettered his Situation," and answers the arguments set forth by James Kent Stone, late president of Kenyon College and of Hobart College, in his book entitled "The Invitation heeded." F. H. Woods writes of the permanent and beneficial influence which the simple, manly life of Charles Kingsley has had on English character. Mrs. Ireland's "Recollections of James Anthony Froude" is reprinted from the Contemporary Review; and an essay by T. Teignmouth Shore treats the subject of auricular confession historically, as connected with the English Church. A sermon by Rev. Reuben Thomas is reprinted from the Outlook, and there are also articles by Theodore L. Cuyler and Canon Farrar.

The February or midwinter number of the Century contains several articles of biographical and critical interest. Besides the instalment of Sloane's life of Napoleon Bonaparte, which presents him as the Jacobin patriot, there are articles on Oliver Wendell Holmes, by Mrs. Fields; "Characteristics of George Inness," by George William Sheldon; "The Death of Emin Pasha," by R. Dorsey Mohun; and "Lincoln, Chase, and Grant," by Noah Brooks. Miss Alice Brown contributes a story in a vein new to her, so far as we know. Frank Pope Humphrey tells in "He would a-wooing go" how Joel Larkin tried to propose to Tenty Farebrother, and Mrs. Harrison continues "An Errant Wooing." "People in New York" are described by Mrs. Schuyler Van Rensselaer, affording good points for illustration by C. D. Gibson; and there are other articles of interest, besides poetry by Robert Underwood Johnson, Ralph Adams Cram, John Hay, and Kenyon Cox.

A valuable article in the Atlantic Monthly is that by Mrs. Alexander Graham Bell on "The Subtle Art of Speech-reading." Mrs. Bell's frank description of her own experience since the severe illness that deprived her of hearing is not only interesting, but encouraging for others. The very next article describes "A Voyage in the Dark," the fishing trip of a blind man. Boris Sidis contributes a curious "Study of the Mob." He believes they are "hypnotized by a strong, sudden action, becoming for a time obedient" to the ringleader, the hero, who hypnotizes. "Russia as a Civilizing Force in Asia" is a subject discussed by James Mascarene Hubbard. French, the sculptor, is the first subject of a series of essays by Royal Cortissoz, "New Figures in Literature and Art." His service to American art is admirably estimated; and the praise, though unstinted, is well supported by reasons. "Physical Training in the Public Schools" is wisely advocated by M. V. O'Shea; and Mrs. Fields writes a graphic, loving sketch of her friend, Celia Thaxter. Indeed, the number is rich in articles that claim and hold attention.

Thomas A. Janvier leads off in the February number of Harper's Magazine with an article on "New York Colonial Privileges." He confesses a warm kindness for these "audacious rashlings," that flows partly from envy of their doings and partly from gladness that they had the chance to fight their lives out in their own way.

Poultney Bigelow describes "French Fighters in Africa." Charles F. Lummis, in "Down the West Coast," tells of a twenty-seven days' ocean trip from San Francisco to Callao; and Edwin Lord Weeks takes "Oudeypore, the City of the Sunrise," as subject of an interesting article, affording opportunity for romantic and most attractive illustrations. "What is Gambling?" by John Bigelow, is a thoughtful and timely article. The fiction of the number includes short stories by F. Hopkinson Smith, Mrs. Burton Harrison, Grace King, Julian Ralph, each of which reveals the pathos hidden in the lives of common people, besides the serials by Richard Harding Davis and Thomas Hardy. There is very little poetry; but that little is unusually good, eight lines by John B. Tabb and as many more by Lilla Cabot Perry, entitled respectively "Vox Clamantis" and "Love's not Death's Slave." There are other articles of interest.

Miscellaneous.

Maynard's School Texts, No. 6 in the French series, is arranged for beginners by Mlle. de Pompéry, "Petites Histoires Enfantines." The German text is an historical sketch taken from Otto Hoffmann's "Andreas Hofer." The customary arrangement of notes and vocabulary is found in these numbers, and as usual the German selection is much superior to the French.

The Tribune Almanac and Political Register seemingly contains information on all points connected with the political government of the States, besides financial and commercial statistics of various kinds and data on subjects too numerous to classify. It is a perfect mine of knowledge, and may be had for twenty-five cents. This was first published in 1838 as the Whig Almanac, and is the oldest among all American annuals.

The immediate large interest in the two small cloth-bound books of the "Life" series, published during the last quarter of 1894 (each containing four papers), together with the general desire that similar brief essays or "studies" might be had singly in neat periodical form, leads to this first monthly issue of Life-Studies. THOSE BONNIE EYES OF BLUE.

BY EMILY J. LEWIS.

At night, by day, in dreams I see
A house exceeding fair,
So delicately fashioned 'tis,
Of workmanship most rare.
And from the casement window shine
A pair of eyes so blue:
Ah me! those bonnie, bonnie eyes,
Those bonnie eyes of blue!

It seems but yesterday 'twas here,
This dainty house, so sweet,
Within a garden fair it stood,
Where scent and color meet.
The lilies bloomed, the roses climbed
To reach the pane, where through Shone out those bonnie, bonnie eyes,
Those bonnie eyes of blue.

But all at once a cloud, a storm,
Obscured the peace and light;
And muttering, roaring, whirling round,
It tore the home from sight.
The flowers are dead, my house is gone:
Perchance 'twill grieve you, too,
To know that I have lost those eyes,
Those bonnie eyes of blue.

I wander here, I wander there.
My heart is full of pain.
I cannot find those baby eyes,
My search is all in vain.
And yet sometimes there comes to me
A dream, a vision true,
A feeling that they're near me still,
Those bonnie eyes of blue.

Yes, for the sake of that pure face
My soul grows brave and strong,
I feel the all-embracing Love,
And in my heart a song.
For flowers shall grow again, and light
Come streaming through and through,
As in the heavens they smile at me,
Those bonnie eyes of blue.

AN EVERY-DAY STORY.

BY BERTHA GERNEAUX DAVIS.

"You aren't going to try to arrange that cupboard yourself, are you, mamma? You look tired. Close the doors, and let's forget it's existence."

Mrs. Jordan smiled: the suggestion was so like Bettie.

"No, dear, it ought to be done at once. I can't bear to have such a disorderly corner about the house. I'm sure I don't know when Susan will be back, and I don't much care. She never does anything thoroughly."

"Then let me do it, mamma." Bettie spoke more cheerfully than she felt. She had mapped out a different plan for these Saturday morning hours.

"You dear child! It would be such a relief, but I don't like to put it on your shoulders."

"Oh, nonsense!" laughed Bettie. "My shoulders are stronger than you think, mamma. What do you suppose all my physical culture lessons have been good for?"

So Mrs. Jordan was cajoled out of the room; and Bettie, perched on the baby's high-chair, attacked the upper shelves. It was a pleasant sight to Aunt Lydia, sitting by the fireplace, under whose deft fingers a little sock was taking form and shape. Her needles never slackened, even while her eyes were fixed on the slender, girlish figure. How unselfish Bettie was growing! What was the reason? Was the little silver cross, with its three suggestive letters, in the secret?

As the work progressed, Aunt Lydia felt a slight uneasiness. Would Bettie prove faithful, she wondered, when she reached the lowest shelf? You see the day before Aunt Lydia had gone to this same shelf in search of some article, and had come across a box away at the further end. In the one swift glance she gave it as she raised the cover she had a glimpse of Tom's top, some battered tissue-paper flowers, tangled embroidery silks, and sundry old gloves and ribbons; while there were indications of equally interesting developments beneath. Evidently, Susan had made it a sort of dumping-ground for "odds and ends." And now Aunt Lydia wondered if this might not prove too much for Bettie's good resolutions.

"Behold," said the unconscious Bettie at this juncture, with a flourish that imperilled her standing on the high-chair. "The top shelves are in a state of precision that it would do your heart good to see." And then she descended to give Aunt Lydia a great hug, and prepare for an attack on the lower shelves. "Do you know," she went on confidentially, "I have turned over a new leaf. I detest work of this kind, but I make myself do it. It's a 'discipline for the mind,' as Miss Brownlee says about algebra. No, that isn't my motive, either." And the round face grew suddenly serious. "I made up my mind that I must improve, or I should feel as if I were dishonoring that." And Bettie touched the little silver cross.

A minute later Mrs. Jordan put her head in at the door.

"Can you leave that awhile, dear, and take this letter to the post-office? It ought to go on the next mail."

"Of course, I can," said Bettie, promptly; "and glad of the chance. I'll be ready in just two minutes."

Left alone in the dining-room, Aunt Lydia laid down her knitting and vanished up the stairs. She was back in her place, however, and knitting as placidly as ever, when Bettie returned with her girlish face glowing from exercise and contact with the crisp, frosty air.

"It's delicious outdoors, auntie. I was tempted not to come back till time for luncheon." And Bettie shook her fist menacingly at the unfinished work. "But, then, I'm nearly through. Only two more shelves to do, and they're easy." Evidently, she was in blissful ignorance of the miscellaneous collection in that neat-looking pasteboard box.

Aunt Lydia watched her pretty niece when the last shelf was cleared and the discovery made. Bettie always sang over her work; and she was in the midst of "God make my life a little light," when a sudden impulse led her to open that whited sepulchre. The song ceased abruptly. Another minute, and the cover was replaced,—the box pushed back to the end of the shelf. Bettie's voice piped up again; but it was constrained now, and not so clear as before.

"All through, dear?" said Mrs. Jordan, entering just as Bettie was closing the cupboard doors. "Yes, I see you are. How beautifully you have arranged everything! What would we ever do without our helpful Bettie, Aunt Lydia? You don't know what a relief it is, Bettie, to know that everything is in order here." And, with a kiss that brought the blood to Bettie's cheeks, her mother left the room.

Early in the afternoon Ethel Manderson called. "Put on your things, can't you, Bettie? Mamma wants you to go sleigh-riding with us."

Of course, Bettie flew to her room for her warmest wrappings; and the result was a long, blissful ride through city and country roads, to the music of jingling sleigh-bells.

It was not till evening that she thought again of the slighted box. She felt uncomfortable when she joined the group around the fireplace in the library.

"Let's have anagrams," suggested Tom, running for the box of letters. "You give me a word, Bet; and I'll give you one."

"Well," but Bettie's voice was somewhat reluctant. She was bright and quick, however, and guessed her words too easily for Tom's satisfaction.

"Say, now," he protested: "you guess them too fast. I haven't made out the one you gave me yet. Here's another word for you, though. It isn't very long, but it puzzled me the other day."

Tom shook the letters vigorously in his two hands, and delivered them over to Bettie.

"That isn't hard," she announced almost immediately. "It's 'daughter.'"

"Well, now, aren't you smart?" And Tom looked disgusted. "You can wait awhile for the next one. I shan't bother with you till I guess my own."

"That suits me," said Bettie. "I'm going downstairs, anyway. There's something I want to do there."

No one but Aunt Lydia suspected what the business was, and she did not guess the cause of the sudden decision.

It was that last anagram, so unconsciously given by Brother Tom. Bettie's conscience was in a sensitive state that evening, which made it an easy transition from the word in her hand to the thought of the daughter she claimed to be,—the "King's Daughter"; and her resolution was taken. That detestable box should be cleared before she slept that night.

It wasn't pleasant to sit there all alone in the dining-room, assorting that heterogeneous collection; for Bettie was a sociable little body. But the coals glowed brightly in the open grate, as if they wanted to cheer her; and, as her fingers flew over the distasteful work, a warm feeling crept into her heart.

There were other compensations, too. Long-lost treasures, it seemed, had found their way to Susan's dumping-ground. "If here isn't my best paint-brush!" And Bettie's eyes shone as she drew it out by its long handle; "and, actually, my tube of yellow ochre!"

"What in the world is this?" she said, as she found a neat little tissue-paper package, and opened it wonderingly. "If it isn't Aunt Lydia's lovely pink pincushion! And here's a paper pinned to it." So there was; and on it were just these three words, "For faithful Bettie." Well, well! What a wonderful woman Aunt Lydia was, anyway! How did she know anything about the box, when even Bettie had been ignorant of its existence? How confident she must have been that Bettie would not shirk, or she would never have placed there that dear little reward for her to find! Aunt Lydia must have been disappointed in her! The thought made Bettie's fingers fly faster than ever, till the work was finished. Somehow, she did not want to throw her strong, young arms around Aunt Lydia until her conscience was quite, quite cleared.

It was a light, quick step that came behind the big arm-chair a few minutes later.

"Who's a darling?" whispered Bettie, to cover her embarrassment; "and who gave her horrid niece her very prettiest and pinkest pincushion?"

"Who's a dear little King's Daughter?" answered Aunt Lydia.

"What are you two talking about?" said Tom. "Giving conundrums? Come over here, Bet. I've got a new word for you,—a regular puzzler!"

GRANDMOTHER'S MUFF.

"When I was a happy little girl in New York State, I was a greater coward than you!"

Timid Cara Fulton's sweet face brightened. "You a coward, grandma? I can't believe that!"

"But I was, child, and I can prove it with a story! You see, that is how I came by my first squirrel-skin muff. It was given me by good Uncle Foster for a bit of bravery done long ago. At that time we lived quite near Owasco Lake, just father, mother, and I; for I was an only child, and had been spoiled and petted accordingly. And I was a great coward until I earned that pretty muff!"

"Uncle Foster was also our next neighbor, for father's farm and his adjoined."

"One stormy December night my dear mother was taken ill. Father had gone to Auburn, and would not return until the next day. But a doctor must be had at once."

"Valerie," said mother, with a groan, "you must go for Dr. Bain."

"And my foolish heart jumped clear up into my throat! For Dr. Bain lived a good half-mile beyond. And it was already after nine. Beside that, I had never in all my life been out in the dark alone."

"And I shrank back, pale and trembling, though mother's dear face was paler. 'Don't ask it: please don't,' I cried. But mother repeated her words more firmly: 'Valerie, you must go for Dr. Bain.'"

"And so, despairingly, I donned my pretty blue hood and cloak and mittens. After that I kissed mother, and went out into the night. Oh, the terror and agony of that awful moment! The heavy clouds hid moon and stars! The wind blew, and the snow fell. And all about me was inky darkness. And, to crown all this, I must go for Dr. Bain."

"With slow, frightened step I crept down to the garden gate. It closed behind me with a bang, and it sounded exactly like the report of a musket. I screamed aloud, but was obliged to hasten on. Mother must have help, and that as quickly as possible."

"But some tall bushes by the roadside attracted my terrified gaze. Swaying in the wind, they took the forms of men. Robbers, perhaps, I thought, with a shudder. And they might kill me and take my new blue hood! Should I turn back? Conscience whispered no! Mother needed assistance, and she ought to have it. So, gaining a bit of courage, I went on again, and the bushes were passed in safety. But just beyond was a little stretch of woods, and I would be obliged to pass that also. Yet how could I? Why, I had always held my breath in the day-time when going by with father in his gig. But now I must go alone and in the dark. Shutting both eyes tight, I started on a run; and then, when I thought I had quite passed the awful wood, I opened them wide. And there I stood directly at its entrance."

"Again and again I screamed in terror. But the wind alone came through the leafless trees, and the snow fell in great flakes on my frightened face. I could only hurry on with the speed of the wind itself."

"When I reached Farmer Gray's lane, a strange dog came rushing out, and once more I was in mortal terror. It wasn't Mr. Gray's Tomtoy, and I had always been afraid of all dogs I wasn't acquainted with. Supposing this one should eat me up? Well, they would at least find my bones next day, at the foot of the long lane! But the huge fellow only licked my face and followed after, being more company than I can tell you. The balance of my half-mile to Dr. Bain's was gone over without accident or incident, and the good man himself opened wide his oaken door."

"Why, it's Dame Alton's lassie!" he cried in welcome. "You were brave, indeed, to come out here on such a night!"

"Don't," I answered excitedly. "I am not brave at all! Mother is ill, or I couldn't have come. And I don't know how I got here at all! O Dr. Bain, I've had such dreadful frights!"

"I don't wonder," he said with a kiss. "But we'll go back together in a sleigh, and that will make you forget all about it."

"And so we did shortly after, Dr. Bain cheering me up with kindly jest and song."

"But it did not seem the same road! We slipped by the lane and woods and bushes in turn, and at last drew up before father's own white gate."

"Mother was lying white and still with a heart spell, and I felt that Dr. Bain had come just in time. For some hours he worked there at her bedside; and, when he finally left for home, mother was resting quietly and naturally."

"You have saved your mother's life," he said at the door. "Valeria, my dear, I don't think you will ever be a coward again."

"And I promised him, then and there, that I would not."

"Uncle Foster came over the next morning; and mother proudly told him the story of my bravery, as she termed it. But I knew it had been only cowardice instead, and when uncle drew me into his lap I sobbed aloud."

"You don't know all!" I cried. "I have been a wretched, cowardly girl, and I wouldn't have gone a step to Dr. Bain's if mother hadn't made me." And then I told both mother and him my whole miserable story.

"But they did not chide me, as I thought they would. Mother called me her heroine, and Uncle Foster hugged me just like the bears in my story-books.

"Father got back from Auburn soon after, and he stroked my long hair gravely. 'I must not praise you,' he said, 'for you only did your duty. But I cannot be too thankful that you have at last overcome your cowardice. Ah! Valerie, I have great hopes of you yet!'

"And, coming from father, that was a great deal.

"The week before Christmas Uncle Foster went to New York City. It was a great thing in those days, and eagerly I awaited his return. For many a story would he have to tell me about what he had seen and heard.

"And he came on Christmas Day! The stage stopped right at our gate; and Aunt Selina, his wife, was there with us, to meet him. I remember he put me on his shoulder right before the driver and his other passengers, and I felt very much ashamed, indeed!

"My brave little Valerie!" he cried with a hug. "I've brought you a fine present clear from the great city! And you'll never guess just what it is!"

"I did, indeed, try hard, but finally I was obliged to give it up.

"After dinner we gathered around the blazing logs, and Uncle Foster brought out his presents. There was a long cloak for Aunt Selina, and a purple gown for mother. Father got a silver snuff-box, and lastly came my own present. It was in a square brown box, and on it was printed in Uncle Foster's own hand, 'For a brave girl.' The room seemed to turn round as I read! I looked at mother, but her eyes were filled with happy tears. And then Aunt Selina cut the string, and raised the lid, and there, like a pretty gray kitten, lay a soft squirrel-skin muff.

"Father raised both hands deprecatingly, but Uncle Foster shook his head. 'Don't say a word, Abner! Valeria shall have her due! She went for Dr. Bain that stormy night, without hope of reward; and I've brought her this muff in compensation. Selina and I have neither chick nor child, and Valeria has always seemed daughter and niece in one.'

"He shook out the pretty muff, and I thrust ten trembling fingers into it. What a moment that was, to be sure! Never can I forget Uncle Foster's kindly, florid face. I kissed him thankfully, and then I went over and kissed father also.

"For half a century I have treasured that squirrel-skin muff. It is faded and moth-eaten now, and I never take it from its old brown box. But I like to think it is still there on the upper shelf.

"Father and mother, Uncle Foster and Aunt Selina, are all sleeping in the old Auburn graveyard. They have been reunited above, where I, too, hope to join them at last.

"This, Cara, is my story. And you see that grandma was a coward, after all. Whenever you are tempted to be timid and fearful, just think how I earned my little gray muff."—Mrs. Findley Braden, in New York Observer.

AS TO ORANGES.

The orange is easily the queen of fruit-trees. It is of obscure origin. Nothing is said of it in the ancient classics. Scientists trace it to the farther bank of the Ganges. From thence it seems to have been brought to Syria by the Arabs. The crusaders discovered its singular beauty, and transplanted it to Spain; and the Spanish invaders probably brought it to Florida, as there are trees at St. Augustine which are thought to be two hundred years old still bearing fruit bountifully in their old age. The scattered wild groves are accounted for on the theory that travellers and Indians, carrying the fruit in their packs for food, unconsciously scattered the seeds about their camps. But, of course, as they had no care,—like the apple-tree of the North, which, it is said, if neglected, will degenerate to its original sour crab state,—they have gone back to their old unregenerate conditions, sturdy in their depravity, but bearing only bitter fruit. But it is a noble stock, nevertheless, and, when budded with a new grace, bears as fine fruit as the world sees anywhere.

The orange culture, amounting this year, it is estimated, to about $5,000,000, is the chief staple of Florida. Much capital is invested in it. Many hands labor at it. We are in the midst of the orange section, and many prosperous groves front on this Charm Lake. Blessings on the Mr. Great Heart that not only built here a memorial chapel and a commodious parsonage, but, by way of emphasis, also set off for it an acre grove of fifty orange-trees!

Only sand, I said; but this is one of the half-truths. Sand artificially fertilized is the bed where the roots of this marvellous tree suck out the nutriment and send up in the sap, to be elaborated in the dense foliage of the tree-top, the nectar of the orange. I do not cease to marvel—I never shall—at the mystery of the transformation. It is the last thing that one would naturally expect that out of this sand, with apparently no food sustenance for plants in it whatever, there should come such beautiful and abundant fruit. By what subtle process do these searching roots gather out from these infinitesimal particles of mere grit a liquid? for it must be that, else it could not ascend in sap. By what power is it pumped up through the cell structure of the trunk, distributed among the branches, and spread out among the leaves? Shall we ever know that marvellous chemical mystery in which the fervid sunshine and the balmy atmosphere elaborate and sweeten and flavor the juice, carrying it through the beautiful and delicate transformations of bud and flower, and then of green, hard, sour little balls, slowly swelling them through months of summer heat, pencilling them with a touch of gold as they round into their fulness in the autumn days? Who taught this marvellously scientific orange-tree to pack away its nectarine juices into the tender cells of golden globes, to cover them about with a layer of tasteless pith, and then to draw around all a tough, bright-colored, bitter peel, water-proof and firm enough to carry safely its precious enclosure to all climes of the globe, and yet so easily opened that, at the slightest puncture, the pent-up sweetness gushes to meet the pressure of rosebud lips, and bearded ones as well?—S. J. Humphrey, D.D., in Advance.

COLD-STORAGE RATS AND OATS.

The Pittsburg Dispatch says that in the cold-storage warehouses in that city there were no rats or mice. The temperature in the cold rooms was too low. The keepers soon found, however, that the rat is an animal of remarkable adaptability. After some of these houses had been in operation for a few months the attendants found that rats were at work in the rooms where the temperature was constantly kept below the freezing point. They were found to be clothed in wonderfully long and thick fur, even the tapering, snakelike tails being covered by a thick growth of hair. Rats whose coats have adapted themselves to the conditions under which they live have domesticated themselves in all the storage warehouses in Pittsburg. The prevalence of rats in these places led to the introduction of cats. Now, it is well known that pussy is a lover of warmth and comfort. Cats, too, have a great adaptability to conditions. When cats were turned loose in the cold rooms, they pined and died because of the excessive cold.

One cat was finally introduced into the rooms of the Pennsylvania Storage Company which was able to withstand the low temperature. She was a cat of unusually thick fur, and she thrived and grew fat in quarters where the temperature was below 30 degrees. By careful nursing a brood of seven kittens was developed in this warehouse into sturdy, thick-furred cats that love an Icelandic climate. They have been distributed among the other cold-storage houses of Pittsburg, and have created a peculiar breed of cats, adapted to the conditions under which they must exist to find their prey. These cats are short-tailed, chubby pussies, with hair as thick and full of under fur as the wildcats of the Canadian woods. One of the remarkable things about them is the development of their "feelers." These long, stiff hairs that protrude from a cat's nose and eyebrows are, in the ordinary domestic feline, about three inches long. In the cats cultivated in the cold warehouses the "feelers" grow to a length of five and six inches. This is probably because the light is dim in these places, and all movements must be the result of the feeling sense. The storage people say that, if one of these furry cats is taken into the open air, particularly during this hot spell, it will die in a few hours. It cannot endure a high temperature, and an introduction to a stove would send it into a fit.—Our Paper.

A STORY ABOUT WASHINGTON NOT FOUND IN HISTORY.

It is about his copy-book and his birthday. History says that that copy-book is at Mount Vernon now. The story is this. When George Washington was a little boy and went to school, there was a big snow-storm on February 21. The boys planned to have a snow-ball fight the next day. George Washington was to be captain of one side, because it was his birthday. They were going to have the battle right after school. At recesses they made piles and piles of snow-balls to fire at each other. Oh, they were going to have a grand time. They had to write in their copy-books the last thing before school closed. George Washington was thinking so much about the snow-ball fight that his writing was not nice at all. His teacher said: "George, I am surprised. Take this piece of paper and write that all over again after school." And George Washington had to stay in on his birthday. The boys got another captain in his place and had the snow-ball battle, and he wasn't in it.—Primary Education.

WOMAN UNDER ISLAM.

Miss Lucy M. J. Gannett, in an interesting paper in the Nineteenth Century for January writes on "Woman under Islam." First, in relation to the religious position of woman. The teaching of the Koran is explicit on this point, as can be seen by many passages. Thus, "God has promised to believers, men and women, gardens beneath which rivers flow, to dwell therein forever, and goodly places in the Garden of Eden." "Enter ye into Paradise, ye and your wives happy." Besides other passages in the Koran which teach that women have souls, the "Traditional Sayings" of Mohammed and many of his followers show that woman had a religious position here as well as the promise of paradise beyond. Though they do not attend public services in the mosques, they have sermons preached to them on week-days by the Hodjas; and girls as well as boys are taught their prayers at the age of seven. After thus giving in full the religious position of women, we have next as it has been for the last thirteen hundred years. It is that of a free woman.

HER LEGAL POSITION,

As a daughter, she is entitled, on the decease of her father, to inherit his property in common with her brothers, in a proportion determined by law according to the number of his children. As a wife she has the uncontrolled possession and disposal both of the wealth which was hers before marriage, and of that which may subsequently accrue to her. She can inherit property without the intervention of trustees, and dispose of it during her lifetime, or at her death, as she pleases. No doctrine of coverture exists for her. She can sue or be sued independently of her husband, and also sue or be sued by him. In the event of her suffering wrong, or being accused of wronging others, she is at liberty to plead her own cause before the public tribunals, and often does so most ably and eloquently. A husband is legally bound to support his wife, and her slaves or servants, according to her rank and his means, and to furnish her with a suitable residence.

A Moslem marriage is purely a civil contract, consisting of a proposal on one side and acceptance on the other. If the married couple cannot agree, then distinct procedures are fixed for a divorce. If the wife, without adequate reason and contrary to the wishes of her husband, requires a divorce, she obtains it only by foregoing her dower. As to custody of the children, the provisions, on the whole, favor the mother.

Miss Gannett's article will undoubtedly call forth answers from those who dispute her position.

BRYANT'S GENIUS.

—There is an evident tendency among English writers to deal more justly and with more discrimination in their estimates of American poets. The Westminster Review for January has a brief sketch of Bryant by Thomas Bradfield, which closes with this view of the poet's genius :—

Finally, we would suggest that Bryant's genius was at its best in passages imaginatively descriptive of external loveliness rather than in those expressive of moods and feelings when the spirit is aspiring or analytically reflective. His true strength lay in his powers of vivid delineation, in the art which could bring distinctly to mind, with a few graphic strokes, the rushing vehemence of the stream or the waterfall, the boundless stretch of the prairie magnificence, the terrors of the hurricane, no less than the gentle sweetness of the evening wind, as it "rocks the little wood-bird in his nest," or "curls the still waters bright with stars," or "goes forth as God's blessing breathed upon the fainting earth." His genius lingers lovingly over the splendors of mountain and valley scenery, as if at home with the sublimities of the "beetling verge," whose storm and lightning "have tumbled down vast blocks and at the base dashed them into fragments," or where "upon the meadow's heart the shadow of the thicket lies." With these and similar scenes of natural charm Bryant's poetry abounds; but, with regard to that mysterious land of spiritual longing and contemplation toward which the loftiest thoughts of man turn wistfully, his conceptions are limited and prescribed. Although his poetry is full of references to the highest subjects which can engage the mind, these are all viewed from one standpoint. His spirit is enlisted on the affirmative side of the problem, and in every line that he has written we feel the influence of the faith of one who believes in Divine Goodness ruling the universe.

Temperance.

The medical journals comment on the statement of a coroner that one thousand infants are overlain in London every year. The conclusion come to is that these deaths—occurring, as they invariably do, on Saturday nights or after holidays—are mainly traceable to the inebriety of the mothers.

In reviewing the progress of the temperance movement during the last two decades, Miss Willard said in her annual address before the National Women's Christian Temperance Union: "The habit of total abstinence is thoroughly respected everywhere. The effects of the use of alcoholics and tobacco are being systematically taught from the standpoint of science to the children in the public schools of all the fifty States and Territories except five. Prohibition has gained ground in several Northern States and throughout the South by means of local option. The recent plebiscites in Canada prove the growth of a strong sentiment in favor of prohibitory law. In Great Britain the prevailing sentiment is that the question of license or no license should be placed in the people's hands; and in New Zealand, Colorado, and Kansas, where women have the ballot, the effect of their influence has been strongly detrimental to the legal as well as the social position of the saloon."

Here and There.

A new species of giraffe has been discovered in Somaliland by Major Wood of the British army. It is distinguished by a complete and whole body covering of rich bright chestnut, hardly separable by very fine, almost invisible lines of creamy white.

The alligator is likely to be exterminated in America. It is said that as many as six hundred skins can be obtained in a fortnight by a party of successful hunters; and, to meet the effects of this loss, alligator farms are being established in one or more of the Southern States.

A portrait in oil of Peter the Great was discovered lately by an English traveller in a small village in Russia. He had stepped into a peasant's cottage to ask for a cup of tea, when he saw the picture hanging on the wall, framed in a tea tray, the edges of which were folded over the canvas, and bought it for a few shillings.

The Moqui medicine-man, with his sacred "estufas," his sand altars, his regalia, and his loathsome serpents, has been photographed, painted in colors, drawn to a scale, his canticles have been pirated by the waxen cylinder of the phonograph; and he and his sacred ceremonials, which less than fifteen years ago were not known as far east as Albuquerque, are to-day the best described of any specimen of savage manhood or any survival of aboriginal religion on the surface of the globe.—Journal of Folk-lore.

The captain of an American war-ship now in the East writes thus of a Japanese war hospital near Nagasaki: "The hospital was the admiration of the French and English surgeons as well as our own. The medical officers were all Japanese, who had graduated in medicine and surgery either in America or England, then taken a post-graduate surgical course in clinics at the Paris and Berlin hospitals. They had the best modern instruments and systems, the newest antiseptics, everything a hospital on modern lines should have."

COME TO THE SUNSET TREE!*

Come to the sunset tree!
The day is past and gone:
The woodman's axe lies free,
And the reaper's work is done.
The twilight star to heaven,
And the summer dew to flowers,
And rest to us is given
By the cool soft evening hours.

Come to the sunset tree!
The day is past and gone:
The woodman's axe lies free,
And the reaper's work is done.

Sweet is the hour of rest!
Pleasant the wind's low sigh,
And the gleaming of the west,
And the turf whereon we lie;
When the burden and the heat
Of labor's task are o'er,
And kindly voices greet
The tired one at his door.

But rest more sweet and still Than ever nightfall gave
Our yearning hearts shall fill
In the world beyond the grave.
So we lift our trusting eyes
From the hills our fathers trod
To the quiet of the skies,
To the Sabbath of our God.

—Mrs. Hemans.

GUILFORD H. HATHAWAY.

Guilford H. Hathaway died at his home in Freetown on February 12, at the age of eighty-six. He was for the larger part of his long and useful life an active member of the Unitarian church in Fall River, having become identified with it during the ministry of Dr. Briggs.

For twenty-one years he was upon the Parish Committee; and, although in later years he retired to his ancestral town, his interest in and liberality in contributing to the cause of rational Christianity continued to the end. His business probity was of the highest sort, and obtained for him many places of trust in Bristol County. He was for more than a half-century a director of the Fall River National Bank, besides having a part in the management of savings and trust institutions.

Active and methodical to the last, he has received the respect and honor of a community which has long known him for his contributions to its material progress, and for his admirable example of integrity in the varied public and private responsibilities which have been laid upon him.

Spirit of the Press.

The New York Post rejoices in a bill just passed at Albany:—

The Assembly at Albany has passed a bill forbidding "all sparring exhibitions, with or without gloves, at which an admission fee is charged or received, directly or indirectly." This is a most excellent measure, and should speedily become a law. The disgraceful sparring "exhibitions" which are given in different cities in this State from time to time under that name, but which are as much prize-fights as any that have taken place in a Southern ring, would be discontinued entirely if their promoters saw their profits cut off by a law making an admission fee illegal. It is this admission fee which is the incentive of the "exhibitions," not a display of skill or science."

Harper's Weekly, in an editorial on "Public School Reform in New York and Brooklyn," says:—

Despite the enormous sums spent upon them and despite the fact that a large proportion of the teachers are intelligent and earnest, the public schools of New York and Brooklyn are notoriously deficient. Their accommodations are inadequate and badly distributed. The sanitary conditions, except in a few of the newest buildings, are bad. No proper provision is made for play-grounds and for physical exercise; and modern improvements in text-books and methods of teaching are, as a rule, stoutly resisted. It is not often that defects such as these can be directly traced to administrative faults, but both in New York and Brooklyn this can be done. The superintendents have too little direct authority and power over the educational work; and a vicious system of ward trustees in New York and of local committees in Brooklyn provides a resting-place for jobs of all sorts, political and personal, and effectually blocks all large plans for improvement initiated by the central body. After prolonged study a committee of experts, selected by the Committee of Seventy in New York, and an advisory commission appointed by Mayor Schieren in Brooklyn, have drawn bills that are now before the legislature, providing for an escape from the present evils, and the substitution of a simple, direct, and responsible school administration for the roundabout and cumbrous scheme that accident and political chicanery have united to bring into existence.

* This was a favorite of Judge Hoar's sister Elizabeth, and he became very fond of the words by her singing them to Miss Brown's "Tyrolese Evening Hymn" tune. It was sung at his funeral.

Science.

Argon is the name which has been given to the new element in the atmosphere discovered by Lord Rayleigh and Prof. Ramsay.—Exchange.

Iron, through its use for electrical purposes, seems to have developed a new quality, magnetic fatigue. In tests made of transformers lately in London to ascertain the opening circuit loss it has been found that the loss increased steadily for the first two hundred days, until it reached a fairly constant value of forty per cent. more than at starting.—Exchange.

Music.

Mr. Emil Tiffero, the distinguished tenor, has decided to take up his residence in Boston. Emil Tiffero received his earlier musical education at the Conservatories of Munich and Vienna, and later under the guidance of the famous Italian singer and teacher, Maestro Pozzo at Milan, and Prof. Julius Hey at Berlin. Mr. Tiffero held the position of first tenor on the Italian stage a number of years, and has also been engaged at the Kroll Theatre, Berlin, the court theatres at Altenburg, Wiesbaden, and St. Petersburg, Grand Opera House, Amsterdam, and Metropolitan Opera House, New York; has given concerts at Berlin, Cologne, London, Prague, Trieste, and at Milan, where he was elected an honorary member of the "Società Quartetto Corale," an honor seldom conferred. Mr. Tiffero has taken a studio at 130 Boylston Street, and will teach the higher art of singing.

Education.

OLD SOUTH LEAFLETS.—Eight new Old South Leaflets have just been added to the series published by the directors of the Old South Studies in History in Boston. These new leaflets are all reprints of documents relating to early New England history, as follows: Bradford's Memoir of Elder Brewster, Bradford's First Dialogue, Winthrop's "Conclusions for the Plantation in New England," "New England's First Fruits," 1643, John Eliot's "Indian Grammar Begun," John Cotton's "God's Promise to his Plantation," Letters of Roger Williams to Winthrop, and Thomas Hooker's "Way of the Churches of New England." These leaflets are a most welcome addition to the series in which so many valuable original documents, otherwise hard to obtain, are now furnished at the cost of a few cents. The Old South Leaflets are rendering our historical students and all of our people a great service. The numbers of the eight new leaflets, 48 to 55, remind us how large and important the collection has already become.

This company has, in order to afford greater security to its boxholders, demolished their old vault and substituted a new vault more than twice as large as the old one, situated on a level with the street, combining in its construction every improvement which modern science and inventive genius have been able to devise for the protection of treasure.

Extensive coupon rooms, a reading room and toilet rooms are also on the street level. A luxuriously furnished department has been prepared for the use of ladies who rent safe deposit boxes.

Pleasantries.

"What's an allegory, Irene?" asked a teacher. "It is kind of a crocodile," was the answer.—Young People's Magazine.

Mrs. Nuborder: "That's a very pretty motto you are working, Mrs. Browne-Haash,—'Learn to say no.' Is it for your son?" Mrs. Browne-Haash: "No: it's for the dining-room."—Puck.

"Genii means spirits," explained a teacher. "Now, James, you may give me a sentence in which you use genii." "A man went down street, and bought several bottles of genii," answered James, promptly. Young People's Magazine.

No one had thought to teach the minister's little girl a verse for Children's Sunday, as she was so small. She said she could say one, and her teacher lifted her up on the organ. Bonniwell folded her little hands demurely, and, with the most seraphic smile, said softly but distinctly, "My papa's fabrit vegetable is custard pie."

The eldest of the three little chaps was sternly reproved by his mother for his bad behavior. "You are the oldest, Cyrus," she said; "and you ought to be an example to Homer and Jack." "Well, I'll be an example to Homer," said Cyrus; "but I won't be an example to both of 'em. Homer's got to be it for Jack."—Transcript.

On one occasion a person who wished to have a little fun at the expense of his constituency said in a group where Horace Greeley was standing: "Mr. Greeley and I, gentlemen, are old friends. We have drunk a good deal of brandy and water together." "Yes," said Mr. Greeley, "that is true enough. You drank the brandy, and I drank the water."

"I have often been pointed out as a sister of Howells, the novelist," said Mme. Frechette; "but once I had my turn. We were on our wedding journey, and my brother had joined us. 'Do you see that man in the bow of the boat?' asked one woman of another. 'Yes, who is he?' 'Oh, haven't you heard yet? Why, he's the brother of the bride.'"

Western editors delight in publishing little paragraphs like the following: "Nearly 70 States the size of Rhode Island could be carved out of Missouri, 56 out of Illinois, 53 out of Arkansas, 265 out of Texas." If this sort of thing is kept up much longer, Rhode Island will draw its money from the savings-banks, go down there, and buy some of those States.—Transcript.

When Rev. W. W. Newton was in Moscow, he was asked why he went to Troitsa. "To see Count Tolstoi," was the answer. "Count Tolstoi?" cried the questioner, in an incredulous tone. "Well, have you seen the big bell in the Kremlin,—the Tsar Kodokol, or King of Bells?" "Yes, I have seen it." "Well, then, if you have seen the big bell of Moscow and Count Tolstoi, you have seen the two objects of interest; and the same thing has happened to both of them. They are each cracked." Youth's Companion.

Once Mr. Gladstone had been cutting down a tree in the presence of a large concourse of people, including a number of "cheap trippers." When the tree had fallen, and the Prime Minister and some of his family who were with him were moving away, there was a rush for the chips. One of the trippers secured a big piece, and exclaimed, "Hey, lads, when I dee, this shall go in my coffin." Then cried his wife, a shrewd, motherly old woman, with a merry wrinkle in her eye, "Sam, my lad, if thou'd worship God as thou worships Gladstone, thou'd stand a better chance of going where thy chip wouldna burn."—The New Age.

NO MORALS.

Rev. George R. Dodson, the popular Unitarian minister of Alameda, tells rather a good story at his own expense. While spending the summer vacation at Skagg's Springs, one of his greatest friends was a fellow-boarder, a little girl about eight years old. The two were constant companions, and the child daily accompanied the clergyman on his excursions in the neighborhood. One evening the little girl remarked to her fellow-diners,—

"I like going out with Mr. Dodson." "Why?" queried a stranger, hoping to draw the child out. "Because he has no morals," was the startling reply.

When the summer boarders had recovered their equanimity, they instituted an investigation, the upshot of which was the discovery that the curly-haired maiden possessed an insatiable craving for stories. This desire was frequently gratified by Mr. Dodson; but, unlike the anecdotes of the child's mother, the minister's tales were never pointed with a moral for the youngster's government.—San Francisco News-letter.

A Potato Delicacy.

No one needs to be told of the great difference of quality in potatoes. Many brought to the table are utterly unpalatable, because originators have had but one aim in view—earliness. We secured by chance (see below) a potato which now bears that name. It is unlike other sorts, being free from disease, early, an abundant cropper, good keeper, when cooked, dry as summer dust, and the quality,—to appreciate that you must eat some. Plant a few, and the crop will pleasantly surprise you in many ways. We deliver them anywhere for 25c. lb., $1.25 1/2 pk., $2.00 pk., $7.00 bu. Our 1895 illustrated catalogue mailed free. It contains the history of this remarkable potato, and is replete with news about novelties, standard varieties of flower and vegetable seeds, and the most approved agricultural and horticultural implements. Editorial.

THE Woman's Congress which is now in session in Washington is a remarkable illustration of the power of women to organize and to successfully conduct great conventions, in which every phase of the relation of women to modern life is considered. The present convention will extend over two weeks. Mrs. May Wright Sewell of Indianapolis is the president, and opened the Congress with an effective address. The programme shows the wide range of the activities of women, and how earnestly they are addressing themselves to the great variety of tasks and opportunities which open before them to-day in this country. Many questions which were purely theoretical or hypothetical have received a practical answer. In all this movement the agitation for suffrage is but one element,—an instrument to an end, not a goal.

THE first annual report of the board of directors of the Massachusetts Cremation Society is of much interest. Its receipts have been $11,088.79; its expenditures, $10,453.40. More than $7,000 have been spent in building, machinery, and in laying out grounds. The first cremation took place Dec. 30, 1893. Up to Jan. 1, 1895, just one year, there have been eighty-seven cremations. This is a far greater number than can be shown by any crematory in this continent or Europe for its first year's work, except the crematory in San Francisco. The building containing the retorts is now in perfect order for practical purposes. When the remaining shares of stock are sold, there will be sufficient money to complete the chapel. It is evident that this form of disposing of the dead is growing in favor in the community.

THE ministers of Hoboken, N.J., have given Col. Ingersoll more free advertising than he has received for some time. Forgetting the rights of free speech, which Col. Ingersoll has a perfect right to enjoy, they joined together to prevent the delivery of his lecture on the Bible in a Hoboken Theatre on Sunday evening last. The ground of their objection was that the lecture was blasphemous. As the lecture had not been delivered and no one could be quite sure what Col. Ingersoll would say, the objection was premature and unreasonable. The lecture was held, and Col. Ingersoll profited much by the advertising. We do not believe in the lecturer's method. We do not think his treatment of the Bible is intelligent, reverent, or scholarly, though many of the points he attacks are simply those which Orthodoxy has made absurd by a literal interpretation. But, on the other hand, Col. Ingersoll's lectures, though they may offend good taste, are not any more blasphemous than a theology which made God a cruel devil and the majority of mankind the victims of his unrighteous hatred. For ministers who preach such doctrines to accuse Col. Ingersoll of blasphemy is a parody on reverence.

A NATURAL suggestion for the relief of the unemployed in congested centres of population is transplanting them to country homes. Various schemes of colonization have been proposed and tried, but with only partial success. The tendency of life toward the cities has been very strong, and it cannot be counteracted easily until the land is open to laborers, and there is more inducement for them to go upon it. In Chicago the work of transplanting the unemployed to the agricultural districts, which began last spring under the auspices of the Civic Federation of Chicago, is now resumed under the Bureau of Labor and Transportation. The work is philanthropic, and, from the success of individual cases, is undoubtedly well worth doing. But what is wanted is an economical solution which will take the matter out of the realm of philanthropy. Henry George and his followers maintain that the whole labor question is a question of land. Many social and industrial theories can only be tested by experiment. A good many of them have already been tried, and have failed, in this country. We should like to see the single tax tried in some State on a scale broad enough to reveal its merits and defects.

THERE is one Kentucky judge who has some respect for law and a determination to enforce it. At the opening of the court in Mount Sterling he recently made a deep impression by his charge to the grand jury. His name is Cooper. He urges upon the jury the duty of considering the disgrace and the danger of the wickedness of mob violence. He related instances of lynch law in which criminals in jail—in one case serving out a sentence for carrying concealed weapons, and in the other awaiting trial—were taken out of their cells by mobs, and hanged. In commenting upon this, the Central Christian Advocate says: "The newspapers and officers of justice in the South are awakening to the fact that lynch law, once countenanced and practised by a community as the one penalty which must be executed for a single crime committed by a black man, does not stop there. The mob that to-day hangs or burns a Negro for an outrageous deed to-morrow is likely to break open a jail and take out a white man, and hang him for theft, or horse-stealing, or general cantankerousness. Lynch law educates a community into the habit of committing murder."

IN Georgia, however, the inability to secure justice to the colored man is shown by the outcome of the Quitman case. It will be remembered that last December a drunken white man named Harris attempted to take the life of a colored man named Pike, who shot and killed him. A "race war" immediately followed. A dozen or more innocent Negroes were slaughtered, and their wives flogged and insulted, because they could not tell the whereabouts of Pike. Among the killed were inoffensive Negroes who had always borne reputations for peaceableness and good order. A prominent journal in the South said: "The killing of the Negroes was entirely uncalled for. Good citizens of the country will do their utmost to bring to justice the men who are responsible for the trouble." The coroner investigated the outrages, and the jury brought in a verdict against two prominent citizens. The Brooks County Commissioners met, and announced the outrages. Yet, in spite of the efforts made by those who upheld the Negroes, the grand jury of Brooks County has adjourned its session without bringing in any indictment against the accused. There will not be even the farce of a trial. It is no wonder that a colored paper, the New Orleans Daily Crusader, says, "This is a sample of the justice that colored men receive in the South."

It is one thing for bishops to issue a pastoral letter: it is another thing for them to get their flocks to accept it as anything but a conventional proclamation or an ecclesiastical curiosity. The futility of the document issued by the Protestant Episcopal bishops is shown in a protest of an Episcopal clergyman printed in the Boston Herald and copied in another column. This clergyman says of the pastoral letter, "It urges upon me a conception of religion which seems to me untrue, admonishes me to teach, and construes the obligation of my ordination vows in a manner contrary to my understanding of them." While the bishops think that such a clergyman needs just such a letter, the clergyman, on the other hand, finds that he has no use for the document. He cannot in conscience teach the doctrine of the virgin birth of Jesus, nor the doctrine that the Bible is miraculously and infallibly inspired; and he ends by declaring that he intends to do everything in public and in private to deliver the Church from vain and pedantic pretension. This pastoral letter of an Episcopal clergyman is quite as significant as that of the bishops, and shows a better knowledge of the condition and needs of the Church and the age.

BISHOP POTTER of New York has written a letter to the New York Tribune on the bishops' pastoral. Instead of trying to increase its authority, he minimizes it by pointing out that "the pastoral letter has undoubtedly no conciliar authority, and may be said, if anybody chooses to say so, to have little more value than is expressed in the more or less close consensus of opinion of some half-dozen individuals." He confesses that "there are phrases in it which I am quite free to say I should have been glad to change into other and less archaic form." He further says: "If there be to-day a school or party or individuals that deny the Church's doctrine of the incarnation, I, for one, do not know them or the teaching which could justly subject them to such an imputation. . . . The Church, in the case of the virgin birth of our Lord, does not regard any longer that question as a debatable one in the pulpit and by her authorized teachers." But, if the bishop will read the letter from the Episcopal minister which we publish in another column, he will see that there are certain authorized teachers who cannot conscientiously teach the virgin birth. As the pastoral letter has no conciliar authority, they will undoubtedly follow the example of this clergyman in disregarding it.

GEN. BOOTH IN BOSTON.

What attitude to adopt with reference to the Salvation Army appears to have been, with many good people, rather a puzzling question. On the one hand, they have found a little difficulty in regarding it as quite respectable. On the other hand, it is somewhat too waspish a thing to be patronized successfully, and perhaps there never was a movement more completely proof against ridicule. But, without doubt, whatever else the army may lack or possess, it has the gift of vitality. No religious organization of the day is more genuinely alive; and it would be difficult to name another so well equipped to maintain itself with vigor in the field where it has rooted itself. We shall have to reckon with it as with an enterprise that has come to stay.

So far as we may judge from the series of meetings held by Gen. Booth in Boston, there is not only great vitality, but immense hope and cheer in the work of the army which he has founded. Its methods mark a long step of advance over the "revivalism" with which we were familiar a quarter of a century ago. It is much more human than the Moody and Sankey wave, for example, which latterly swept over the country. There is far less talk of "blood," far less play upon superstitious fears, and in every way a much more direct and powerful appeal to man's inborn love of what is noble and good.

Gen. Booth's theology, so far as he has any, is curiously childish. We do not use the word meaning the least disrespect, for he has something better than all the theology that was ever written. But, certainly, his speculative ideas would hardly bear the criticism of a child. God, he thinks, did not originally provide for sin in his universe,—took it for granted, as it were, that there would be no sin, as a man might innocently found a town on the banks of a stream, knowing nothing of the malaria that would afterward poison its inhabitants. When sin came, God had to "scoop out a place" for the dregs of it, which could not be reclaimed; and so he established hell, to serve as a kind of moral cesspool for the world. How this consists with the character of an all-wise Creator the General does not explain.

But, after all, this amounts to little, when we contrast it with the effect that he is able to produce upon the better side of human nature. He is reported to have said, in reply to a question put to him by Joseph Cook (who appears to consider himself appointed a special keeper of the gates of hell, and who constantly magnifies the importance of his office), that without hell he could do nothing, the Salvation Army simply could not exist. In a certain sense this is undoubtedly true, but it is the present hell of sin and misery of which he mostly thinks and speaks. It is that from which he is chiefly trying to save men. The theological hell of a future life is no more than a kind of background for the pictures that he paints, and these pictures are almost entirely vivid and glowing portrayals of the beauty of holiness. In his Faneuil Hall address there was not the least sensational attempt to excite terror, and not a single groan or "Amen" was called forth by any reference to the future punishment of the wicked. But when, after speaking of his dear wife's desire to dress the children all the time in white, if it had not been too expensive, he exclaimed with most dramatic effect, "God Almighty, your Father, can afford to dress his children in white every day," there was a perfect storm of glad "Hallelujahs" and "Amen."

If Gen. Booth imagines that it is fear of hell which does the business, we fancy he does not well know the greatness of his gift or the secret of his power. He has the ability to lay a living touch upon the only soul that can maintain a lingering life "under the ribs of death," the soul of heavenly ambition and hope. To many a despondent and discouraged mind he can say as with authority: "Awake, my brother! Heaven is for you, if you will only bestir yourself a little." There really needs no talk of hell, other than of those torments which every sin-sick soul already knows. Like the anguish which the half-drowned experience with the return of consciousness is the coming back of heavenly desires to an insensible heart. Threats are useless to one who can awaken the instinct for a higher life.

Whatever the theory of the Salvation Army workers may be, in practice they appear to address themselves almost entirely to the hopes of men; and this is a great advance upon what has gone before. Experience, we take it, has abundantly shown that a convert who has merely been scared into acceptance of the traditional means of salvation is afterward a very uncertain member of the flock, and of little practical account. These new soldiers of the cross are filled with quite a different spirit. None of them are likely to be found anticipating with pleasure their future chance to look down upon the tortures of the damned; and, unless they are converted over again when they get into another world, one might predict that they could hardly be content there without setting to work upon whatever hells they found within reach. It is a veritable gospel, a piece of "good news," that they have found to proclaim. With all deference to any feeling they may have that they know their own business best, we would advise them that this is the real secret of their strength. The proclamation of evil tidings they may safely give over to Mr. Joseph Cook's exclusive care.

Gen. Booth has performed one service for the modern world which, probably, was not at all within the scope of his conscious purpose. He has shown us the power that still lies in the individual man under social conditions which, as we are apt to think, are unfavorable to the acquisition of such command. The success of the Salvation Army is, in very great measure, his personal triumph; and it is his personal life which now thrills throughout the whole organization. We advise our readers to miss no opportunity of hearing him speak; and we assure them that, if they will, for the time being, put questions of theology aside, they will get the impression of a wonderfully vital moral and spiritual influence.

FREDERICK DOUGLASS.

"With a great price," Frederick Douglass might have said, "purchased I this freedom." Yet, though slave-born, the instincts of freedom were born in him. They early asserted themselves, and were with him a controlling influence during his whole life. It was foreseen by the slaveholders that slavery and a high degree of knowledge and intelligence could not exist together. The laws in all the Southern States prohibiting slaves from learning to read and write were enacted as a safeguard of slavery. To-day, when schools and colleges for the education of the colored people are springing up everywhere in the South, protected and fostered by State laws and crowded by eager throngs of colored youths, it may be hard to realize that Frederick Douglass had to learn to read and write by stealth, and that he was violating the laws of the State of Maryland in acquiring this knowledge. He likewise refused to regard himself as a piece of property, and added to his criminality by running away. The interesting details of his early life he has told in his autobiography.

No sooner had he secured his own freedom than he burned with zeal to secure the freedom of his race. To that work he gave himself with determination and unquenchable ardor. His appearance on the anti-slavery platform in this country and in England, and his earnest, manly eloquence, exerted an influence which could not be commanded wholly by the Abolitionists. That such a man was by his birth condemned to ignorance and bondage, and that freedom could do so much for him and he so much for freedom, furnished to an audience an object-lesson whose influence could not be resisted.

Frederick Douglass had the joy not only of gaining his own freedom, but of seeing the enfranchisement of his race and its remarkable progress in the last twenty-five years. Yet race hatred dies slowly. There are States in the South in which it would have been unlawful for Mr. Douglass to ride in the same car with white men his inferior in ability, knowledge, and decorum. And one of his last addresses in Boston was directed against the evils of lynching in the South.

As Mr. Douglass saw that liberty was too great and too sacred a blessing for his own selfish enjoyment, he saw likewise that civil and political freedom could not be bound by sex, any more than it could be bound by race. He became an earnest advocate of woman suffrage. He spoke in favor of temperance and other moral reforms. He was benevolent in spirit and progressive in ideas. He was a striking and commanding figure,—especially in later years, when the large bronzed face was crowned with hair like snow on the summit of Olympus.

Douglass wrought in no spirit of vindictiveness. It cost him something to obtain his freedom. It cost the South something, too. But it was worth to Douglass all that he paid for it, and worth to the South vastly more than it cost; for there is nothing clearer than that the emancipation of the colored man was necessary to the emancipation of the white man. The South will some day erect monuments to Garrison, Phillips, and Douglass, or, if it does not pay the debt in this way, it will be paid more fully by the perfect consummation of the liberty for which these men wrought.

FROM PHILOSOPHY TO RELIGION.

At the Norfolk Conference last week there was an animated discussion of the ways and means by which great ideas may be transmuted into the forms and activities of the religious life. The Unitarian body is more and more coming to a consciousness of itself as a Church. While from the beginning of its history in this country it has been able to produce saints of the highest quality, there has gone along with the growth of the religious life a philosophical progress. The search for truth has been earnest and successful; but too often it has happened that in the search for truth men and women have forgotten that even the highest truth is a means, and not an end. To produce men and women of the first quality is the end for which the Church exists; and it should be the end of all thinking, feeling, and action. Ideas, as ideas, are the raw material out of which, when properly used, will come all the experiences of the religious life. The examples of the greatest masters of thought, who were also fishers of men, shows that for effective work one must so master his learning that he will not think of it or suggest it as he moves toward the end of his main purpose, which is to encourage, to inspire, to comfort, to draw out the moral and spiritual resources of the ignorant, tempted, weak, and fallible human creatures who are to be found in the pulpits and pews of every Christian church.

The preacher who is conscious of and displays his attainments—whether rhetorical, scientific, or metaphysical—will fail to attain his end; and the congregation that asks for the intellectual treatment of every subject, and the declaration of something new, will have little moral power and give little spiritual help for the community in which it is. The masterpieces of inspiration and poetry found in Isaiah, Job, or Tennyson, show us how every art and every science can be brought to bear for the solution of the moral and spiritual problems of the race. Nobody will complain of any philosopher who brings his acquirements, not in the crude form of things he has read or thought or worked out to logical conclusions, but the ideas that he has used in the experiences of life until his intellect begins to flow out in power through all the channels of spiritual experience. There need be no fear that such vitalized ideas will be lost upon the hearer.

Deep will answer unto deep. There need be no fear that the ideas that have been so wrought into life will not be put into due place of honor. The verdict of the congregation will be that the system of thought which produces the right life, the beautiful example, the inspired word, will be worth looking into. They who have time and ability for the studies that lie back of such deliverances will all the more eagerly pursue them. They who have not time nor taste for such studies will trust in their validity because they come with the credentials of the spiritual life.

Parker divided the ways and means of the spiritual life into three classes,—ideas, feelings, and actions. A fourth exceedingly important class was omitted. Ideas, feelings, and actions record themselves in permanent elements of character; in sentiments that are neither ideas nor emotions; in permanent aptitudes and capacities, which slowly increase with new ideas acting through feeling and action, and leaving a deposit in the permanent being which constitutes the identity of the soul. Parker's list, thus corrected, would be ideas, feelings, sentiments, and actions.

We are apt to set up the intellect and the emotions as if the choice lay between the two, whereas the truth is that the permanent moral and spiritual sentiments—such as the sentiment of justice, of benevolence, of honor, of chastity, of reverence—may exist in the constitution of the mind neither as ideas nor emotions. They are the growing life of the soul. They may at any moment reveal themselves in emotions. In crises of danger, when heroism is called for and ideas are to expand themselves into action, these sentiments may burn and blaze in the intense emotion of the hour; but the emotion is only the signal of the deeper life. The true patriot may be so true and so firm that, with calmness, serenity, and invincible resolution, he may respond to every demand made upon him without excitement and without display of emotion. In him ideas and ideals have been wrought into the proper form of life. Such a man, himself unmoved and calm, often becomes the centre about which whirl torrents of emotion, which without his calm and unshaken rectitude would not be excited. The people ask for bread. Shall the Church give them a stone? The raw material, the chemical constituents of bread and milk and meat, are found in the stones. It is the office of the preacher and the Church to lift these raw materials of metaphysics and philosophy and science through all the processes of growth, of leavening, and of kneading, until they appear in the bread of life. And, still further, they who teach and move the world must have themselves eaten of that bread, and in their own veins have turned it into the living truth for the sustenance of the people.

The kind of piety which Dr. Channing had in mind when he preached his famous sermon on the subject, and the kind of religion naturally produced by Unitarian ministrations in their best form, consists mainly of these sentiments which are imbedded in the character. They give to the mind strength, calmness, the rich soil in which fruitful ideas are turned into the resources of life. To those who are accustomed to emotional excitement, and who measure the success of every appeal by the emotional response, such Unitarian religion seems cold and heartless; but to those who have learned the steadiness of its warmth and the trustworthiness of the sentiments to which appeal can successfully be made when occasion requires, this religious character seems to be admirable and desirable beyond all other results in preaching, worship, and the good deeds of the churches. A society made up of men and women of this religious quality would show in all practical ways the best fruits of the spirit.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

The Council of the National Conference has held two meetings to consider various invitations to hold the next session of the National Conference at Chicago, Philadelphia, and Washington. Many think it desirable to hold a conference next fall, in order to turn the enthusiasm generated at Saratoga into all the channels of our organic life. If we wait two years, we fall again upon the Presidential campaign. If we wait three years, it is believed that serious loss will be the result in the evaporation of enthusiasm and interest in the work.

The Council, having carefully considered the claims and various advantages offered by Chicago, Philadelphia, and Washington, have come to the general conclusion that, if the meeting is to be held next October, it should probably be in the city of Washington. The invitation to Philadelphia proceeds from the desire of the people to have the Conference co-operate with the churches there in celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of the founding of the First Church. That would occur in April, and does not seem to be a desirable time for a meeting of the Conference. It is also believed that other arrangements, through the Conference or the Unitarian Association, can be made to give that occasion sufficient dignity and importance without a meeting of the Conference. At the last meeting of the Council the secretary and treasurer were asked to get definite terms, and the refusal of any necessary building or buildings, and report whether the social conditions would be sufficiently favorable to make it possible to continue something like the advantages furnished at Saratoga. A meeting of the Conference will soon be held, at which the subject will be finally discussed and settled, and the outlines of a programme adopted, if the meeting is to be held next October.

Amusings.

I SPENT half an hour the other evening with a man who some years ago was a well-known base-ball pitcher. His name no longer figures in the score. For several years he has been confined to the house, and has been lying on his back most of the time, in bed, afflicted with rheumatism. The conversation, I might say, when it fell into the subject of base-ball curves, took a professional turn. For some time the claim of base-ball pitchers that they could make a ball curve in or out, or up or down, as it approached the batsman, was doubted. But it was proved beyond doubt by scientific tests, and the fact is now accepted as established. Indeed, the same principle is recognized in the Ordnance Department in the adjustment of sights and weapons; and no bullet leaves a gun without a twist to it. But I suspect this fact was known a great deal earlier than we imagine. When Odysseus took part in the games of the Phæacians, he picked up a discus larger than the rest. He gave it a powerful whirl or twist as he sent it from his stout hand; and I think, if we could see the discus go from the hand of the discobolos in the Vatican, where, with muscles tense and form bent for the cast, he has been ready for centuries for his throw, we should find that he also gave it a powerful whirl. A ball of course must be delivered differently and just how Nausicaa and her maidens threw the ball when they played a game after they had finished their washing, I do not undertake to say. I suspect that there was not a great deal of science in it; and the princess must be credited with one error, a wild throw. But it was a game of ball just the same; and it shows how old is the pastime,—just as old as the Greek game of jack-stones, which I saw the boys and girls play in Athens, living reproductions of some of the ancient paintings in which the game is pictured.

THIS subject of projectiles has not a great theoretic interest for me. It has had some practical interest for me, however; for, like many of my fellow-countrymen, I have been exposed to a hail-storm of lead, and have eaten my breakfast after reveille behind a cottonwood tree, to escape being a target. Looking over recently, in the Patent Office, an old English book on artillery which was printed some two hundred and fifty years ago, my attention was called to the humane distinction which the inventor had suggested in the application of his cannon. It was to be provided with two kinds of bullets, some square and some round. The square ones were said to be much more destructive to life: they made a more dangerous wound than the round ones. The inventor therefore proposed that the square bullets should be used in fighting the Turks, while the round ones should be used in fighting Christians. The Turks, in spite of the shape of the bullets, might not think this square dealing. It is an indication, however, of the struggle to make war more humane or more horrible. Humanity and Christianity were not synonymous with this inventor. Turning to the Odyssey again, one finds several centuries before Christ indications of the struggle of ethics and humanity to assert themselves in the use of projectiles. Odysseus sought a deadly drug in which to dip his brazen arrows; but Ilus did not give it to him, "for he feared the immortal gods," though Odysseus got it somewhere else. Even so far back it was deemed inhuman to use poisoned arrows. Just what Ilus would say of the use of square bullets for the Turks I do not know. But, apart from the use of poison, I imagine that every modern ordnance department is looking for the most destructive projectile and weapon it can get.

I do not know how the English inventor would class a conical ball,—whether for the Turks or the Christians; but I do know that on one occasion I was enabled to fulfil the spirit of the prediction that the sword should be turned into a ploughshare by turning an army bullet into a stenographic pencil. I went to hear a lecture in the Divinity School by dear old Dr. Stearns. I had forgotten pen or pencil; but I found in my vest pocket a Henry rifle bullet, which I sharpened to a finer point and used successfully as a lead-pencil to report the lecture. I have just been looking over the note-book in which that lecture was reported. It bears date Dec. 10, 1873. So that it is more than twenty-one years old. The characters are still perfectly legible, though the bullet was not used to that sort of work, and was a little reluctant to mark in some instances; and the hair lines are pretty fine. The lecture was on "Marriage and Divorce." Dr. Stearns criticised at some length the existing laws, and then told what the law ought to be. I find myself differing from my old teacher when he said in this lecture, "I think that the husband is the head of the wife; and, if a conflict occurs, and one must give way, the duty and subordination of the household would require that she should give way." But the doctor added, "Woman must never consent to moral wrong." At the end of this lecture, and written with the same forty-four calibre bullet, I find this interesting and significant paragraph: "I believe more in co-operation than competition. We have been trying competition: we have been following it up almost to the end. I do not think competition is to be given up, but that the time is coming when actual co-operation of interest must largely take the place of that competition which is acting now." This was a prophecy by Dr. Stearns of a new social order which, I believe, is destined to be still more fully realized. It was fitting that a bullet, an instrument of destructive competition should be converted into a prophetic instrument of affiliation and brotherhood.

Brevities.

The gifts of the women of the Presbyterian Church Home Missions from April 1, 1894, to Feb. 1, 1895, were $205,500. Well done, good and faithful servants!

The legislature of Texas has just passed a bill against mob rule. It makes the county in which mob rule prevails liable to heavy pecuniary damage. The bill is a good one, and, if properly enforced, will soon end mob rule in that State.

In the columns of religious "wants" we can read in these days two advertisements. One is, "Wanted: a church for the people"; the other is, "Wanted: people for the church." Somehow, each of these advertisements ought to be made to answer the other.

Liberty, the organ of the anarchists in New York, does not "justify" its columns in a typographical sense, nor does it justify all its utterances in an intellectual sense. It is hard reading for the eye; but, then, Liberty has a right to set up its type as anarchistically as it pleases.

China has taken a queer way to insure military success; namely, by getting the only generals it has to commit suicide. What it ought to do is to ask the Japanese generals to commit hari-kari. The Japanese are a people of such intense politeness that the request, if presented with due formality, might be complied with.

Mayor Strong has smitten the politicians hip and thigh in New York. Platt Republicans and Tammany Democrats, who ethically and politically belong in the same boat, have been thrown into consternation, as they well deserve to be. To have a mayor who believes in honest government in New York is such a surprise that the politicians cannot get over it.

Mr. Chadwick got off so well with an "unmitigable" mistake that he ought to be thankful that it was not worse. Ex-Gov. Chamberlain sends a letter received by the same mail, saying: "I will not lose an hour in cordially thanking you for such perfect composition and punctuation. It is, I believe, perfect; i.e., it is precisely what I wrote! Macte virtute!"

NOTICE.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

Many thanks to those friends of the Post-office Mission who have sent me the Christian Register the past year and years. I have put them all to good use. Not a single number of this excellent paper should be destroyed or laid uselessly by on the shelf. Let it circulate freely and widely. It will be appreciated wherever it is known. I could profitably use twenty more copies of this paper than are now sent me. Friends, note the address. JOHN S. BROWN. Lawrence, Kan.

GEN. BOOTH AND JOSEPH COOK.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

I clip the following from Tuesday's issue of the Transcript:—

Joseph Cook has contributed to the literature of the Salvation Army a "war-cry," entitled "Sheep and Wolves," which was sung to the tune of "Rock of Ages" in Park Street Church Monday noon in honor of Gen. Booth's visit to Boston. Mr. Cook, in announcing that the congregation would have the assistance of members of the Salvation Army in giving the "war-cry" its proper expression and emphasis, advised all who thought the fourth verse, which he said dealt with "unspeakable things," should not be sung in a church, to go out upon the street and follow the Salvation Army into the slums of Boston; and he was satisfied the objectors would find ample evidence justifying the strong language used in describing the evils. The stanza is as follows:—

"Wolves within Thy human fold
Turn Thou from their bloody quest;
Fiendishness in fetters hold,
Serpents slay in East and West.
Let Thy lightnings cleanse with flame
